

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

DURANTY v. HART. CARGO ex HAMBURG.

[Priv. Co.]

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by JAMES PATERSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Wednesday, March 16, 1864.

(Present—The Right Hon. Lords CHELMSFORD and KINGSDOWN and Sir J. T. COLERIDGE.)

DURANTY v. HART.

CARGO ex HAMBURG.

Ship—Bottomry bond—Power of master to bind owner of cargo—Duty to communicate with owners.

The master of a ship is an agent for the owners of the cargo for the purposes of hypothecation only in cases of necessity, but not in a case where means exist of communicating with such owners and obtaining an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case. It is the duty of the lender on bottomry first to inquire of the master whether he has so communicated or made an attempt to communicate with the owners of the cargo; and if the master has not done so, the bond is void as against the cargo.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Court of Admiralty pronounced on the 31st March 1863.

The app. Alexander Duranty was a merchant in Liverpool. The resps. were the three firms of Judah Hart and Co., John Charles White and Sons, and Fruhling and Goschen, all carrying on business in the city of London.

The app. sued in rem in the Court of Admiralty as the assignee and holder of a certain bottomry bond granted on the 24th July 1861 in the island of St. Thomas, upon the ship Hamburg, her freight and cargo, by the master of the ship.

The owners of the ship, who resided in Hamburg, did not appear to make any defence to the action, but suffered judgment to go by default against the ship and freight.

The resps., who were the owners of the cargo, opposed the bond, contending that it was not valid against the cargo.

In their answer in the court below the resps. made several allegations attacking the good faith of the bottomry transaction, as that the master of the Hamburg might without bottomry have obtained advances at St. Thomas from a certain firm of J. T. Levy and Co., and that the money specified in the bottomry bond was neither borrowed nor expended for the necessary expenses of the ship; but at the hearing of the cause the good faith of the transaction was not disputed, and the resps. contended that the master had no authority to bind the cargo by the bottomry bond, and that the bond was wholly invalid against the cargo for each of the three following reasons:

First, that, considering the total value of the ship, freight, and cargo, compared with the amount of the money required for the expenses at St. Thomas, the master was not justified in subjecting the cargo to the bond.

Secondly, that the master of the ship had not communicated, or attempted to communicate, with the resps. before hypothecating their cargo.

Thirdly, that the master had had opportunity of transhipping the cargo at St. Thomas.

The learned judge of the court below held, that there was no obligation in law to tranship; but decided that the bond was invalid against the cargo, apparently on each of the two first grounds alleged above.

The following were the material facts of the case:—

The Hamburg was a schooner belonging to the port of Hamburg, in the Hanseatic League. In the year 1860 the Hamburg sailed from the port of Hamburg to the island of St. Thomas, being consigned there to the house of Z. T. Levy and Co. The Hamburg thence proceeded to Grey Town, Nicaragua, where, on the 15th Jan. 1861, she was chartered to Juan Mesnier, merchant of Grey Town, to load a full cargo of Brazil wood and other lawful produce, and carry the same to Liverpool for freight, at the rate of 2*l.* 10*s.* for every ton of Brazil wood, and all other produce in the like and fair proportion. The freight was by the charter-party made payable in Liverpool in cash on delivery of the cargo, and the master engaged to sign bills of lading as presented to him, without prejudice to the charter-party. In pursuance of this charter, the Hamburg took on board at Grey Town, for several shippers, a cargo consisting chiefly of Brazil wood,

[Priv. Co.]

India-rubber, indigo and turtle shell. The master having signed bills of lading, sailed with the vessel so laden for Liverpool.

After leaving Grey Town the Hamburg met with severe weather and suffered considerable damage, and on the 25th April 1861 was forced to put into the island of St. Thomas to repair.

The master immediately reported himself to the Hamburg consul, and in all the subsequent transactions relating to the ship, surveying, ordering repairs and final execution of the bond, acted, as he was bound by the law of Hamburg to do, under the express directions and with the public official sanction of the said consul.

On the day of the vessel's arrival (25th April 1861) the consul appointed three surveyors, who, after surveying, reported the same day, recommending the cargo to be discharged forthwith, in order to examine the extent of the damages the vessel had suffered.

The cargo was accordingly discharged and warehoused, and on the 6th May 1861 a further survey was ordered by the consul to be held, to report what was best to be done for the interests of all concerned.

A survey was accordingly held, and in a report, dated 6th May 1861, the surveyors recommended extensive repairs to be done to the ship to fit her to complete the voyage, estimating such repairs at 4000 Spanish dollars (or 1025*l.* sterling), "not including extra work that might be necessary after repairs had commenced."

On the same day, the 6th May 1861, the surveyors reported the value of the vessel, with all her tackle and apparel, in her then state, to be 2000 dollars (or 425*l.*), and no more.

Upon his arrival at St. Thomas, the master had applied to the firm of Z. T. Levy and Co. to take charge of the vessel, and furnish him with the money required for the repairs and other necessary expenses of the ship, but that firm declined so to do, and the master thereupon appointed the firm of Paulsen and Co. agents for the vessel.

In pursuance of the survey, dated 6th May 1861, and with the sanction of the consul, the repairs recommended were set in hand immediately. They were not completed till the 5th July 1861.

The master thereupon again applied to the firm of Z. T. Levy and Co. to advance him money for the repairs, upon bills to be drawn upon the owners of the ship, but they again declined to assist him. The master also made a similar application to other houses, but to no result.

Being thus without funds or credit, the master then, by the direction of the consul, on the 9th July 1861, advertised for the loan of 6000 dollars on bottomry of the ship, freight and cargo; tenders to be sent in to the Hamburg consuls. The only tender made was by a merchant named Bartolomei Lange, which tender was accordingly accepted.

The total sum required by the master for defraying his average expenses, that is to say, not only the expenses of repairing the ship, but other port expenses, and the expenses of discharging, warehousing, and reshipping cargo, amounted to 7592 dollars 88 cents, or 1615*l.*, which sum was advanced by Bartolomei Lange, and duly applied by Paulsen and Co. to the purposes aforesaid, the accounts having been previously certified by the consul.

On the 24th July 1861 a bottomry bond for that amount upon ship, freight and cargo, made payable with a maritime premium of 33*½* per centum ten days after the arrival of the ship in Liverpool, was executed by the master in the presence of the consul. The amount of the bond, with interest, was 2154*l.*

The ship then sailed on her voyage, and arrived at Liverpool with her cargo on the 13th Aug.

1861. Upon the bond becoming due, the present cause was instituted by the app., to whom the bond had been indorsed.

The ship was sold by order of the court, upon the 11th Dec. 1861, and fetched the gross sum of 860*l.*

The freight due upon the cargo amounted to 201*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.* The cargo was valued on arrival at Liverpool at the sum of 893*l.*, and was delivered to the resp. on bail being given to that amount. The total value of the property hypothecated was thus at Liverpool, and upon the conclusion of the voyage, 1656*l.* 12*s.* 10*d.*

Mitford and V. Lushington, for the app., contended that the bond was valid. The small amount realised on a forced sale was no test of the disproportion at the time the bond was executed; and the fact was that the value of the ship and cargo seemed to be adequate. As regards the duty of communicating with the owners of the cargo, there was no such duty imposed by the law of Hamburg, or by the British law. The case of the Bonaparte, 8 Mor. P. C. 459, did not lay down the rule that in all cases the owner must be communicated with; but at the utmost only applied such a rule where there was considerable interval between the time of arrival at the port of distress and the time of commencing the repairs. Here there was no such interval. The master is the representative of the owner of the ship, but has no relation to the owners of cargo, of whom he may know nothing, and he is seldom in possession of their address. To endeavour to find them out and communicate would be in general needless waste of time:

The Gratiot, 3 Rob. 241;

The Vibula, 1 W. Rob. 10;

The Olivier, 1 Lush. 487.

If the cargo is hypothecated for ship's expenses, the owners of the cargo may recover from the shipowner: (Duncan v. Benson, 1 Ex. 587; 3 Ex. 644.) And there are few occasions in which there is any actual duty of the master to communicate with the owners of cargo. Moreover the lender on bottomry has no opportunity of informing himself if the master has communicated with the owners of cargo. In the circumstances of this case the master was not bound to communicate with the owners of cargo; nor was he bound to tranship the goods. His duty having been, therefore, performed properly, the bond was valid.

The Queen's Advocate (Phillimore) and Dr. Tristram, for the resp., contended that the master was only the agent of the owners of cargo in cases where the act was for their benefit, and there was no opportunity of communicating with them, as that in the circumstances the master ought to have transhipped the goods or unshipped them at St. Thomas and awaited further orders.

Car. ad. val.

Sir J. T. Coleridge.—This was an appeal from the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty, which has been pronounced for the invalidity of a bottomry bond, in so far as it applied to the cargo of the ship Hamburg; and the question arose under the following circumstances: The Hamburg was a schooner of 515 Hamburg commercial lasts. She was proceeding from Nicaragua to Liverpool with a cargo of Brazil wood, gum, indigo and India-rubber; and on the 26th April 1861 she put into St. Thomas for the purpose of repairing the damage she had sustained on the voyage. On the 9th July the master advertised for tenders for a loan to defray the expenses incurred for the repairs, landing and reshipping the cargo, and on the 24th July 1861 executed the bottomry bond in question, whereby he hypothecated the ship, freight and cargo for the sum of 7592 dollars, with a maritime interest of 33*½* per cent., the total amount of the bond in English money being 2154*l.* The ship arrived at Liverpool on the 13th Aug. 1861; in September proceedings were commenced on the bond; as to the ship and freight no defence was offered, and the bondholder became entitled to the proceeds of these, amounting to 704*l.* 17*s.* This left a deficiency of 1449*l.* 3*s.*, for which it was sought to make the cargo responsible, and that was sold for 895*l.* This sum was the matter in contest; the learned judge decided against the claim, and the decision is now appealed against. Two objections were made in the court below to the claim of the bondholder, and were relied on in the argument on the appeal. It was urged, in the first place, that, looking to the small value of the ship, even when repaired, together with the freight, the master was not justified in incurring expenses which led to the necessity of borrowing so large a sum, but ought to have transhipped the cargo. In the second place, it was contended that, considering the circumstances just stated, and some which will presently be added, it was, at all events, the duty of the master, before he incurred these expenses and signed a bond which was to bind the cargo, to communicate, or at least attempt to communicate, with the owners of the cargo in England, and to have waited at least a reasonable time for their instructions. The facts now to be stated, which in some measure apply to both objections, but principally to the last, are these. The cargo consisted, as has been stated, of Brazil wood, gum, indigo and india-rubber—articles not of rapidly perishable nature. It was consigned in different proportions to three separate houses in London, and their Lordships are not prepared to differ from the learned judge's opinion that the master, if he were ignorant of the addresses of these firms, had the means at St. Thomas of ascertaining them, or one or more of them, or of procuring a letter to be forwarded to one or more of them. The means of postal communication between St. Thomas and England are fortnightly; the Hamburg arrived at St. Thomas on the 25th April, and the bond was executed on the 24th July. Mail steamers left St. Thomas for England on the 29th April, 14th and 29th May, 18th and 29th June and 15th July, and mails for St. Thomas from London were made up on the 2nd and 17th of each of the months of May, June and July. Had the master, even if he passed over the mail of the 29th April, written by that of the 14th May (which for anything that appears he certainly might have done), he would probably have had an answer by the mail which left England on the 13th June, and might have been expected to arrive at the latter end of that month, and it appears that the negotiation for the bottomry loan did not commence until the 11th July. It may be added, that although the master's conduct is severely reflected on as unauthorised and wanting in good sense and consideration, no fraud or collusion is imputed to him; indeed, he seems to have acted under advice which, by the law of his country, he deemed himself bound to be governed by—a circumstance not entirely without significance as a fact, although their Lordships entirely agree with the learned judge of the Admiralty that the case is to be decided by the general maritime law, as administered in England. Lastly, no fraud is imputed to the lender of the money on the bond. Upon this statement of facts their Lordships have to consider the propriety of the judgment. The first objection was disposed of by the learned judge very shortly and without difficulty, and, as their Lordships think, quite correctly. The master was certainly not bound to tranship his cargo; indeed, his first duty was to carry his cargo to its destination in the same bottom, unless under the greatest difficulty. The learned judge rightly thought that the true force of this objection was not as an independent one, but that the circumstances on which it was rested might have their weight in the consideration of the second, on which indeed the judgment itself and the argument on the appeal mainly turned. This brings their Lordships to the consideration of that objection, and it is impossible for them not to perceive that in dealing with it in the court below it has been considered that it derived whatever weight it was entitled to from the decision of this committee in the case of the Buonaparte, 8 Moore P. C. 459, which it was supposed had introduced a new rule of decision into this branch of maritime law. Whether this supposition be correct or not, undoubtedly if in itself that decision was both rightly understood below and also rightly applied to the circumstances of this case, the learned judge could only determine the case before him as he has done. The important sentence in that judgment is to be found at p. 473, and is as follows: "That it is an universal rule that the master, if in a state of distress or pressure, before hypothecating the cargo must communicate, or endeavour to communicate, with the owner of the cargo has not been alleged, and is a position that could not be maintained, but it may safely, both on authority and on principle, be said that in general it is his duty to do so, or it is his duty in general to attempt to do so." This sentence is followed by one which in the report is printed as follows: "If, according to the circumstances in which he is placed, it is reasonable that he should, it was rational to expect that he might obtain an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case; it must be taken therefore upon authority and principle that it is the duty of the master to do so, or at least to make the attempt." This passage is obviously inaccurate. The judgment was not written, but appears to have been printed from a shorthand writer's note. It is not, however, difficult to collect what really was said by the learned judge, and with a slight correction of the text it would stand thus: "If according to the circumstances in which he is placed it be reasonable that he should, if it be rational to expect that he may obtain an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case, then it must be taken upon authority and principle that it is the duty of the master to do so, or at least to make the attempt." That this is the true wording of the passage we have ascertained by communicating with Knight Bruce, L. J., who delivered the judgment. It is a most important passage, and the complement and explanation of what goes before. The preceding sentence states that it is the duty of the master in certain circumstances to make or attempt to make the communication, and this sentence explains what the circumstances are in which this duty is imposed upon him. It shows what the learned judge understood by the expression "in general," if such words were used by him. The reporter has accurately stated in his marginal note the general rule established by the decision, though he has unfortunately omitted to correct the press in that portion of the judgment in which it is expressed. In the rule thus enunciated their Lordships are unable to discern any novelty either in the principle on which it rests, or in its application to the case of the hypothecation of the cargo of a ship by the master. The character of agent for the owners of the cargo is imposed upon the master by the necessity of the case and by that alone. In the circumstances supposed something must be done, and there is nobody present who has authority to decide what shall be done. The master is invested by presumption of law with authority to give directions on this ground, that the owners have no means of expressing their wishes. But when such means exist, when commu-

india-rubber, indigo and turtle shell. The master having signed bills of lading, sailed with the vessel so laden for Liverpool.

After leaving Grey Town the Hamburg met with severe weather and suffered considerable damage, and on the 25th April 1861 was forced to put into the island of St. Thomas to repair.

The master immediately reported himself to the Hamburg consul, and in all the subsequent transactions relating to the ship, surveying, ordering repairs and final execution of the bond, acted, as he was bound by the law of Hamburg to do, under the express directions and with the public official sanction of the said consul.

On the day of the vessel's arrival (25th April 1861) the consul appointed three surveyors, who, after surveying, reported the same day, recommending the cargo to be discharged forthwith, in order to examine the extent of the damages the vessel had suffered.

The cargo was accordingly discharged and warehoused, and on the 6th May 1861 a further survey was ordered by the consul to be held, to report what was best to be done for the interests of all concerned.

A survey was accordingly held, and in a report, dated 6th May 1861, the surveyors recommended extensive repairs to be done to the ship to fit her to complete the voyage, estimating such repairs at 4630 Spanish dollars (or 1026*l.* sterling), "not including extra work that might be necessary after repairs had commenced."

On the same day, the 6th May 1861, the surveyors reported the value of the vessel, with all her tackle and apparel, in her then state, to be 2000 dollars (or 425*l.*), and no more.

Upon his arrival at St. Thomas, the master had applied to the firm of Z. T. Levy and Co. to take charge of the vessel, and furnish him with the money required for the repairs and other necessary expenses of the ship, but that firm declined so to do, and the master thereupon appointed the firm of Paulsen and Co. agents for the vessel.

In pursuance of the survey, dated 6th May 1861, and with the sanction of the consul, the repairs recommended were set in hand immediately. They were not completed till the 5th July 1861.

The master thereupon again applied to the firm of Z. T. Levy and Co. to advance him money for the repairs, upon bills to be drawn upon the owners of the ship, but they again declined to assist him. The master also made a similar application to other houses, but to no result.

Being thus without funds or credit, the master then, by the direction of the consul, on the 9th July 1861, advertised for the loan of 6000 dollars on bottomry of the ship, freight and cargo; tenders to be sent in to the Hamburg consulate. The only tender made was by a merchant named Bartolomei Lange, which tender was accordingly accepted.

The total sum required by the master for defraying his average expenses, that is to say, not only the expenses of repairing the ship, but other port expenses, and the expenses of discharging, warehousing, and reshipping cargo, amounted to 7592 dollars 88 cents, or 1615*l.*, which sum was advanced by Bartolomei Lange, and duly applied by Paulsen and Co. to the purpose aforesaid, the accounts having been previously certified by the consul.

On the 24th July 1861 a bottomry bond for that amount upon ship, freight and cargo, made payable with a maritime premium of 33*½* per centum ten days after the arrival of the ship in Liverpool, was executed by the master in the presence of the consul. The amount of the bond, with interest, was 2154*l.*

The ship then sailed on her voyage, and arrived in Liverpool with her cargo on the 18th Aug.

1861. Upon the bond becoming due, the present cause was instituted by the app., to whom the bond had been indorsed.

The ship was sold by order of the court, upon the 11th Dec. 1861, and fetched the gross sum of 560*l.*

The freight due upon the cargo amounted to 201*½* 12*s.* 10*d.* The cargo was valued on arrival in Liverpool at the sum of 893*l.*, and was delivered to the resps. on bail being given to that amount. The total value of the property hypothecated was thus at Liverpool, and upon the conclusion of the voyage, 1656*½* 12*s.* 10*d.*

Milward and V. Lambington, for the app., contended that the bond was valid. The small amount realised on a forced sale was no test of the disproportion at the time the bond was executed; and the fact was that the value of the ship and cargo seemed to be adequate. As regards the duty of communicating with the owners of the cargo, there was no such duty imposed by the law of Hamburg, or by the British law. The case of the Buenaparte, 8 Moo P. C. 469, did not lay down the rule that in all cases the owner must be communicated with; but at the utmost only applied such a rule where there was a considerable interval between the time of arrival in the port of distress and the time of commencing the repairs. Here there was no such interval. The master is the representative of the owner of the ship, but has no relation to the owners of cargo, of whom he may know nothing, and he is seldom in possession of their address. To endeavour to find them out and communicate would be in general a needless waste of time:

The Gratitudine, 8 Rob. 241;

The Vibilia, 1 W. Rob. 10;

The Olivier, 1 Lush. 487.

If the cargo is hypothecated for ship's expenses, the owners of the cargo may recover from the shipowner: (Lancaster v. Benson, 1 Ex 587; 3 Ex 644.) And there are few occasions in which there is any actual duty of the master to communicate with the owners of cargo. Moreover the lender on bottomry has no opportunity of in forming himself if the master has communicated with the owners of cargo. In the circumstance of this case the master was not bound to communicate with the owners of cargo; nor was he bound to tranship the goods. His duty having been, therefore, performed properly, the bond was valid.

The Queen's Advocate (Phillimore) and Dr. Tristram, for the resps., contended that the master was only the agent of the owners of cargo in case where the act was for their benefit, and there was no opportunity of communicating with them, and that in the circumstances the master ought to have transhipped the goods or unshipped them at St. Thomas and awaited further orders.

Cor. adv. vult.

Sir J. T. Coleridge.—This was an appeal from the judgment of the High Court of Admiralty, which has been pronounced for the invalidity of a bottomry bond, in so far as it applied to the cargo of the ship Hamburg; and the question arose under the following circumstances: The Hamburg was a schooner of 51*t.* Hamburg commercial lasta. She was proceeding from Nicaragua to Liverpool with a cargo of Brazil wood, gum, indigo and india-rubber; and on the 25th April 1861 she put into St. Thomas for the purpose of repairing the damage she had sustained on the voyage. On the 9th July the master advertised for tenders for a loan to defray the expenses incurred for the repairs, landing and reshipping the cargo and on the 24th July 1861 executed the bottomry bond in question, whereby he hypothecated the ship, freight and cargo for the sum of 7592 dollars, with a maritime interest of 33*½* per cent., the total amount of the bond in English money being 2164*l.* The ship arrived at Liverpool on the 13th Aug. 1861; in September proceedings were commenced on the bond; as to the ship and freight no defence was offered, and the bondholder became entitled to the proceeds of these, amounting to 704*l.* 17*s.* This left a deficiency of 1449*l.* 3*s.*, for which it was sought to make the cargo responsible, and that was sold for 895*l.* This sum was the matter in contest; the learned judge decided against the claim, and the decision is now appealed against. Two objections were made in the court below to the claim of the bondholder, and were relied on in the argument on the appeal. It was urged, in the first place, that, looking to the small value of the ship, even when repaired, together with the freight, the master was not justified in incurring expenses which led to the necessity of borrowing so large a sum, but ought to have transhipped the cargo. In the second place, it was contended that, considering the circumstances just stated, and some which will presently be added, it was, at all events, the duty of the master, before he incurred these expenses and signed a bond which was to bind the cargo, to communicate, or at least attempt to communicate, with the owners of the cargo in England, and to have waited at least a reasonable time for their instructions. The facts now to be stated, which in some measure apply to both objections, but principally to the last, are these. The cargo consisted, as has been stated, of Brazil wood, gum, indigo and india-rubber—articles not of rapidly perishable nature. It was consigned in different proportions to three separate houses in London, and their Lordships are not prepared to differ from the learned judge's opinion that the master, if he were ignorant of the addresses of these firms, had the means at St. Thomas of ascertaining them, or one or more of them, or of procuring a letter to be forwarded to one or more of them. The means of postal communication between St. Thomas and England are fortnightly; the Hamburg arrived at St. Thomas on the 25th April, and the bond was executed on the 24th July. Mail steamers left St. Thomas for England on the 29th April, 14th and 29th May, 13th and 29th June and 15th July, and mails for St. Thomas from London were made up on the 2nd and 17th of each of the months of May, June and July. Had the master, even if he passed over the mail of the 29th April, written by that of the 14th May (which for anything that appears he certainly might have done), he would probably have had an answer by the mail which left England on the 13th June, and might have been expected to arrive at the latter end of that month, and it appears that the negotiation for the bottomry loan did not commence until the 11th July. It may be added, that although the master's conduct is severely reflected on as unauthorised and wanting in good sense and consideration, no fraud or collusion is imputed to him; indeed, he seems to have acted under advice which, by the law of his country, he deemed himself bound to be governed by—a circumstance not entirely without significance as a fact, although their Lordships entirely agree with the learned judge of the Admiralty that the case is to be decided by the general maritime law, as administered in England. Lastly, no fraud is imputed to the lender of the money on the bond. Upon this statement of facts their Lordships have to consider the propriety of the judgment. The first objection was disposed of by the learned judge very shortly and without difficulty, and, as their Lordships think, quite correctly. The master was certainly not bound to tranship his cargo; indeed, his first duty was to carry his cargo to its destination in the same bottom, unless under the greatest difficulty. The learned judge rightly thought that the true force of this objection was not as an independent one, but that the circumstances on which it was rested might have their weight in the consideration of the second, on which indeed the judgment itself and the argument on the appeal mainly turned. This brings their Lordships to the consideration of that objection, and it is impossible for them not to perceive that in dealing with it in the court below it has been considered that it derived whatever weight it was entitled to from the decision of this committee in the case of the Buonaparte, 8 Moore P. C. 459, which it was supposed had introduced a new rule of decision into this branch of maritime law. Whether this supposition be correct or not, undoubtedly if in itself that decision was both rightly understood below and also rightly applied to the circumstances of this case, the learned judge could only determine the case before him as he has done. The important sentence in that judgment is to be found at p. 473, and is as follows: "That it is an universal rule that the master, if in a state of distress or pressure, before hypothecating the cargo must communicate, or endeavour to communicate, with the owner of the cargo has not been alleged, and is a position that could not be maintained, but it may safely, both on authority and on principle, be said that in general it is his duty to do so, or it is his duty in general to attempt to do so." This sentence is followed by one which in the report is printed as follows: "If, according to the circumstances in which he is placed, it is reasonable that he should, it was rational to expect that he might obtain an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case; it must be taken therefore upon authority and principle that it is the duty of the master to do so, or at least to make the attempt." This passage is obviously inaccurate. The judgment was not written, but appears to have been printed from a shorthand writer's note. It is not, however, difficult to collect what really was said by the learned judge, and with a slight correction of the text it would stand thus: "If according to the circumstances in which he is placed it be reasonable that he should, if it be rational to expect that he may obtain an answer within a time not inconvenient with reference to the circumstances of the case, then it must be taken upon authority and principle that it is the duty of the master to do so, or at least to make the attempt." That this is the true wording of the passage we have ascertained by communicating with Knight Bruce, L. J., who delivered the judgment. It is a most important passage, and the complement and explanation of what goes before. The preceding sentence states that it is the duty of the master in certain circumstances to make or attempt to make the communication, and this sentence explains what the circumstances are in which this duty is imposed upon him. It shows what the learned judge understood by the expression "in general," if such words were used by him. The reporter has accurately stated in his marginal note the general rule established by the decision, though he has unfortunately omitted to correct the press in that portion of the judgment in which it is expressed. In the rule thus enunciated their Lordships are unable to discern any novelty either in the principle on which it rests, or in its application to the case of the hypothecation of the cargo of a ship by the master. The character of agent for the owners of the cargo is imposed upon the master by the necessity of the case and by that alone. In the circumstances supposed something must be done, and there is nobody present who has authority to decide what shall be done. The master is invested by presumption of law with authority to give directions on this ground, that the owners have no means of expressing their wishes. But when such means exist, when communication can be made to the owners, and they can give their own orders, the character of agent is not imposed upon the master, because the necessity which creates it does not arise. It is clear that the rule as to communication must be either that in no case and under no circumstances it is incumbent on him so to do; either the universal negative, or the particular affirmative proposition must hold, and both cannot be true, although one must be. But it has not been contended, and cannot reasonably be argued, that the first proposition is true. Where the cargo belongs to a single individual known to the master, the ship in a port in the same country, or near to it, in which that owner is resident, the means of communication sure and speedy, the probable delay inconsiderable, the cargo not of a perishable kind, the money to be borrowed so large as to be sure to bring it within the operation of the bond, it could not be contended that the master could properly hypothecate it for the repairs of the vessel without first communicating with the owner. Equally clear it is, that where all these circumstances were reversed no such duty would be incumbent on him. But if the first proposition be false and the latter true, what is, in effect, the practical conclusion but that the question whether a master must communicate or not is one which can only be decided by the circumstances in each particular case? And this, which certainly seems consistent with the principle on which, as we have already observed, the maritime law makes the master under certain circumstances an agent for the owner in respect of the cargo, their Lordships believe to have been recognised by Lord Stowell in the case of the Gratitude. This was not the precise point for decision in that case; but no one can read that admirable judgment attentively without perceiving that the duty of communication with the owner of the cargo before hypothecation under circumstances and dependent on circumstances, was familiar to the mind of the great judge who decided it. Thus in the Gratitude, 3 Ch. Rob. 259: "There are other cases also in point in which the master has the same authority forced on him. Suppose the case of a ship driven into port with a perishable cargo, where the master could hold no correspondence with the proprietor; suppose the vessel unable to proceed or to stand in need of repairs to enable her to proceed." Again, p. 261: "Suppose the cargo to be not instantly perishable, but that it can await the repair of the ship: what is the master to do in the situation before described, being a stranger in a foreign port in a state of distress without an opportunity of communication with the owners or their agent—what is his duty under such circumstances?" Again, p. 262: "It cannot be said that he is in all cases to wait till he hears from a distant country. The repairs may be immediately necessary; it may be hoped that the repairs will be far advanced before he can hear from the consignees. The master may not know the proprietors at all, but only the consignees; they may be mere consignees, and have no power to direct him but in the single case of an actual delivery to them; if owners, they may be very numerous, for in a carrier ship there may be a hundred owners of the cargo, and the master may be in danger of receiving a hundred different opinions, supposing it were possible for him to apply to all; what does the necessity of such a case offer to be done?" Again (p. 266), he answers an extreme case put at the bar of a valuable ship with a cargo of a considerable value belonging to Dover, being in distress at Calais, and says: "Undoubtedly the master should use his utmost endeavours to correspond with the consignees or proprietors; but a case of instant necessity might occur even so near; the master might not be able to receive their directions: all communication might be interrupted, as it is sometimes for a fortnight or three weeks." That the rule laid down in the case of the Buonaparte was properly applied in that case no person who attends to the facts can entertain a doubt. There may be more doubt in the present case; but the learned judge has examined the evidence with great care, and appears to us to have arrived at a right conclusion. As to the supposed convenience of the rule, their Lordships do not for that the lender of the money is the party interested in the event of the suit, and not the master. There is no hardship in requiring from one who is about to advance a large sum of money under such circumstances, that he should inquire of the master whether he has communicated, or made an attempt to communicate, with the owners the circumstances of his distress, and what he purposes to do in regard to their goods. And it must be remembered, on the other hand, that the owners of the goods are equally interested; and unless communicated with, have the same means of protecting their own interests which the lender undoubtedly has. If it be so that a decision in their favour will tend to increase the difficulty of procuring loans in foreign ports for the repair of vessels in distress, it may also be said on the other hand, that it will tend very much to the benefit of commerce in general to discourage improvident or fraudulent advances. Their Lordships will humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed with costs.

Marine policy of insurance—Average loss.

A policy of marine insurance contained these words: "Free from average or claim arising from jettison or leakage, unless consequent upon stranding, sinking, or fire."

Held, the cargo having suffered an average loss arising from jettison or fire, that the above words "arising from jettison or leakage," qualify the words "average and claim."

This was a special case, stated upon a verdict for the plt. in an action upon a marine policy of insurance upon a cargo of guano, from Montevideo to a port in the United Kingdom, the policy being "free from average or claim arising from jettison or leakage, unless consequent upon stranding, sinking, or fire." In this case the cargo had suffered an average loss not arising from jettison or leakage, for which the action was brought.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the parties are entitled to recover, though it is doubtful whether the parties really meant by the language which they have used. I have no doubt, however, that the object was to prevent disputes arising with respect to this particular description of commodity, which was coming over in large quantities, and liable to deterioration by contact with sea water. But strange as it may seem, in endeavouring to obviate the necessity for litigation, they have just led to it. If there had been any punctuation, a couple of commas would have made the meaning of the parties perfectly clear; but in these instruments all punctuation is deemed superfluous. In the absence, therefore, his assistance, there is, I think, great force in the argument which has been pressed upon us, that if the construction contended for by the defts. were the owner, the words "or claim arising from jettison or leakage," would be perfectly superfluous as being synonymous with the word "average." I think, therefore, that the true way of reading it is, "from loss average or claim arising from jettison or leakage;" so as to make "average or claim" refer to "jettison or leakage;" and that the word "claim" was put in to enlarge the word "average" in case there might be any claim which the parties might sink not to fall within the term "average."

TAYLOR v. DEWAR.

Marine insurance—Non-liability of insurer for damages for loss of life by negligent collision.

*In marine policy of insurance there was a clause as follows: "In case the vessel shall by accident or negligence of the master and crew run down or damage any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall thereby become liable to pay and shall pay as damages any sum not exceeding the value of the said vessel and her freight, . . . the assured, shall and will bear and pay such proportion of three-fourth parts of the sum so paid as amount as the sum of 4000*l.* hereby assured bears to the value of the said vessel Rosen and her freight."*

Did the liability of the insurer under this clause extend to damages paid by the assured in respect of loss of life or personal injury arising from collision through negligence.

This was a demurrer to a declaration.

The declaration was upon a policy of marine insurance effected with the defts. upon the hull and furniture of a ship called the Rosen, which policy contained a clause as follows: "And we, the assured, do further covenant and agree that in case the said vessel shall by accident or negligence of the master or crew run down or damage any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall thereby become liable to pay and shall pay as damages any sum or sums not exceeding the value of the said vessel the Rosen, and her freight, by or in pursuance of any judgment of any court of law or equity, we, the assured, shall and will bear and pay such proportion of three-fourth parts of the sum so paid as aforesaid as the sum of 4000*l.* hereby assured bears to the value of the said vessel Rosen and her freight." The declaration then averred that the said vessel the Rosen ran down the Maggie and sunk her with her master and crew, and that the owner (the plt.) had to pay a sum of money to the personal representatives of the deceased master and crew, whereof he now claimed three-fourth parts under the terms of the said policy.

Mr G. Hoagman, in support of the demurrer, argued that the above clause in the policy did not cover loss by reason of money paid for personal injuries to persons on board the ship damaged, and that, in order to render the underwriters liable, the loss sought to be recovered must be attributable to the ship having run down or damaged the other ship, and that only:

Cur. adv. vult.

FEB. 22.—MELLOR, J.—This case was argued before the Lord Chief Justice, the late Mr. Justice Wightman, my brother Blackburn and myself, and the question in the case turns on the effect to be given to a clause in a policy of marine insurance, of recent introduction into such instruments, and generally known by the name of the "collision clause," the object of which is to secure the shipowner against damages which he may be compelled to pay for injury done to others by his vessel coming into collision with another, either through accident or negligence, such damage not being by the law of England, as settled by the case of De Vaux v. Salomons, 4 A. & E. 420, recoverable under a policy of insurance in the ordinary form. In the present case the clause is as follows: "In case the vessel shall by accident or negligence of the master and crew run down or damage any other ship or vessel, and the assured shall thereby become liable to pay and shall pay as damages any sum not exceeding the value of the said vessel and her freight, by or in pursuance of any judgment of any court of law or equity, the assured shall pay such proportion of three-fourths of the sum so paid, as the 4000*l.* assured bears to the value of the ship and her freight." The vessel insured under this policy, the Rosen, having come into collision with and run down another ship called the Maggie, and the master and five of the crew of the latter having been drowned, the owners of the Rosen have, by the judgment of the Court of Admiralty, been condemned to pay damages to the personal representatives of the deceased, and such damages have been paid accordingly; and the question raised by the demurrer in this case is, whether, under the clause in question, the amount thus paid can be recovered back, the controversy being, whether the provision for indemnity applies to damages paid by the assured in respect of personal injury arising from collision through negligence. We are, after much consideration, of opinion that it does not, and that our judgment should be for the defts. It was contended on the part of the plt., that the death of the deceased having been occasioned by the running down of the Maggie, through the negligence of the master and crew of the ship insured, the damages which the plt. had been condemned to pay were within the words of the clause, and must be held to be within the indemnity. But it is to be observed on the other hand, that the language of the clause is altogether silent as to personal injury. It speaks of the vessel insured, "running down or damaging any other ship or vessel," and of "the assured thereby becoming liable to pay damages." It seems to us that the more reasonable construction is to consider the damages herein referred to as limited to such damages as shall be payable in respect of the loss of or damage done to the ship run down or damaged, or possibly as extending to her freight or cargo, which for this purpose may perhaps be treated as part of herself. This view becomes very materially strengthened when it is considered that the present is a policy of marine insurance, and that hitherto policies of marine insurance have never been applied to the purpose of insurance against loss of life, or indemnity in respect of personal injury arising from perils of the seas. This being so, it appears to us more reasonable, in the absence of express agreement, to limit the general language of

Q. B.]

DAKIN v. OXLEY.

[C. B.]

the clause to those matters which have alone been the subject of marine insurance. And it is to be observed, that the clause provides not only for damage occasioned by negligence, but also for damages arising from accident; the latter provision being, probably, introduced to meet the possible case of the vessel becoming subject to a foreign jurisdiction in a country by the maritime law of which, in case of accident, the damage is to be divided. Now, it is clear, that the shipowners never could be liable for damages for loss of life or personal injury arising from accidental collision; their liability to such damages depends on the relation of master and servant between them and those whose negligence occasions the death or personal injury; and the running down or damaging the other ship is only material in so far as it may connect the death or personal injury with that negligence. By providing in the same sentence for the case of accident as well as for that of negligence, the parties would appear to have been looking to what might become payable in respect of damage to the ship, not to those on board of her, who never could have any claim in respect of injury arising from accident. There is a further circumstance deserving of notice. By the terms of the policy the liability of the underwriters is limited "to such proportion of three-fourths of the sum paid as the 4000*l.* assured bears to the value of the ship insured and her freight." Now, this must be taken to mean the actual value of the ship and freight. But, by the express provision of the 504th section of the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 104, in no case where liability is incurred in respect of loss of life or personal injury to any passenger, shall the value of any ship or freight be taken to be less than 15*l.* per register ton. The absence of any reference to this special provision in the case of damage arising in respect of loss of life or personal injury, tends strongly to show that the parties were contemplating the case of damage paid in respect of loss of, or damage to, the ship and her appurtenances, as to which the statutory enactment as to value would not apply. We regret that, in coming to this conclusion, we find ourselves in conflict with the decision of the Court of Session in the case of Coe v. Smith, Court of Sess. Cas. vol. 22, p. 956, to which our attention was called on the argument. The words in the policy in that case are not, indeed, identical with these occurring in the present, but we think they are in substance the same; and it is, therefore, with very great reluctance that we find ourselves compelled to differ from a court whose decisions, although not binding on us, are entitled to the highest consideration at our hands. But, after the best consideration we have been able to give to the case, we cannot arrive at any other conclusion than that the view taken by the Lord Ordinary in that case was the right one, namely, that on such a clause as the present, occurring in a policy of marine insurance, the liability of the insurer does not extend to damages paid by the assured in respect of loss of life or personal injury. Our judgment will therefore be for the defts.

DAKIN v. OXLEY.

Shipping—Freight—Right of shipowner to recover for freight when by reason of his negligence the cargo has been damaged.

An action was brought on a charter-party by the ship owner for freight due, to which the charterer pleaded that by the fault of the master and mariners of the vessel, and by reason of their negligence and unskillfulness in the navigation and management of the vessel on the voyage, and not otherwise, the cargo was so damaged and deteriorated in condition during the voyage, that on its arrival at the port of destination had become of less value than the amount of the freight and that thereupon the deft. abandoned the cargo to the plt. for the freight, and was thereby discharged from payment of the freight:

Held, that the plea was bad on demurrer.

Declaration.—For that by a certain charter-party in which the plt. was described as Capt. Geo. Dakin of the British good ship or vessel called the Contes it was mutually agreed by and between the plt. and the deft. that the said ship being tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, should without any delay, sail and proceed to Newport Mon., and there take on board in the usual and customary manner from the factors of the defts. full and complete cargo of coals, which was to be brought to and taken from alongside at merchant's risk and expense, not exceeding what she could reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture (including a sufficient supply of coals for ship's use during the voyage which the plt. bound himself to take on board), and being so loaded should therewith proceed to Nassau, N. P., and there deliver the same on being paid freight at an after the rate of 22*s.* 6*d.* sterling per ton of 20 cwt delivered in full of all port charges whatsoever including trimming, customary dues, lights and pilotage; the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, frosts, riots and strikes of pitmen, and all and every other damages and accidents of the sea, rivers and navigation, mines and works of whatever nature or kind soever during the said voyage always excepted. The freight to be paid on the right and true delivery of the cargo in cash at current rate of exchange, or approved bills on London, at sixty days' sight, one-half freight to be advanced on signing bills of lading by acceptance at three months less 5 per cent., for all charges seven days is to be allowed the said merchants (if the ship is not sooner dispatched) for loading, and the ship to be discharged (weather permitting) and not less than thirty tons per running days, Sunday excepted, and the defts. to have the option of keeping the ship for ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying days at 5*l.* per day; the said vessel to be addressed to the deft.'s agents at the port of discharge, paying 2 per cent. commission on amount of freight; and the plt. says that the said ship sailed and proceeded to Newport aforesaid, and there took on board a full and complete cargo of coals according to and in pursuance of the said charter-party, and being so loaded, proceeded thence with to Nassau aforesaid, and all things have happened and been done, and all conditions precedent have been performed and fulfilled, and all time have elapsed necessary to entitle the plt. to maintain this action for the breach of the charter-party in this count complained of; and, although large amount of freight, to wit, 253*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* is due to the plt. according to the said charter party, the deft. has not paid to the plt. the said amount, or any part thereof, either in cash or in bills, according to the terms of the said charter-party, but has wholly made default in so doing; and the plt. also sues the deft. for money payable by the deft. to the plt. for freight for the conveyance by the plt. for the deft. at his request of a certain cargo of coals in a certain ship, and for money found to be due from the deft. to the plt. on accounts stated between them; and the plt. claims 500*l*.

The sixth plea, which alone was material, was as follows:—

Sixthly, and for a further plea to the first and second counts of the said declaration the deft. says that the said cargo of coals in the said first count mentioned, and the said cargo of coals in the said second count mentioned, were and are one and the same cargo, and that the freight alleged to be due to the plt. according to the said charter-party and in the said first count mentioned, and the alleged freight for the conveyance by the plt. of the said cargo of coals as in the said second count mentioned, were and are one and the same freight. And the deft. says that the said cargo of coals became by the fault of the master and mariners of the said vessel, and by reason of their negligence and unskilfulness in the navigation and management of the said vessel on the said voyage, and not otherwise, so greatly damaged and deteriorated in condition during the said voyage, that on the arrival of the said cargo of coals at the said port of discharge, the same had become and were then of less value there than the amount of the said freight, and that thereupon the deft. abandoned the said cargo of coals to the plt., to wit, for the said freight, and was thereupon and thereby discharged from payment of the said freight.

Demurrer and joinder in demurrer.

Cases in support of the demurrer.—It will probably be contended that no service was done to the merchant by conveying a cargo which became of less value than the freight; but the principle on which it is sometimes possible to defend an action for work done on the ground of its turning out to be useless, is only founded on the principle of avoiding the necessity of a cross-action. This is fully explained in 1 Sm. Lead. Cas., 22. In Mondel v. Steele, 8 M. & W., Parke, B. says, that that principle does not apply to freight. Moreover, and this is conclusive to enable that principle to be applied, it must always be shown that the damages in the cross-action would at least equal the sum claimed in the principal action, and therefore the plea is bad because it does not state that by reason of the negligence of the mariners the cargo was deteriorated in an amount equal to the freight. In fact, the damage might amount to 100*l*., whilst the freight amounted to 1000*l*. The defts. however, may say that the whole of the enterprise of the merchant was frustrated by reason of the damage. Now of course the delivery of the cargo in an undamaged condition is not a condition precedent to the right of freight, or else, if one ton of coals had been negligently lost or damaged, the merchant could refuse to pay the freight and reject the whole cargo; and it is conclusively shown in Behn v. Burness, 8 L. T. Rep. N.S. 207, that whether something is or is not a condition precedent cannot depend on the happening of an event subsequent to the contract, even though that event may frustrate wholly the object for which one party entered into the contract. In fact, if the deft. had pleaded that the cargo which the plt. was only ready and willing to deliver had been damaged by the negligence of the mariners, so as not to be worth the freight, the plea would have been clearly bad, because the delivering of a cargo damaged by negligence is not and cannot become a condition

Cur. adv. vult.

WILLES, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the court.—This is an action by shipowner against charterer to recover the freight of a cargo of coal carried from Newport to Nassau. The first count is upon the charter-party. The second is the common count for freight. The deft. pleads that by the fault of the master and crew, and their negligent and unskilful navigation of the vessel, the coal was damaged, so as upon arrival at the port of discharge to be then of less value than the freight, and that he abandoned it to the shipowner. The plea, as it does not deny, admits that the cargo arrived as coal, and that it was of some value. The plt. demurs, and the question for us to consider is, whether a charterer whose cargo has been damaged by the fault of the master and crew, so as upon arrival at the port of discharge to be worth less than the freight, is entitled to excuse himself from payment of freight by abandoning the cargo to the shipowner. We think not; and we should not have taken time to consider but for the general importance of the subject, and of its having been suggested that our law was silent upon this question, and that the plea was warranted by the usage and law of other maritime countries, which it was said we ought to adopt. The principal foreign authorities upon the effect of damage to the cargo upon the right to freight are referred to in Abbott on Shipping, part 4, c. 9, pp. 324 et seq. of the 10th edition, by Serjt. Shee. The ancient and modern French laws are stated and discussed in Boulay-Paty, Cours de Droit Maritime, vol. 2, pp. 484; et seq. The Spanish law is to be found in articles 787 to 790 of the Código de Comercio, and in de Bacardi's Diccionario del Derecho Marítimo, title "Flentamento." The law of the United States is laid down in 1 Parsons on Maritime Law 172, n. The continental authorities are not altogether consistent with one another, and, in so far as they tend to sanction this plea, they seem to have been founded upon two notions: first, that the cargo is the sole and exclusive security for the freight, to which the shipowner ought to be contented to look, and by abandoning which the merchant ought to be allowed to free himself from any responsibility; and, secondly, that in the case of culpable damage the freight is forfeited. The first of these propositions was maintained by some even in the case of fortuitous damage (2 Boulay-Paty, 44 et seq.; Casaregis de Commercio, Discursus 22, p. 60, No. 46); and it has even been insisted, but unsuccessfully, that it applied to the case of undamaged goods: (Gilbert's Code de Commerce, note 3 to art. 310, p. 89 of the edition of 1854.) This doctrine, as applied to fortuitous damage, must, however, now be considered as exploded, upon the plain ground that a contract to pay for the carriage of a thing in money cannot be satisfied by a cession of the thing itself in a damaged state to the carrier against his will. With respect

DAKIN v. OXLEY.

to goods damaged by the fault of the master, it has also been laid down in general terms, in conformity with the second of the governing ideas already stated, that the master, besides being liable for the damage, shall lose his freight. This was the law of the Hanscatic League (2 Pardessus' Collection of Ancient Maritime Codes, p. 550), and of other commercial nations: (1 Casaregis de Commercio, Discursus 23, Nos. 85 to 89, p. 66.) Casaregis, besides being one of the best commercial lawyers who wrote before the introduction of the modern code, has given in his elaborate work references to the more ancient writers, and we content ourselves with referring to his summary of the law as then understood upon the continent. He was born at Genoa, in 1675, and died in 1737, after having been for twenty years a judge of the Rota of Florence. In one of the passages last referred to (No. 85), that great lawyer first states that the effect of culpable damage was to work a forfeiture of freight, "non solum tenetur navarchus ad emendationem damni ejus dolo, vel culpa mercibus obventi . . . sed mercedem sive naulum etiam prætereendere non potest." Here the doctrine of forfeiture is clearly asserted, and the same in No. 16 of the same discourse. The author then proceeds to state, that, where damage is occasioned by accident, without fault, the merchant may abandon if he thinks proper: "Adverte tamen quod si merces corruptæ vel vitiatæ fuerint ob casum fortuitum, non culpa navarchi, mercator tenebitur integrum naulum solvere, vel si ei non inter erit integrum naulum solvere poterit loco nauli merces relinquere, et ratio est quia naulum debetur propter merces." He goes on to state, upon the authority of Targa, that this only applies in favour of the consignee, and not of the charterer of the entire ship, who is bound by his contract to pay the stipulated freight upon the arrival of the goods: "Id procedit in mercatore, cui consignandæ sunt merces à navi conductæ, cesus in naulizatore totius navis, quia ille indistinctè tenetur semper naulum conventum pro tota navis locatione solvere: (Targ. Ponder. Marit. c. 84, s. per ei noli.)" Moreover, he adds, that in the case of culpable damage, it is not competent to the merchant to abandon the cargo to the shipowner and the claim of the whole value, except where the goods are reduced to a state of uselessness or nearly so; clearly showing that the right of abandonment in such a case affected the amount of damages, and not the freight. In No. 89, citing John de Hevia, a Spanish writer of repute, Casaregis expressly says: "Non autem est in electione dominorum mercium, aut recipere res deterioratas et petere damnum vel eas relinquere magistro et petere ut solvat pretium, sed illas præcisè recipere debent, et petere à magistro damnum, quod passæ fuerint, præter quam si hujusmodi damnum esset inutile quia ferè res reductæ fuerint ad inutilitatis statum, tunc enim illas relinquere poterunt et simul pretium ab eo petere, ad latè tradita: (per Hæviam de Commercio Navale, c. 12, n. 38.)" It should seem, therefore, that the notion of the cargo being the sole security in case of fortuitous damage, and that of forfeiture of freight by culpable damage, neither of which is consistent with our law of contracts, was the prevailing idea amongst those lawyers who held an abandonment to be a satisfaction of freight, and that it was not a condition in their laws that the cargo should be worth less than the freight, although practically it was only in such a case, or where he wished to get rid of a troublesome adventure, that the merchant would, with his eyes open, exercise the right to abandon. We have to add, that the law of the United States is unfavourable to this plea. Professor Parsons, in his learned work on Maritime Law, vol. 1, p. 172, lays down as the rule of those States, that, if the cargo arrives in specie, notwithstanding that it is damaged, whether fortuitously or culpably, so as to be worthless, the freight is saved, although, in case of culpable damage, set-off is allowed. This allowance of set-off, it must be observed, affects procedure only; so that we could not adopt it even in the case of a contract made where such law prevails. Indeed, in this case a set-off could not avail the deft.; for the damage is not alleged to have been equal to the freight. I ought to be borne in mind, when dealing with such cases, that the true test of the right to freight is the question whether the service in respect of which the freight was contracted to be paid has been substantially performed; and, according to the law of England, as a rule, freight is earned by the carriage and arrival of the goods ready to be delivered to the merchant, though they be in a damaged state when they arrive. If the shipowner fails to carry the goods for the merchant to the destined port, the freight is not earned. If he carry part, but not the whole, no freight is payable in respect to the part not carried, and freight is payable in respect to the part carried, unless the charter-party make the carriage of the whole a condition precedent to the earning of any freight—a case which has not within our experience arisen in practice. As to freight pro rata itineris, in respect of goods accepted and their future carriage waived, at an intermediate port, it becomes due not under the charter-party, but by a new contract, inferred from the conduct of the parties, so that we need not stop to discuss it. It was in such a case that Lord Mansfield in Luke v. Lyde, 2 Burr. 882; 1 W. Bl. 190, said that the merchant, "if he abandons, is excused freight, and he may abandon all though they are not all lost." This is correct, if instead of "abandon" be read "decline to accept," because it is clear that when the goods have not been carried all the way the merchant need not, in order to prevent a liability for freight pro rata, give up the property to the shipowner; and abandonment, in maritime law, involves a giving up of the property. Little difficulty exists in applying the above test where the cargo upon arrival is deficient in quantity. Where the cargo, without loss or destruction of any part, has become accidentally swelled (Gibson v. Sturge, 11 Ex. 622), or perhaps diminished, as by drying (Jacobson's Sea Laws, book 3, c. 2, p. 220) freight (usage of trade apart) is payable upon the quantity shipped, because that is what the contract refers to. The Spanish Code of Commerce makes a distinction between decrease and increase. Article 787 provides that the entire freight shall be due for goods which are deteriorated or diminished by accident without fault (caso fortuito) by intrinsic defect, or by the bad quality and condition of the packages. On the other hand, article 791 enacts, that if the merchandise is increased in bulk or weight by natural causes the merchant shall pay freight in proportion to the excess. In the case of an actual loss or destruction by sea damage of so much of the cargo that no substantial part of it remains; as, if sugar in mats shipped as sugar, and paying so much per ton, is washed away, so that only a few ounces remain and the mats are worthless, the question would arise whether, practically speaking, any part of the cargo contracted to be carried has arrived. Such a case seems to be within the principle of the French ordinance, and the second clause of art. 310 of the Code of Commerce, though they are both in terms confined to the case of liquids where all, or nearly all, has leaked out, so as to include molasses, but not sugar. Pothier, "Sur la Charter-partie" (4th vol. of Pothier's Works, by Bugnet, p. 404) deals with these as cases in which the thing contracted to be carried has perished before arrival. The Spanish Code of Commerce, art. 790, after enacting that the shipowner cannot be compelled to receive the cargo, whether damaged or not, in payment of the freight, arbitrarily laid down, as to liquids of which more than half has been lost, that the merchant may abandon for the freight. A reference to these provisions is enough to show that the task of finding an uniform rule in modern commercial law is at present impossible. Where the quantity remains unchanged, but by sea damage the goods have been deteriorated in quality, the question of identity arises in a different form; as, for instance, where a valuable picture has arrived as a piece of spoilt canvas, cloth in rags, or crockery in broken shreds, iron all—or almost all—rust, rice fermented, or hides rotten. In both classes of cases, whether of loss in quantity or change in quality, the proper course seems to be the same, viz., to ascertain from the terms of the contract, construed by mercantile usage, if any, what was the thing for the carriage of which freight was to be paid, and by the aid of a jury to determine whether that thing, or any and how much of it, has substantially arrived. If it has arrived, though damaged, the freight is payable by the ordinary terms of the charter-party; and the question of fortuitous damage must be settled with the underwriters, and that of culpable damage in a distinct proceeding for such damage against the ship, captain, or owner. There would be apparent justice in allowing damage of the latter sort to be set-off or deducted in an action for freight; and this is allowed in some (at least) of the United States: (1 Pursons on Merc. Law, 172, n.) But our law does not allow deduction in that form, and as at present administered, for the sake, perhaps, of speedy settlement of freight and other liquidated demands, it affords the injured party a remedy by cross-action only: (Davidson v. Gwynne, 12 East, 381; Shane v. Hall, 1 Hurl. & N. 831; Sheils, or Sheilda, v. Davies, 4 Camp. 119; 6 Taunt. 65; the judgment of Parke, B., in Mondel v. Steele, 8 M. & W. 858; The Don Francisco, 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 183, per Dr. Lushington.) It would be unjust, and almost absurd, that without regard to the comparative value of the freight and cargo when uninjured, the risk of a mercantile adventure should be thrown upon the shipowner by the accident of the value of the cargo being a little more than the freight, so that a trifling damage, much less than the freight, would reduce the value to less than the freight; whilst, if the cargo had been much more valuable, and the damage greater, or the cargo worth a little less than the freight, and the damage the same, so as to bear a greater proportion to the whole value, the freight would have been payable, and the merchant have been put to his cross-action. Yet this is the conclusion we are called upon by the deft. to affirm in his favour, involving no less than that damage, however trifling, if culpable, may work a forfeiture of the entire freight, contrary to the just rule of our law, by which each party bears the damage resulting from his own breach of contract, and no more. The case above supposed is not imaginary; for it has actually occurred on many occasions, and notably upon the cessation of war between France and England in 1748, which caused so great a fall in prices that the agreed freight in many instances exceeded the value of the goods. The merchants in France sought a remission of freight or the privilege of abandonment, but in vain: (2 Boulay-Paty, Cours de Droit Commercial, 485, 486.) It is evident enough from this review of the law that there is neither authority nor sound reason for upholding the proposed defence. The plea is naught, and there must be judgment for the plt.

Judgment for the plt.

Wednesday, Jan. 20, 1864.

THE SUBMARINE TELEGRAPH COMPANY v. DIXON.

Submarine telegraph—Liability of shipowners for damage done to the cable—Negligence.

In an action for damage done through negligence to the telegraphic cable of the plts. by reason of its being dragged and broken by an anchor from the defts.' ship, the defts. pleaded that they were aliens, and that their vessel was more than three miles from the seashore of England and out of the jurisdiction, and that in the usual and ordinary course of navigation the ship had occasion to cast anchor and afterwards got it up again, and that the anchor, without any default of the defts., and in consequence of the effect of the winds and waves upon the vessel, dragged the cable, and became entangled in it, and was necessarily a little injured; and that there was no buoy to mark the position and existence of the cable, of which the defts. were wholly ignorant: Held, that the plts. had a good cause of action, as it must be inferred that shipowners were aware of the existence of those cables, and therefore were bound to navigate their vessels with such care and skill as not to damage them.

Declaration, for damaging a submarine telegraph cable laid down within three miles from the shore.

The second count was the same as the first, only varying the distance from three to eight miles from the shore.

Demurrer and joinder to first and second counts.

Fifth plea, as to the said first count, that the cable was lying more than three miles from the seashore of England, and therefore out of the realm, that the vessel was and is a Swedish vessel, and not subject to the laws of England; and that the anchor was cast in the regular course of navigation, and that in consequence of the effect of the wind and waves upon the vessel dragged and became entangled with the part of the cable, and that on getting up the anchor it became necessary to disentangle it from the cable, and that in so doing it was necessarily a little dragged and injured; and also that there was no buoy or mark of any kind to show the spot in which the cable was lying, which was at the bottom of the sea and incapable of being seen, and the place and position and existence thereof was wholly unknown to the defts. and their servants having the management, direction, and control of the said vessel and anchor.

The ninth plea to the second count was to the same effect as the fifth plea to the first count.

A replication to this plea averred that defts. had means of knowledge of the existence of the cable, and where it lay, and it was through the carelessness, negligence and want of ordinary or any care of the defts. and their said mariners and servants that they did not know of the position and existence of the cable; that the anchor was not cast and got up in the due course of navigation, and that it was through the carelessness and mismanagement and culpable want of knowledge of the defts. that the grievance occurred.

Third replication to so much of the fifth plea as alleged the grievances to have been committed out of the realm, the plts. averred that one end of the telegraphic cable was fastened to the soil of the county of Kent, and carried thence across the seashore of the county unto and into the sea abutting thereon, and the part injured was within three marine miles of the seashore and coast of the county of Kent.

And by way of new assignment the plts. alleged that the part of the cable injured was within three miles of the shore, and that defts. were informed and had express notice of, and well knew, the position and existence of the cable, and were warned and cautioned that they would injure the same, and that they used unnecessary force in disentangling the anchor and cable.

THE SCHEMARE TELEGRAPH COMPANY v. DIXON.

There were similar replications and new assignments to the ninth plea.

Demurrer and joinder to above replications and new assignments.—And as to so much of the fifth plea as puts in issue the realm, dominion, sovereignty and jurisdiction of our Lady the Queen in and over the said high seas, and alleges that the defts. were aliens domiciled in and subject to the laws of Sweden and not to the laws of England, and that the ship was a foreign ship on a foreign voyage, and puts in issue the deft.'s liability to answer in this court in respect of the grievances in the first count mentioned, the plea say that the said fifth plea is bad in substance.

Joinder in demurrer.

There were like demurrers and joinders to the ninth plea to the second count.

Rockfort Clarke, for the pta., contended that persons using a highway were bound to use due care so as not to damage anything, and that the defts. were liable, as they had shown that they were acting negligently; and as to the question of their having no notice of the cable being there, it was a point for the jury to decide; and even if they had no notice when they cast anchor, yet they had no right to allow their anchor to drag along the bottom, and then to carelessly pull it up, and so damage the cable. Butterfield v. Forester, 11 E. 60.

Archibald (Borill and Lush, Q.C. with him) contended that the direction was bad, as it disclosed no imperative duty on the defts.; and that it is not sufficient to aver negligence unless some breach of duty is shown. He cited

Cox v. Burbidge, 32 L. J. 89, C. P.

EALK, C. J.—I am of opinion that the declaration which charges the deft. by reason of his negligence with damaging the cable of the pta. is good. I assume, for the purpose of this action, that the bottom of the sea may be used for lawful purposes as well as the surface, and the court may, I think, take judicial notice of there being submarine cables, as they are named in Acts of Parliament, and are known by every one, to be lying at the bottom of the sea. The pta., in my opinion, had a right to use the bottom of the sea, and to place cables there for the purposes of telegraphic communication, and the deft. had also a right to traverse the surface of the sea for the ordinary purposes of navigation, and to let go his anchor if the need of navigation required it. In this case the two rights happened to conflict; the pta.'s property was damaged and their right violated by the deft. breaking their cable with his anchor; but the deft. says, "I am not answerable, because I had a right to navigate my ship in the way I did, and to let go my anchor;" the pta.'s answer to which is, "You might have had that right, but you were bound to exercise that right with due care and skill, and you had no right, by your negligence, to damage my property." The whole case turns upon that word "negligence," and after this argument it seems clear to me that the deft. is liable if there was negligence; that is, if the cable would not have been broken had the deft. used due care and skill a person is bound to use due care towards who has conflicting rights, I think the dir. good, and I think the plea is good also. I cushion has been a profitable one, as it w the question clearly before the jury. T further says, "I was exercising my right of tion, and I let go my anchor, and the dan complain of was caused by your not putting and therefore I am not responsible, as I notice or knowledge of the cable being the there is no notice, a man who is navigating care and skill is not responsible, but here assignment in effect traverses the plea, and deft. had notice, and that he did not use and skill. Now it appears to me that, alth defts. acted in the lawful enjoyment of a rig have exercised that right negligently. If I used the care and skill which they were t use, the mischief would not have happened. person, knowing that another has claims wli sict with his own, carelessly forgets thei almost guilty of wilful injury. The dec therefore, in my opinion, is good, and the ninth pleas are also good. With regard to t ment that the damage arose from the y having placed a buoy over the cable, and defts., without notice, could not be respons argument cannot be admitted. If there notice, a man navigating with due care s would not be liable. But the new assign effect traverses the plea, and alleges that t no due care. If the defts. had no knowled had at least the means of knowledge; and if be taken away, the declaration and new as are good. It has been said that if the ve been damaged by the cable the owners mi been sued. If such had happened, the same would have arisen as does here; and if it t tried, the jury would be directed to say wh not the pta. had laid down buoys with t caution, in order that other persons might l means of avoiding the damage.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion think the declaration is good, as it raises stantial question in the case. With respect new assignment, I am willing to treat it as a of the pleas, although it is somewhat oppos view of what was the object of a new assign WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. matter complained of took place on the hi the pta. may support this action. A pers gating a vessel must navigate her in such that she shall not, by the negligence of h damage the property of others. So, if any mentioned in the charts of the ports whic visits as lying at the bottom of the sea, ar captain has not these charts on board, or them, does not choose to use them, he mu theless do no harm to that object. But the the persons to take these matters into consi as they are really more questions of fact t The declaration, therefore, appears to me to and so do the fifth and ninth pleas. The t fourth replications, however, are bad, as the a part of the plea which does, in our j appear to be material. But as to the nev ment, I cannot but agree with my brother that the meaning to be put upon it is s unusual.

THE CALCUTTA AND BURMAH STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY v. DE MATTOS.

DE MATTOS v. THE CALCUTTA AND BURMAH STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

Contract—Transfer of property—Bill of lading—Policy of insurance—Non-delivery of the goods.

By written contract A. agreed to supply B. with 1000 tons of coals delivered at Rangoon alongside craft, steamer, floating depot, or piers, as directed by B.'s agent there; the price to be 45s. per ton of 20 cwt., delivered at Rangoon. Payment, one-half of invoice value by bill at three months, on handing bills of lading and policies of insurance to cover the amount, or in cash under discount at the rate of 5 per cent. at A.'s option, the balance by B.'s Rangoon agent's drafts on B. in London, on completion at Rangoon:

A. accordingly shipped 1166 tons of coal, and handed the bill of lading and a policy of insurance to B., who paid half the invoice price, less discount. In consequence of foul weather, part of the coals were cast overboard, and the ship so damaged as to be unable to proceed. The captain chartered another vessel and forwarded the residue of the coals, 850 tons, to Rangoon. On the ship's arrival there, delivery of the coals was refused, unless B.'s agent paid the freight, which he declining, the coals were sold by auction, and bought by B.'s agent:

Held, per Erle, C. J., Williams and Willes, JJ., and Channell, B. (Martin and Pigott, BB. dissenting), that the property in the coals passed to B. on their shipment and handing over by A. of the bill of lading and policy of insurance to B.:

Held, further, that A. could not recover the unpaid moiety of the invoice price, as no delivery took place under the contract:

Held, lastly, (Williams, J. dissenting), that B. could not recover from A. the moiety paid, as A. had partially performed his part of the contract, and the parties could not be put in statu quo.

Error upon a judgment of the Court of Q. B. on the following

SPECIAL CASE.

The first-named action was brought by the plts. to recover damages from the deft. in respect of the non-delivery by the deft. of certain coal he had contracted to deliver to the plts.' agent at Rangoon under the circumstances hereinafter stated, and also to recover back from the deft. the sum of 1295*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, paid by the plts. to the deft. under the circumstances hereinafter set forth, with interest at 5 per cent. from the 5th July 1860.

The action secondly named was brought by the plt. to recover from the defts. the sum of 1311*l.* 15*s.*, being the balance of the contract price of the coal hereinafter mentioned, together with interest at 5 per cent. from the day when the balance ought, according to contract, to have been paid, and which he claimed to be due to him under the circumstances hereinafter set forth, or to recover the value of the 850 tons of coal bought by the company at Rangoon as hereinafter mentioned.

Both the company and De Mattos carry on business in London. In May 1860 De Mattos contracted with the company to supply them with 1000 tons of coals under the contract contained in the following letters:—

London, 1st May, 1860.

Gentlemen,—I am prepared to supply your company with 1000 tons of any of the first-class steam coals on the Admiralty list, at my option, delivered over the ship's side Rangoon, at 45*s.* per ton of 20 cwt., the same to be shipped within three months of the date of acceptance of this offer; payment of one-half of each invoice, value in cash, on handing your bills of lading and policy of insurance to cover the amount, and balance by like payment upon delivery. Whilst holding this contract, it is of course understood as customary that you do not enter into any engagement with any other parties for this port that would involve a detrimental competition. Are you open for Moulmein? Awaiting your reply, I am, &c.,

W. N. DE MATTOS.

The Calcutta, &c. Company (Limited).

W. N. De Mattos, Esq.

London, 4th May, 1860.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 1st inst., I am now authorised by the directors to accept your tender for the coals on the following terms, viz. that you supply our company with 1000 tons of first-class steam coals on the Admiralty list, the selection of the particular description to be at the company's option, delivered at Rangoon, alongside craft, steamer, floating depot, or pier, as may be directed by the company's agent of that port. The coals to be shipped in whole cargoes, or in quantities of not less than 400 tons, half the quantity, say 500 tons, to be shipped not later than 10th June proximo, and the remainder all in that month. The price to be 45*s.* per ton of 20 cwt., delivered at Rangoon, payment one-half of each invoice, value by bill at three months, on handing bills of lading and policy of insurance to cover the amount; or in cash under discount at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, at your option; and the balance in cash, at the current rate of exchange, on right delivery at Rangoon. Respecting the obligation to which you would bind our company not to enter into engagements with other parties for the shipment of coals to Rangoon, whilst you hold this contract, it can only be understood to refer to other parties in London. I shall be obliged by your letting me know as soon as possible if you agree to the above terms.—I am, &c.,

CHARLES REINER, Officiating Secretary.

London, 5th May, 1860.

Chas. Reiner, Esq., Officiating Secretary.

Sir,—With reference to your letter of the 4th inst., I note and confirm its contents, with the following exceptions:—First, that the selection of coals under my contract with your company be at my option, I always, insuring that the same be upon the Admiralty list. Secondly, that I will undertake the shipment of the whole quantity, viz. 1000 tons, by the 30th June, but cannot bind myself to 500 tons by the 10th June; but, of course, my best endeavours will be to ship some as much earlier than these dates as possible. Thirdly, that the payment of the balance of each invoice value, be made by your Rangoon agent's draft upon your company here at thirty days' sight, on completion of delivery of each cargo respectively. Fourthly, as regards fresh contracts for Rangoon during the time mine is in course of fulfilment, it is to be agreed between us that I am to have, at any rate, the refusal of any contract for coal supplies for that part during the said time.—I am, &c.

W. N. DE MATTOS.

London, 7th May 1860.

Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 5th inst., I have to inform you that the directors insist on retaining at the company's option the selection of coals obtainable at whatever port you may load the vessels. As regards fresh contracts, the only restriction to which the directors will consent is, that they will not enter into any fresh engagements with other parties in London during the time that you hold the contract. Unless, therefore, you are prepared to meet the views of the directors as to these two conditions, the negotiations must be broken off. An early reply will oblige yours, &c.,

CHARLES REINER, Officiating Secretary.

London, 7th May 1860.

Calcutta and Burmah Steam Navigation Company (Limited).

Gentlemen,—With reference to your letter of to-day's date, I hereby agree to contract for 1000 tons of coals for shipment to Rangoon upon the amended conditions contained in that letter. I will ship part, if possible by the 10th June, but I engage that the whole quantity shall be shipped by the 30th June next.—I am, &c.,

W. N. DE MATTOS.

De Mattos, for the purpose of carrying out his contract, chartered the ship Waban for Rangoon, but without the company being a party to the charter, and shipped on board thereof, in pursuance and upon the terms of his said contract, 1166 tons of coals and delivered to the company a bill of lading thereof, of which the following is a copy:—

"Shipped, in good order and well conditioned, by W. N. De Mattos, in and upon the good ship called the Waban, whereof is master for this present voyage S. A. Hartridge, and now riding at anchor in the port of Cardiff, and bound for Rangoon, 1166 tons of Swgbareven Merthyr steam coal which are to be delivered in the like good order and condition alongside any craft, steamer, floating depôt, wharf, or pier where the ship can be afloat at the aforesaid port of Rangoon, as the agent of the charterer may direct (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and navigation of whatsoever nature and kind soever excepted) unto the agent of the Calcutta and Burmah Steam Navigation Company, or to his assigns. The ship to be discharged in regular turn at the rate of not less than 30 tons per working day (weather permitting), and when required by the charterer's agent, such extra quantity as may be practicable, and if not discharged in the time above specified, demurrage to be paid at the rate of 4*d.* per ton register per diem. Freight for the said goods to be paid by the charterer, as per charter-party, with average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affirmed to five bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the one of which bills being accomplished, the others to stand void.—Dated in Cardiff, 29th June 1860.

"Weight unknown to S. A. Hartridge."

The charter-party was dated London, May 18, 1860, and was between S. A. Hartridge, master of the Waban, and De Mattos, for a full cargo of coals to be loaded at Cardiff, and to proceed to Rangoon, Moulmein, Singapore or Penang, at charterer's option, orders to be given on signing of bills of lading, or so near thereto as she may safely get and deliver the same alongside any craft, steamer, floating depôt or pier, where she can float as ordered by the consignee (the act of God, &c. mutually excepted). The freight to be paid in London, on unloading, and right delivery of the cargo at and after the rate of 40*s.* per ton of 20 cwt. on the quantity delivered in full of all port charges, pilotage, Bute dock, &c. dues, and such freight is to be paid, say one quarter at freighter's acceptance at three months, and one quarter by like acceptances at six months, from the final sailing of the vessel from her last port in the United Kingdom; the same to be returned if the cargo be not delivered at the port of destination; the freighter to insure the amount and deduct the cost of so doing from the first payment of the freight, and the remainder by a bill at three months from the date of delivery, at the freighter's office in London, of the certificate of the right delivery of the cargo agreeably to the bills of lading, less cost of coals or fuel short delivered, or in cash under discount at 5 per cent. per annum, at freighter's option. The vessel to be addressed to the freighter's agent abroad free of commission, paying 2 per cent. to freighter in London, to Pilkington Brothers, to whom commission of 5 per cent. on this contract is due, ship lost or not lost; 300*l.* to be advanced in cash at port of discharge on account of this freight, upon customary terms, against captain's draft on freighter at ninety days'sight. The ship and her freight are bound to this venture.

De Mattos also effected an insurance for the sum of 1400*l.* and handed the policy of insurance with the bills of lading to the company in pursuance of the contract. The policy was sent by De Mattos to the company with the following letter:

Waban. 5th July 1860.

Dear Sir,—Herewith I hand you Ocean Marine policy for 1400*l.* for this ship as collateral security against the amount payable by you on account of the invoice order, say 1311*l.* 15*s.*, receipt of which please own.—Yours truly,

W. N. DE MATTOS.

C. Reiner, Esq., Calcutta and Burmah S. N. Co.

This was acknowledged by their secretary the same day, as follows:

5th July 1860.

Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of this day's date with a policy of insurance for 1400*l.* on the cargo of coals per Waban to be held as collateral security for the payment to you of 1311*l.* 15*s.* on account of the invoice of that shipment.—Yours faithfully,

W. N. De Mattos.

CHARLES REINER, Officiating Secretary.

The policy was, in so far as any question in this case is involved, as follows:—

"And touching the adventures or perils of the seas, men-of-war, fire, pirates, rovers, thieves, jettisons, letters of marque, counter-marque, surprisals, takings at sea, arrests, restraints, and detainers of all kings, princes and people of what nation soever, barratry of the master and mariners, and of all other perils, losses and misfortunes that have or shall come to the hurt, detriment, or damage to the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof, and in case of any loss or misfortune I shall be lawful to the insured, their factors, servants and assigns, to sue, labour and travail in and about the defence, safeguard and recovery of the aforesaid subject-matter of this insurance, or any part thereof, without prejudice to this insurance the charges whereof the insurers shall bear in proportion to the sum hereby insured. And it is declared and agreed that corn, fish, fruit, flour and seed shall be warranted free from average unless general, or the ship be stranded, and that sugar tobacco, hemp, flax, hides and skins shall be warranted free from average under 5*l.*, that all other goods, also the ship and freight, shall be and are warranted free from average under 3*l.* per cent unless general, or the ship be stranded."

The invoice value of the coals amounted to 2623*l.* 10*s.*, and the company on the 5th July 1860 paid to De Mattos on account of the said coals the sum of 1295*l.* 11*s.* 7*d.*, being one-half the invoice value of the coals, less discount for cash paid to De Mattos by the company, De Mattos having exercised his option of being paid the same in cash less discount.

The ship Waban sailed on her voyage on the 8th July 1860. On the 13th Sept. 1860 the ship whilst on her voyage, began to experience very heavy weather, which continued down to the 18th on which day the ship gave a heavy lurch, which caused the cargo to shift, and it became necessary for the preservation of the ship and the crew to throw overboard a part of the coals, and accordingly a part, but no more than was necessary for the purpose, was thrown overboard. The ship, though leaking badly, continued on her voyage till the 22nd Oct. 1860, when the weather continuing very tempestuous, the ship still leaking, and the crew being worn out and disabled, it became necessary for the preservation of the ship, her cargo and her crew, to deviate from the voyage and to proceed to the island of Mauritius, and the ship arrived at Port Louis in that island on the 4th Nov. 1860.

On the 5th Nov. 1860 the ship was properly surveyed at that port, and on the 3rd Dec. 1860 a second survey was held, when it was found that the ship was wholly unseaworthy, that the necessary repairs could not be done at Port Louis, and that the ship could not, consequently, complete her voyage. The remainder of her cargo was, consequently, discharged, and the master of the ship Waban reshipped 850 tons of the coals, being a portion of the Waban's cargo, on board the United States ship Alfred Lamont, then lying at Port Louis.

The following is the bill of lading signed by the master of the Alfred Lamont:—

"Shipped in good order and well conditioned, by S. A. Hartridge, master ship Waban, in and upon the good ship called the Alfred Lamont, whereof I am master for this present voyage William D. Anderson, now riding at anchor in the harbour of Port Louis, and bound for Rangoon, 850 tons of Cardiff steam coals, more or less, not accountable for weight; all on board to be delivered, being marked and numbered as in the margin, and are to be delivered in the like good order and well conditioned at the aforesaid port of Rangoon, the act of God the Queen's enemies, fire and all every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers and navigations of whatever nature and kind soever (risk of cash so far as ships are liable to excepted) unto the agents of the Calcutta and Burmah Steam Navigation Company, or to their assigns. Freight for the said goods to be paid in cash on right delivery of cargo, at 2l. 5s. per ton, with prime and average accustomed."

In the margin of this bill of lading was this stipulation: "The ship to be discharged in regular ton at the rate of not less than forty tons per day; if over that time, 10l. per day demurrage for every day; ship free from commission." The cost and expenses of discharging the coal from the Woban and reshipping 850 tons on board the Alfred Lamont amounted to 597l. 6s. The master of the Woban being unable to raise that amount in any other way, sold 222 tons of the coal, part of the Woban's cargo, at Port Louis, which realised 871l. 14s., and he drew a bill for the balance (including interest thereon), viz. for 287l. 7s. 4d., upon De Mattos, of which he advised De Mattos by letter dated the 5th Feb. 1861. The company were not parties or privies, nor was De Mattos, to any part of the transaction above detailed, which occurred between the 9th July 1860 and the 5th Feb. 1861. De Mattos refused to accept or pay the above bill for 287l. 7s. 4d.

The Alfred Lamont arrived at Rangoon on or about the day of 1860 with the said coals on board. These coals were by the captain of the Alfred Lamont offered to the company's agent at Rangoon, but the captain of the Alfred Lamont claimed freight at the rate of 2l. 5s. per ton before he would make delivery of the said coals; whereupon the said agent of the company refused to pay the said freight, and the said coals were by the direction of the captain of the said barque Alfred Lamont put up for sale by public auction, and sold at Rangoon. This sale was conducted in the manner in which sales by auction in that country are usually conducted, and at the sale so conducted the agent of the company at Rangoon became the bona fide purchaser of the coals on behalf of the company at the price of 1l. 1s. per ton (there being no competition for coal in such large quantities, and the said price being the best that could be got). No part of the said cargo of 1106 tons of coal shipped to Rangoon by the Woban, and mentioned in the said bill of lading, was ever delivered to the company, or to any agents of theirs, at Rangoon, save as aforesaid, but 850 tons of the said cargo did come into possession of the company and their agent at Rangoon in the manner aforesaid.

The Court was to be at liberty to draw any inference of fact and to direct any amendment in the case necessary for determining all questions between the company and De Mattos.

The questions for the opinion of the Court were: 1. Whether the company are entitled to recover back from De Mattos the moneys so paid by them to De Mattos on account of the said coals, together with interest at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum from the 5th July 1860.

2. Whether the company are bound to pay De Mattos the contract price of the said 850 tons, together with or without interest at 5 per cent., less any, and if any, what deductions.

3. Whether De Mattos has any and what claim, and for what amount, against the company, in respect of the sale to and purchase by them of the coals at Rangoon, as above set forth.

Judgment was to be entered in both actions according to the judgment of the court, and for such amount as the court might determine.

The case was argued in the Court of Q. B. in Michaelmas Term 1862, and the Court, after taking time to consider, were divided in opinion, Cockburn, C.J., and Wightman, J. holding that the property in the coals passed to the company, but that De Mattos was bound to deliver them at Rangoon, and not having done so, was bound to refund the moiety of the purchase-money paid; and Blackburn and Mellor, J.J. holding that, under the circumstances, neither party had any right of action against the other.

Mellor, J., the junior judge, withdrew, and the judgment was entered up in conformity with the opinion of Cockburn, C.J. and Wightman, J.

De Mattos thereupon brought error.

Mellish, Q. C. (Hersford with him) for De Mattos.—The principal point in the case is, whether the property in the coals passed to the company upon being put on board the ship, and the bill of lading and the policy of insurance handed over by De Mattos. It is submitted that the right construction was put by Blackburn, J., in his judgment in the court below, and that the property did pass to the company. The contract was not to deliver at Rangoon, and the words "delivered at Rangoon" were only inserted to show that the agreed price was to include every expense up to the delivery, which was contemplated to be Rangoon. The bill of lading was made out to the company's agent, and it was unnecessary for De Mattos to have an agent at Rangoon:

Frasers v. The East India Company, 5 B. & Ald. 617;

Shipton v. Thornton, 9 A. & E. 314;

Gibbs v. Gray, 2 H. & N. 22.

Drill, Q. C. (T. Solter with him) for the company.—The contract was to deliver at Rangoon 1000 tons of coal. Until delivery, the company could not tell whether the coal was of the agreed quality or quantity. The property did not pass, because De Mattos was bound to deliver: (Tregollas v. Sewell, 7 H. & N. 574.) The captain of the Alfred Lamont was of necessity agent for De Mattos. As there was no delivery to the company at all, they are not bound to pay the residue of the invoice value, and they are entitled to recover back the moiety they have paid:

Cores v. Bingham, 2 E. & B. 836;

Acruman v. Morris, 8 C. B. 440;

Feb. 3.—ERLE, C.J.—The questions that we have to answer are apparently two. The third question, whether Mr. De Mattos had a claim against the company with respect to the purchase by them of the coal at Rangoon, it is not necessary to answer. The first question is, whether the company are entitled to recover back from Mr. De Mattos the money paid by them to him on account of the said coal. I am of opinion that the company are not entitled to recover back from Mr. De Mattos the half price of the cargo that was paid to him; and my view of the contract is the same as that taken by my brother Blackburn. It is a mercantile contract, and taking the whole of it together, although it is capable of the construction that the seller contracted to deliver at Rangoon, in my opinion it was a contract for the coal, saving the perils of the sea; and it would be to my mind entirely out of course with respect to the sale of the specific cargo, with a bill of lading and a policy of insurance put upon it, to construe that to be a contract at all events to deliver 1000 tons of coal at Rangoon. There is no time mentioned for it. I asked, yesterday, would Mr. De Mattos be bound, if the coal went to the bottom of the sea, to send out another cargo? It is also in my mind entirely out of the contemplation of the parties, that the seller of such a cargo going by sea, in respect of which a policy of insurance has to be effected, should be liable for a breach of contract in case the cargo was swallowed up by the sea. It seems to me to stand to reason between the buyer and seller of such a cargo, to be conveyed from Cardiff to Rangoon, that the seller did not contract to be liable for a breach of contract which he was prevented carrying out by the perils of the sea. If he was liable for the breach of contract, it stands to reason he must have been, as one of the contracting parties, still liable, by reason of its not being performed, for the price that the company would have to pay at Rangoon to get the 1000 tons of coal which he contracted to deliver, and which would be to my mind a consequence that the seller, making such a contract as this, did not contemplate. If so, there would be no right to recover back. I quite agree in the grounds taken by the learned judge, Blackburn, J., in the court below, and according to that, the objection to the property passing, and so forth, would have no application. I quite agree with the minor ground that has been taken, that it was a contract for a sum of money to be paid by the company, and to receive in consideration of that payment a bill of lading, and a policy of insurance, which involves a cargo act ad hoc, a cargo appropriated past retraction by the seller to them, by delivering the bill of lading in which the company are the consignees, and that the price was paid for that consideration. That being so, the first question would be answered against the company. As to the second question, whether the company are bound to pay Mr. De Mattos the contract price of the 850 tons which did arrive at Rangoon, it is clear to me that they were not tendered to the company in performance of the contract of De Mattos, who was to deliver the coals free from the freight. The coals arrived at Rangoon in the American ship to which they had been transhipped, and the American captain refused to deliver them to the consignee without the payment of 2*l.* 5*s.* for the freight, and the company had agreed to have the coal delivered to them free of freight at Rangoon. Therefore Mr. De Mattos, or his agent the American captain, never contracted, and had no right to impose the term that he should pay 2*l.* 5*s.* freight, and therefore Mr. De Mattos has no right to say the company were guilty of a breach of contract in not paying it.

WILLIAMS, J.—I have come to a contrary opinion. This case depends entirely on the construction of the contract. I take the same view of it as Cockburn, C.J. did in the Court of Q.B. I do not think it is necessary to add anything more in the expression of my opinion upon it than to say that I have read the opinion given by him, which is very clear, and I agree with him, and I do not think I can do anything more by adding any words of my own.

MARTIN, B.—I am also of opinion the company are not entitled to recover back from Mr. De Mattos the money paid by them on account of "the said coal," and I found my opinion entirely upon the contract, and for the purpose of arriving at that opinion I take the written language, and I put upon it, as far as I can, the common, ordinary and natural construction, and I endeavour to carry out as well as I can the contract which the parties really made, and in my judgment the result is, that the company are not entitled to recover the money. Now the contract is contained in some letters. The first is one from Mr. De Mattos to the company on the 1st May 1880, in which he states, "I am prepared to supply your company with 1000 tons of coal delivered over the ship's side at Rangoon at 4*l.* per ton 20 cwt." Now if a man were proposing to smother that he would take upon himself the risk of sending a cargo of coal to Rangoon, I am utterly at a loss to know what more apt words he could use. How is man to express himself, when he so bargains with another, but by saying, "I am prepared to supply your company with 1000 tons of coal, deliver over the ship's side at Rangoon, at 4*l.* per ton of 20 cwt.?" And as I read the language it is, "I will deliver to you a ton or tons of coal over the ship's side at Rangoon, upon your paying me 4*l.* for each ton." And that seems to me the plain ordinary, common-sense meaning. There is nothing either illegal, or, as I think, unusual, in a man proposing to take upon himself to deliver goods at a distant place. Now that is Mr. De Mattos's proposition. It is answered by the letter of the 4th May from the company, and they say, "In reply to your letter, I am authorized by the directors to accept your tender, on the following terms: that you shall supply our company with 1000 tons of coal delivered at Rangoon alongside the craft, steam floating depot, or pier, as may be directed by the company's agent at that port." Now, there is, as seems to me, clearly a proposition, on the part of the company, and what they propose to buy is coal delivered at Rangoon alongside the craft. Then it goes on to say, "The price to be 4*l.* per ton of 20 cwt. at Rangoon," and how is that to be read other than that they were proposing to buy this coal at the price of 4*l.* per ton at Rangoon, without entering into the question of whether the property passed or not? What did the one propose to sell, and the other propose to take? It was, the one to deliver, and the other to accept, at Rangoon, 1000 tons of coal. Then it goes on thus (on which my judgment turns, with respect to the not recovering): "Payment one-half of an invoice value, by bill at three months, on hand bills of lading and policy of insurance to cover the amount, or in cash under discount, at the rate 5 per cent. per annum, at your option; and the balance in cash on delivery." That, in my judgment, is as much a part of the contract as the other, and, in my mind has a very clear and intelligible meaning, and requires nothing but the application of attention to it to ascertain what the parties intended; and apprehend what they meant was this: "We propose to buy from you coal to be delivered at Rangoon but you probably will want part payment to enable you to ship it, therefore we will agree to pay you beforehand half the invoice, on your handing to us bills of lading and satisfactory evidence that the coal has been put on board ship, and in addition, as we may possibly lose this, you shall give us a policy of insurance to that amount to cover us. And what is there unnatural or unreasonable in this? Both parties have thought that the only cause which could prevent the coal being delivered at Rangoon would be its loss by the perils of the sea. They procure the policy, and by that policy they were protected, and in the event of the goods not being delivered, they would be in status quo to obtain the half-price back by the policy of insurance, and so far from thinking there is anything unreasonable in this, it seems to me a reasonable contract as people can well enter into. I am giving this judgment upon the assumption that the 1000 tons were actually shipped. On the other point I say nothing; but I do, for myself, protest against matters being put in special cases (which ought to decide as matters of law) on which the judges are called upon to give an opinion on questions of fact. My judgment is founded on the assumption that this contract is performed by delivering 1000 tons; there is a contrary assumption by this: "With reference to your letter of this day's date, I agree to the 1000 tons

there is a contract in writing, and why is the court to imagine states of things different from that which the persons set down in their own written contracts? There is a rule of law that you cannot add to a contract, nor vary it, nor depart from it, where it is in writing; but in point of fact you do break that rule of law if, instead of acting upon the terms people set down themselves, you introduce other suppositions for the purpose of arriving at a conclusion. It is idle for the law to say, "you shall not add to the contract by parol evidence, you shall not alter it, or vary it when the contract is in writing," if, instead of reading the words used, you introduce other matters or suppositions which are not in the contract at all, but are supposed to be in the minds of the parties. Then, what takes place afterwards is this. The coals were put on board this ship. In my judgment the charter-party has nothing to do with it. I think the charter-party was a matter between Mr. De Mattos and the parties from whom he chartered the ship. With respect to the bill of lading, it was in exact pursuance of the contract. I am now assuming that the 1000 tons were in the bill of lading. This and the policy of insurance are delivered, and thereupon Mr. De Mattos writes:—"Herewith I hand you Ocean Marine policy for 1000*l.* for this ship as collateral security against the amount payable by you on account of the invoice." Then there is a letter written in exact compliance with the contract: "I hand you this bill of lading, as I am bound to do, and in addition I hand you a policy for 1400*l.* as collateral security against the amount payable by you on account of the invoice." It seems to me that that letter is in exact conformity with the contract. And then the company again write back: "I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date, with a policy of insurance for 1400*l.* on the cargo of coal per Waban, to be held by the company as collateral security for their payment to you of 1811*l.* 15*s.* on account of the shipment." Therefore it is not merely that Mr. De Mattos wrote it, but there is a letter from the agent entirely adopting it, and stating it, and this is what I believe to be the contract and the manner it is carried out. What then is the legal result of it? Now, I apprehend the legal result is this, that for the purpose of enabling a party to recover back money, he must maintain that the consideration has wholly failed, and unless he is able to put the other party in statu quo, he has no right to recover back money he has paid; and my judgment is founded upon this, that it was a part of the contract that Mr. De Mattos was to deliver to the company a bill of lading of the coals, which he did; but then, in addition to that, he was to effect and deliver to them a policy of insurance to the amount of that payment, 1400*l.*, to cover them, and if the money is to be recovered back, what is the consequence? Mr. De Mattos was bound to effect that policy, and he was bound to pay the premiums, and if the money could be recovered back from him, who is to pay to Mr. De Mattos the premiums that would be entirely lost to him? It is impossible, therefore, to put Mr. De Mattos in statu quo; and, applying the ordinary rule, that to recover back money that is paid you must put the party entirely in statu quo, my judgment is founded upon this, that Mr. De Mattos is not bound to pay the money; that the money must be paid in pursuance of the terms of the contract as written; that Mr. De Mattos was put to the trouble of getting the coal on board the ship; that he was put to the further expense of getting the policy of insurance and paying the premium; and having done this, he has performed a portion of the contract, and an action can never be maintained against him as for an entire breach or failure of consideration, and upon that ground I think the first question is to be answered in Mr. De Mattos's favour, and in favour of the view suggested by Mr. Mellish. With respect to the second question, that is too clear, it seems to me, to be argued. He was to be paid on delivery. He never delivered the coal, and the delivery of the coal was coupled with a stipulation that 45*s.* was to be paid for freight. The company never contracted to receive coal on these terms, and therefore the contract never was performed; consequently it is utterly impossible for Mr. De Mattos to recover. With respect to the third question, I do not say I have no opinion upon it, but it is not necessary to give it. Mr. Mellish has said exactly what I expected he would say, and I think he is right; but with respect to that matter I am not called upon to give any opinion. I have stated my judgment on this case, and I have stated my own judgment independently. If I am called upon to say, do I agree with my brother Blackburn's judgment, I say I cannot agree with him, but I give my own independent opinion founded on the words of the contract.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the first question ought to be answered in the negative, against the company. It appears to me, on the true construction of the contract, the company were, in respect of the payment which they made before the vessel left this country, to be at the risk, provided Mr. De Mattos fulfilled his part, which part was the shipment of the cargo and procuring a bill of lading which should vest that cargo in them, and insuring the cargo to an extent sufficient to protect them against sea risks and default in the delivery of the cargo. And I agree with my brother Williams, that the security to the company by the policy of insurance shows that they chose to take the risk upon themselves with that security. Now, that being so, in my judgment the company cannot recover back the price. Of course it is immaterial as a matter of reasoning whether I adopt the opinion of my Lord Chief Justice Erle, in accordance with that of my brother Blackburn, that the property did pass, or with the opinion of my brother Martin that the property did not pass; but the risk was to be imposed upon the company. The result is the same; because, if the property was in the company, they must stand the risk, or if not in the company, according to my brother Martin, there are special terms in this contract from which it ought to be concluded they adopted the risk, although the property was not in them. But I may state that, in my own judgment, the property did pass, and it passed because there was a contract between the parties for the value. The company was an independent contracting party for value, because the bill of lading was made out deliverable to the agents of the company or their assigns, so that, after Mr. De Mattos had deposited that bill of lading with the company for the value, he had no longer any control over the goods, and he had not only irrevocably and totally appropriated the cargo to them, but he had, by the contract between himself and the buyer of the cargo and the shipowner, vested the property in the company, they assenting to have that property. That such is the meaning of a bill of lading made out to the purchaser or his order, I have always understood to be settled, and the judgment of Lord Wensleydale in the case of Bryans v. Nix, 4 M. & W. 775, concludes, as it appears to me, the whole matter. It shows on the bill of lading how between the seller and the shipowner, upon a contract for value, the property vests in the person designated by the bill of lading, as the person to whom the property is to be delivered, and that person in this case is the company, because it is to the company's agent. That disposes of the first question. Now, with respect to the second, whether Mr. De Matteo can recover against the company with respect to the remainder of the 850 tons which arrived at Rangoon, I believe all the judges who have considered the matter are clearly of opinion that he cannot, because he was, as I have already stated, bound to deliver at Rangoon to the company, receiving the sum of 1*l*. 2*s*. 6*d*. per ton, remaining unpaid, for as much as should arrive in the due course of navigation there. It appears that the coal arrived at the Mauritius, diminished by a large quantity which was thrown overboard, which reduced the 110*s* tons to the 850 which arrived at Rangoon. With respect to any damage sustained by the company by the throwing overboard of these coals, they have the policy of insurance to resort to; as I have already said, they have, by the contract, expressed their satisfaction with that security. With respect to the 850 tons which were so transhipped at the Mauritius, the first vessel having become unseaworthy, I agree with Mr. Bovill, that this must depend upon the circumstances of the case, into which I shall not enter in detail. These coals must be taken to have been transhipped and sent on to Rangoon in the due course of navigation, and they arrived there, and then the performance of the contract by Mr. De Matteo imposed upon him the duty of giving the coals to the company's agent, being satisfied with the payment of 1*l*. 2*s*. 6*d*. per ton remaining unpaid under the contract. He did not so, and Mr. De Matteo's agent bought them at a sale by the captain of the vessel, rightfully or wrongfully, at the price of 25*s*. That is, of course, not a delivery under Mr. De Matteo's contract; therefore Mr. De Matteo cannot recover. It might be a question—and I do not think it would be right to pass that by—whether the company are not entitled to recover of Mr. De Matteo the 2*s*. 6*d*. per ton which they or their agents had to pay over and above the 1*l*. 2*s*. 6*d*. which they had bound themselves to pay on the receipt and true delivery of the cargo. That may well be a question. I do not express an opinion different from that my brother Williams has pronounced, because it is on the application of the principles of law only that I differ from him. I by no means mean to say that, by reason of there being no delivery by Mr. De Matteo at Rangoon, on payment of 1*l*. 2*s*. 6*d*. under the contract, they are not entitled, in an action for not delivering, to recover as damages the 2*s*. 6*d*. a ton which they had to pay over and above the contract price. It is not necessary to express an opinion on a question that is not raised, because the company are not suing for damages, but for the return of the whole sum of 1800*l*. and odd which they paid as part price. The question of trover is abandoned. I cannot help, in dealing with questions of this description, considering how the decision at which I feel disposed to arrive tallies with the figures, and if you consider for a moment what the figures are, I think they show plainly, as a matter of business, that neither the company nor Mr. De Matteo can be entitled to recover in respect of the causes of action on which our opinion is asked. First of all, with respect to the recovery back of the 1800*l*. and odd. As to so much of the 1800 and odd pounds as relates to the coal thrown overboard to save the lives of the crew, there is a remedy on the policy of insurance. As to so much of it as you ought to apportion to the 850 tons that went out to Rangoon, what is the upshot of the facts? They have those 850 tons; they were to pay by their contract with De Matteo for those tons 45*s*. per ton; they have paid in London 1*l*. 2*s*. 6*d*., and they have obtained them at Rangoon at 1*l*. 6*s*.; therefore the plain upshot is that which I have already indicated, that the settlement of the matter would consist, if we were to settle it, upon Mr. De Matteo giving to the 2*s*. 6*d*. per ton in the form of damages, that he should return to them the 1*l*. 6*s*. per ton which they have paid. But for that on half-crown they never had the full benefit. It seems to me, on the whole of the case, that well the company with respect to the price advanced nor Mr. De Matteo with respect to the delivery of the 850 tons, have any claim one against the other.

CHAMBERLAIN, B.—On the first question that arises in this case, I am of opinion that the plaintiff, Mr. De Matteo, is entitled to our judgment. Looking at the contract that was made by the latter, which has been so often referred to, and which it is necessary to recur again, I do not think Mr. De Matteo undertook absolutely to deliver a certain quantity of coal at Rangoon for the benefit of the company, so as to be responsible in an action of damages for non-delivery. I think the true effect of the contract was this, that he undertook that payment of the deferred price, that is, the money not paid in London, should not be demandable unless the goods were delivered at Rangoon; and that since the goods were carried at his risk, he entitled him to recover the amount of the deferred price, if it was necessary the goods should arrive and be delivered at Rangoon. I also agree with my brother Martin in the view he has taken, that we must look at the whole of the contract, and what the question is, whether the company are entitled to recover back from Mr. De Matteo the money paid him on account of the coal, I am of opinion the company are not entitled to recover, looking at the whole bargain, which is, "You shall pay half in London, you shall have a bill of lading, making the goods deliverable to your consignee, and you shall have a policy of insurance." Then, as regards the money paid, the transaction may be considered as concluded between Mr. De Matteo on the one hand and the company on the other; and as regards the deferred price, the goods were carried in the ship just as if no such contract in the bill of lading or policy had been entered into. On both grounds, I think the first question must be answered in the negative; but I also think it right to state that I adopt the view taken by my brother Blackburn in the court below and that expressed by the L. C. here, and my brother Willes in this court. On either ground the question must be answered in the negative. As to the second, it does not appear to me that any real difficulty arises. It is clear to my mind that the company are not bound to pay Mr. De Matteo the contract price for the 850 tons taken at Rangoon under the circumstances.

POOTR, B.—I am of opinion that the company are not entitled to recover back from Mr. De Matteo the money paid by them to him. I take the view of the contract so fully expressed by my brother Martin. It appears to me a very special contract as regards the mode of payment, but as regards the delivery of the coal, the language used by the parties is really almost too plain for argument. It is repeated again and again, that the coal is to be delivered at Rangoon. I do not think, in arriving at that view, we conflict with the decision of the court in Tregillus v. Savill, where the words were "delivered at Harbury." I think Mr. Mellish's argument may be applied to that case, that those words were introduced as ruling the price, and up to that time the price was so much a ton, and that would be very consistent in that case, and yet not at all conflict with our view, that here the goods are to be delivered at Rangoon. It seems to me, upon the whole of the contract, the meaning of the parties is very plain; and then no doubt I would not be at the risk of the company during the time the goods were in transit from this country to Rangoon; and it would have had a bearing on the question of their recovering back the money they have paid, but for the special terms of the contract with reference to those payments. I take the view my brother Martin has so fully expressed upon that point, that Mr. De Mattos has complied with all the conditions that entitle him to receive the money and to hold it. He has given the consideration for it and the company are not entitled to recover it back. On the second question, I answer it as the rest of the court, it being clear there is nothing that can entitle Mr. De Mattos to claim from the company the price of 850 tons of coal that were not delivered.

Mellish.—Then it is judgment reversed on the first question, and affirmed on the second and third.

ERLE, C. J.—It was a mere formal judgment in the Q. B. One judge gave way.

WILLES, J.—The result is according to the judgment of Blackburn and Mellor, J.J.

Mellish.—Neither party has any costs of action against the other.

MARTIN, B.—Yes.

OPPENHEIM v. FRY.

Policy of insurance—Particular average.

A policy of insurance on a steamer stated that the value should be taken as 14,000*l.* on the hull, and 8000*l.* on the machinery, 17,650*l.* average payable on the whole or each, as if separately issued. There was also the usual memorandum that the ship and freight were warranted free from average under 3 per cent. unless general or the ship was stranded. While in harbour at C., after her cargo had been discharged, the ship took fire. The flames were ultimately extinguished, but not until the hull had been seriously damaged. The machinery was not injured. The expenses consequent upon the accident were 377*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; the actual damage done to the hull 9*l.* 0*s.* 1*d.*, the cost of the survey of the ship, and 55*l.* 5*s.* 10*s.*, paid for extra labour in putting out the fire. The plt. claimed to treat these sums as particular average to be applied to the hull.

Held (supporting the decision of the court below), that whether the two latter items were to be considered as general or particular average, yet, as they were to be expended for the benefit of the hull and machinery generally, they must be apportioned; and that, as, adopting that calculation, the portion belonging to the hull would not, with the 377*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, the actual loss, make 3 per cent. on the value of the hull, the deft. was not liable.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Q. B. (See Oppenheim v. Fry, fully reported in 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 385.)

MacLachlan (Edward James, Q.C. with him) appeared for the plt., and contended as he did in the court below. He cited

[MARL CAS.—VOL. II.]

Mellish, Q.C. (Borill, Q.C. and Sir G. Honyman with him) were not called upon.

ERLE, C.J.—Notwithstanding the very able argument of Mr. MacLachlan, I am of opinion that the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. The insurance in this case was upon a steamer, the hull and the machinery being valued in the policy separately, as "average payable on the whole or on each, as if separately insured." Now the perils insured against were the usual perils, and there is the common memorandum, "warranted free from average under three pounds per cent., unless general or the ship be stranded." It appears that a fire occurred on board, and the damage caused by it to the hull amounted to the sum of 386*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*, which is under three per cent. upon the sum insured upon the hull, and the question in the case arises in respect of a sum of 55*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.*, expended in putting out the fire. Now the assured claims to have that amount added to the amount of damage as expenses incurred in preventing further damage to the hull, and as an expense incurred in respect of the hull only. But at the time when the ship was insured the danger to the machinery was as great as the danger to the hull, and by the expense of 55*l.* 5*s.* 10*d.* the damage both to the ship and to the machinery was prevented. I am of opinion therefore that the average stater has properly appropriated part of the expense to the hull and part to the machinery. The same principle which would have applied if there had been two policies, one on the hull and the other on the machinery, applies. The case is very clearly stated by the learned judges in the court below.

The other Judges concurred.

ADMIRALTY COURT.

Jan. 29 and 30, and Feb. 12, 1864.

THE NORWAY.

Breach of duty and breach of contract by the master—
Damage to goods by non-delivery and short delivery—Jurisdiction.

In construing the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, the court will not be limited by considerations as to whether or not there would be a corresponding right of action at common law, but will so interpret the section as to give a remedy in all cases contemplated by the statute itself.

The St. Cloud, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 54, distinguished.

D., by a charter-party between himself and the master of a vessel, stipulated that the vessel should load an outward cargo, proceed to Rangoon, there load homeward cargo (3000 tons dead weight), return to one of various ports at the charterer's option, and there discharge cargo. Freight, a lump sum, part payable in advance before sailing from this country, part in advances on the voyage, part on arrival at return port of delivery, and remainder on final delivery of cargo. The vessel loaded at Rangoon 36,000 bags of rice amounting to less than 3000 tons dead weight of cargo, and some portions of the cargo were thrown overboard, and other portions sold during the voyage. On the ship's arrival at Liverpool, as the port of discharge, the master claimed a sum of money as lump freight, without any deductions for average contribution, or in respect of short cargo, and refused to give particulars for apportioning the average, or to deliver any cargo without payment of the freight which he considered to be due. The plts. tendered the amount.

received by them to be due, and security for the remainder. Part of the cargo was subsequently, by order of the master, landed and improperly warehoused, whereby the plts. received damage.

The vessel having been arrested by the assignee of the bill of lading, who was also owner of the cargo:

Held, that an owner of goods and an assignee of a bill of lading cannot, if he is no party to the contract of charter-party for the ship, sue for any breach of the contract per se, but that he can sue for breaches of such portions of the charter-party as by construction are included in the bill of lading:

That the master was guilty of a breach of duty in not giving information as to the circumstances necessary to ascertain the amount of freight and average due:

That he was guilty of a breach of contract in non-delivery and short delivery of cargo:

That the plt. might sue for compensation in respect of the cargo improperly thrown overboard; but that he was not entitled to set off the damage against the amount due from him for freight.

The Salacia, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 91, distinguished.

The plts. in this case, Ashburner and Co., the assignees of the bill of lading and owners of a cargo of rice shipped on board the Norway, at Rangoon, and brought to Liverpool, sued the vessel in respect of damage done by jettison and sale abroad of part of the cargo, and in respect of various breaches of duty and contract on the part of the master.

The plts. filed a petition, to which various objections were taken on behalf of the defts. The material portions of the petition are as follows:—

Art. 2. Charter-party between Captain Major of the Norway and W. N. de Mattos, Esq., of Liverpool, merchant, viz.: That the said ship load at Liverpool a cargo of salt, not exceeding 2200 tons, and therewith proceed to Calcutta, and after the discharge of the outward cargo reload (or at freighters' option, proceed to Rangoon, Akyab, or Bassim) a full and complete cargo . . . not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry . . . and proceed therewith to Cowes, Queenstown, or Falmouth, at master's option, for orders to proceed to London, Liverpool, Bordeaux, Havre, Antwerp and Marseilles. . . . The vessel to be unloaded at port of discharge according to the custom of the port. . .

In consideration whereof . . . the said merchant does hereby promise and agree to . . . pay 11,250/. lump sum, if ordered, to the United Kingdom, Havre, or Bordeaux, 11.625/. sterling, if ordered, to Antwerp, or Marseilles. The master guaranteeing to carry 3000 tons dead weight of cargo upon a draft of 26 feet of water, or to forfeit freight in proportion to deficiency. . . . Payment to be made as follows, viz., 2000/. to be advanced on the vessel's clearing at Liverpool, subject to insurance only, say 1000/. by freighters' acceptance at four months, and 1000/. at six months. Sufficient cash for ship's disbursements not exceeding 2500/., to be advanced at Calcutta, and the necessary disbursements, if ordered, to the rice ports, subject to interest and insurance only at current rate of exchange for six months' bills in London, against the captain's receipts, such advances to be made on account of chartered freight, and the balance as follows, namely, one-third in cash on arrival at port of delivery, and the remainder on true and final delivery of the cargo at the said port of discharge by good and approved bills, payable in London, or cash equal to three months' date from the delivery if discharged in the United Kingdom, or in cash at current rate of exchange if discharged on the continent, less three months' interest. . . . It being agreed that for the payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, or other charges, the said master or owners shall have an absolute lien and charge on the said cargo or goods laden on board.

3. At the time of entering into the said charter-party, Captain Major, who was also part owner, well as master of the ship, well knew that the Norway could not carry 3000 tons dead weight of cargo upon a draft of 26 feet of water, as stipulated in the charter-party; the ship not being, in fact, as he well knew, of sufficient capacity for that purpose.

4. Agreement between de Mattos and Ashburner and Co., of Calcutta. That the shipment homeward should be on joint account.

5 and 6. Arrival of vessel at Calcutta; thence Rangoon. There, laden with a cargo of rice, 36,000 bags.

8. Bills of lading for 36,000., signed by master. Bills of lading as follows: Shipped . . . by . . . in and upon . . . the Norway, as per charter-party, 13,000 bags of cargo rice, to be delivered in the like good order and condition at the port of discharge . . . unto order or assigns. Freight for the said goods payable as per charter-party, with primage and average accustomed.

9. Bills of lading indorsed and assigned to plt., who was also the owner of the rice included in the bill of lading.

10. The 36,200 bags of rice, deficient several hundred tons of the 3000 tons mentioned in the charter-party. Draught of water of Norway when laden with the rice, less than twenty-six feet.

11. Jettison of some part and sale of other part of cargo.

12. Arrival of ship at Falmouth; orders by charterer that she should proceed to Liverpool and discharge in either the Albert, Stanley, or Wapping Docks, the usual docks for rice-laden ships.

13. On or about the 17th Nov. the Norway arrived at Liverpool, but the master . . . said that he would insist on payment of full freight before delivery of any part of the cargo. .

15. On the 24th Nov. the master of the Norway wrongfully demanded to be paid 6500/. as freight and a further sum of 1000/. by way of general average contribution as a condition precedent to delivery of any part of the cargo, and refused to deliver the cargo on any other terms, and on the same day caused his ship to be taken into the Canada-dock without being lightened.

16. Canada-dock not suitable for discharging cargo of rice.

17. The plt. was at all times ready, upon the delivery of the cargo, to pay to the master of the Norway all sums due to him as freight and general average, and expressly offered the master to pay into the hands of a third party the full amount in dispute to await the final result, which the master refused.

19-21. Various interviews and letters between Bushby and Co., the agents for the cargo, and Messrs. A. — Taylor and Co., the brokers acting for the ship, proving a determination to retain cargo as lien for freight, and waiver by shipowner of a tender for amount actually due or security.

21. Special damage from wrongful discharge of cargo.

22. The master of the Norway has persisted in refusing to give the plts. particulars concerning the weight of cargo shipped at Rangoon, the alleged jettison and sale of part cargo, and other matters necessary for the right calculation of the amount of freight and general averages due from the cargo to the ship.

The master of the Norway has actually received from De Mattos, the charterer, or his agents, or the charterer has paid and incurred on account of chartered freight, the following sums, namely. . . . and

THE NORWAY.

the plt. claims that . . . the said sums are to be deducted from the gross sum of 11,250/., the lump freight mentioned in the charter. The plt. further claims to deduct the value of his goods thrown overboard by the master as aforesaid, and deduction in proportion to amount of cargo not carried as per charter-party. . . . The plt. further claims that in respect of the one-third balance by the charter-party to be paid on arrival of the ship at port of delivery, the defts. had no lien, inasmuch as the said sum being payable before delivery of the cargo is not freight.

The plt. contends that by reason of the premises the master of the Norway has committed breaches of duty and breaches of contract, for which the ship and freight are responsible to the plt. by the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, in respect of, amongst others, the following matters, namely:

For wrongfully guaranteeing in the charter-party that the Norway could carry 3000 tons dead weight of cargo, he, the said master, well knowing that the said ship could not carry the said 3000 tons as provided in the said charter.

For not carrying 3000 tons dead weight of cargo, as provided for in the charter.

For throwing overboard part of the plt.'s cargo on the voyage.

For selling part of the plt.'s cargo on the voyage.

For refusing to discharge in either the Stanley Albert or Wapping Docks, as lawfully directed by the charterer, and in persisting, without lawful excuse, in such refusal.

In not unloading the ship at Liverpool, the port of discharge, according to the custom of the port as provided for by the charter-party.

In placing the rice of the plt.s. on and in wharfs and warehouses, on and in which goods of a like nature are not usually placed, thereby violating the requirements of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862.

In wrongfully claiming from the plt.s. for alleged freight and general average contribution a larger sum than was due to him, the said master, for same, and in wrongfully detaining the plt.s.' cargo by way of lien for such excessive sum.

In wrongfully withholding from the plt.s. particulars of the weight of cargo shipped, of the jettison, and sale of part cargo, and of other matters necessary for the right calculation of the amount of freight due from the cargo to the ship.

In not delivering the rice of the plt.s. according to the contract contained in the bill of lading.

In breaking the contracts contained in the said charter-party and bill of lading.

The following are the material portions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 6:—

The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim by the owner . . . or assignee of any bill of lading of any goods carried into any port in England or Wales for damage done to the goods, or any part thereof, by the negligence or misconduct of or for any breach of duty, or breach of contract on the part of the master.

Brett, Q.C. and Cohen appeared for the defts. in objection to the petition.

V. Lushington (Mellish with him) contra.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This is an action purporting to be brought under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. A petition has been filed on behalf of the plt.s. The defts. object thereto, and say the petition ought to be rejected, either wholly or partly, and for the purpose of discussing the admissibility the averments of fact must be taken to be true. [The learned Judge then referred to the material parts of the petition, and continued:] It is said that at common law the plt. would have no right of action in respect of several important matters made the subject of this suit; that there he could not sue under a charter to which he was not a party, nor for a reduction of the lump freight, for which the shipowner has a lien, on account of loss of goods improperly thrown overboard or injured, nor for any other breach of contract, nor for injury done to goods before the plt. was entitled to delivery of them, nor against the master for withholding the information by which alone the plt. could satisfy himself as to the justice of the demand of freight made by the master; and it is argued, that if no action would lie at common law, this court has no jurisdiction under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and reliance was placed upon the case of the St. Cloud. In that case I declared my opinion that, where a suit was instituted by a bare assignee, the action could not be maintainable, not only because such action could not be brought at common law, but because of the consequences which would have arisen from a contrary opinion. I was, and am, of opinion, that no new right as related to a bare assignee was created by the statute, and I refer to the report for my reasons; but I never said, and never intended to say, that with respect to all matters whatsoever the same restriction was imposed by the 6th section; on the contrary, I am of opinion that it is my duty so to construe the statute as to afford a remedy for all the evils contemplated in the statute itself. I am of opinion that if in the case of any goods carried, or to be carried, into any port in England or Wales, damage has been done by the negligence or misconduct of the owner, master, or crew, or if there has been any breach of duty or breach of contract, then, provided that the owner of the vessel is not resident in this country, the court has jurisdiction over a claim by the owner, consignee, or assignee of the bill of lading, and that it is my duty to afford a remedy, whether or not there would be a remedy in the like case at common law if the owner of the vessel was resident in this country. As to the objection that the plt. sues for a breach of a charter, to which contract he was not a party—the parties to that charter being the owners of the ship and De Mattos—I am of opinion that the present plt. cannot sue for any breach of the charter-party per se. The plt., however, sues as owner of the cargo and holder of the bills of lading. He is entitled to sue upon the contract contained in the bill of lading, and, so far as that includes stipulations in the charter, he is entitled to sue upon them, not as violations of the contract in the charter, but as breaches of the contract in the bill of lading. The plt. claims that the contract of the bill of lading incorporates all of the charter-party that remained to be carried out, and that, looking to all the circumstances of the case, this must be taken to have been the intent of the parties. The contract of the bill of lading was made by the master, as the agent for the shipowner, with the charterer's agent, and with the charter-party before the eyes of the contracting parties, and referred to expressly in the bill of lading. The freight was the freight payable as freight by charter-party, and that was lump freight, and it is said lump freight implies lump cargo, and therefore full freight is payable without any deductions. This view, however, seems to me to be unsustainable. [The learned Judge then referred to the case of Chappell v. Comfort, cited above, and said:] Now, applying these observations to the present case, what is the reference in the bill of lading to the charter-party? The bill of lading declares that the vessel is bound for Cowes, Queenstown or Falmouth, for orders as per charter-party. This includes what is omitted in the bill of lading, but inserted in the charter "at Master's option," and it includes the delivery at all the ports mentioned in the charter. Again, the bill of lading states the goods are to be delivered, the freight payable as per charter-party. I think that these expressions include everything mentioned in the charter-party in relation to freight. There may be great difficulty in ascertaining what that freight is, but the principles by which it must be ascertained are the stipulations contained in the charter. The first stipulation is, that 11,250*l.* lump be paid if ordered to the United Kingdom, Havre or Bordeaux, 11,625*l.* if ordered to Antwerp or Marseilles. As to the next clause, the master guarantees to carry 3000 tons dead weight of cargo upon a draught of twenty-six feet water, or to forfeit freight in proportion for deficiency. I do not say that the holder of the bill of lading could bring an action upon the guarantee, but I do say, that in calculating the freight to be paid, a deduction ought to be made in proportion to the deficiency. I do not say that the holder of the bill of lading could sue on the stipulation for the loading at Rangoon, as the freighter or his agents might consider safe. Under the existing circumstances, the amount due for freight can only be ascertained through the medium of a complicated account of advances and disbursements. The question then arises as to the power of the master to detain the cargo for freight and average until any amount demanded by him, however exorbitant, be complied with, and to require that the holder of the bill of lading in this case shall make a tender to him of the proper amount of freight and average, he, the master, refusing to give any information to him as to the circumstances indispensably necessary to ascertain the amount of freight and average due, and which cannot be in the knowledge of the holder of the bill of lading, and which are within the master's knowledge. That this is a breach of duty under the statute I cannot doubt; and the consequence is that a loss has accrued, by the default of the master to the holder of the bill of lading. Objection was taken to the 11th article before mentioned, and the Salacia was cited. That case was different from the present. The present action is not to reduce the freight, for which there is a lien, by the value of the goods improperly sold; but it is, in substance, an action for breach of contract in non-delivery and short delivery of cargo as per bill of lading. It is said that, even if the alleged breaches are breaches of the contract, the plt. is not in a position to sue upon them. It is urged that he is not entitled to delivery of the goods; he may never be so; until he is, he cannot claim for damage done to the goods to be delivered. It is true that the deft. has a lien upon the goods for his freight, and the plt. cannot reduce this freight by setting off any damage done to his goods; and if this be so, it may be that at common law the plt. cannot bring an action of trover for the goods, because trover requires in a plt. the right, not only of property, but of possession, and this cannot exist with a hostile lien; and I think upon this point reference was made to Bloxam v. Sanders (cited above). But I think the same case decides, that though trover does not lie, a special action will lie for damages on the contract, and I think, therefore, the plt. can sue for damage on account of any injury done to his goods by being improperly thrown overboard, for sale, or unloading, or wharfing. He can also sue for damages caused by the delay, from the deft. making improper claims, and refusing to specify particulars. Lastly, he can sue for damages for non-delivery. All that is necessary to enable the plt. to recover is, that he should be willing to perform his part of the contract. The plt. has, indeed, neither paid the freight nor made a tender; but the petition alleges that all tender was waived, and that the plt. was ready and willing to pay what was fair. The result is, that the petition must be reformed by striking out all those articles or paragraphs which purport to allege a breach of the charter-party—that is, of all those stipulations in the charter-party not imported into the bill of lading; that all which imports a breach of the bill of lading, as I have now interpreted it, shall remain, and also all that shows a damage or loss occasioned by the alleged misconduct of the master, whether it be called breach of duty or otherwise.

THE SKIPWITH.

Claim for repairs to a vessel—Subsequent mortgagee liable—Maritime lien—Amendment.

A subsequent mortgagee is liable for repairs previously done to the mortgaged vessel.

The institution of a suit as a cause of necessities does not estop the plt. from pleading and proving subsequently that his claim is in respect of repairs; but the title of the cause must be amended.

Quære, whether a claim for repairs constitutes a maritime lien?

The schooner Skipwith being under arrest in a suit for wages, this action was entered as a cause of necessities on behalf of the plts. Charles Hill and others, of Cardiff, Glamorganshire, shipbuilders. Their claim was in fact for repairs done to the vessel in July 1863. The deft. was an assignee of a mortgagee, the mortgage having been transferred to him on the 17th Sept. 1863.

The answer stated (amongst other things) that the repairs were done on the personal responsibility of the owner, that the vessel belongs to the port of London, and at the time of the institution of the cause her owner resided at Swansea.

V. Lushington, for the plts., moved the court to reject the material portions of the answer. The action is properly for repairs under sect. 4 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. There is a mistake in the præcipe, and the action has consequently been entered as one of necessities; but that does not conclude the plt. Besides, repairs are necessities. The mortgagee can be in no better position than the owner (The Caledonia, Swab. 19), and the plt.'s claim would therefore take precedence.

THE PACIFIC.

Clarkson for deft.—The cause was entered as one of necessities, and by that entry the plt. is bound. He must therefore recover, if at all, under sect. 5 of the Admiralty Court Act 1861; but then he cannot recover under that section, as the owner is domiciled in Wales.

The following are the sections of the Act of Parliament referred to:

Sect. 4. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for the building, equipping, or repairing of any ship, if at the time of the institution of the cause the ship or the proceeds thereof are under arrest of the court.

Sect. 5. The High Court of Admiralty shall have jurisdiction over any claim for necessities supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court, that at the time of the institution of the cause any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales, provided always, that if in any such cause the plt. do not recover twenty pounds he shall not be entitled to any costs, charges, or expenses incurred by him therein, unless the judge shall certify that the cause was a fit one to be tried in the said court.

DR. LUSHINGTON.—There might be many circumstances which would raise questions of considerable difficulty with regard to the construction of the 4th and also of the 5th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, but I cannot say that upon the present occasion I feel much embarrassed. Now the facts of the case are these—that these articles, whether you call them repairs to the vessel, or whether you call them necessities—were done and furnished in the month of July last, and the plaintiff in this case took a transfer of the mortgage on the 17th Sept. following. He, therefore, in point of time, is clearly posterior to the original demand. The suit is instituted as a cause of necessities, and if it had happened that the owner of this vessel had not been resident in England, I am strongly inclined to think it would have been well so instituted, for I think that between the repairs which are mentioned in this account and necessities in the general explanation of the term, there is very little distinction to be found. But, however, it appears that the suit was instituted as a cause of necessities, and the first is a technical objection, whether the court under these circumstances ought, if I may use the expression, to non-suit the parties, or whether it ought not to allow some means in order to remedy that which is a mere technical accident. Reference has been made to the past practice of this court, and I have no doubt that Mr. Clarkson is right when he says it has always been customary to state that a cause was of this or that description, but there never was a case to my knowledge, in which, in consequence of an erroneous description in the title of the cause, the person who was unfortunately guilty of that mistake, by negligence or otherwise, was estopped from suing in this court. There has been no such case, and I apprehend the court has ample means of reforming that difficulty, supposing it to occur; for I should have nothing to do but to give leave to the plt. to amend, and say it was a case of repairs, and not a case of necessities. Now, with respect to the meaning of the 4th section, which is as follows. [The Court read the 4th section cited above, and proceeded:]—I am of opinion that, however the claim originally arose, whether it arose from giving credit to the master of the vessel, or not—provided that the claim was not satisfied at the time, and that the work for building, equipping, or repairing had been done and provided, also that the ship and proceeds were under the arrest of the Court—it was and is competent to the party to proceed here. A difficult question might arise, whether in the wording of this section the claim which has been given in can be called a maritime lien or not, and if not, what would be the proper denomination of it. But Mr. Clarkson has argued, and very properly argued for his client, that his client never would have been responsible for these repairs, because the mortgagee was not in possession. That is perfectly true, but I do not see how that benefits him in the slightest degree, because he stands in the position of the original owner of the property, and takes his mortgage cum onere, and is, therefore, liable to all the repairs and all the debts legally attaching to the ship. I will give leave to amend the title of the cause, and with regard to the other questions I have expressed my opinion.

Answer rejected, but without costs, the question decided being primæ impressionis and depending upon an ambiguous section of an Act of Parliament.

Necessaries and mortgage—Priority—Domicil—Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 5.

The term "domiciled" in the Admiralty Court Act 1862, s. 5, is used in the ordinary legal sense, and if the owner of a ship is only temporarily absent from this country, an action for necessities cannot be maintained against his ship.

A material man has not by the mere fact of supplying necessities a maritime lien against the ship. To obtain that lien he must have arrested the ship by warrant from the High Court of Admiralty.

In the months of Nov. and Dec. 1861 and Jan. and Feb. 1862 the plt. furnished a vessel with necessities. On the 12th Dec. the defts. became mortgagees of the vessel and duly registered the mortgage. On the 4th Feb. 1862, the plt. arrested the vessel in a suit in respect of the necessities:

Held, that the plt.'s claim in the Admiralty Court accrued at the date of the arrest of the vessel, and must therefore be postponed to the mortgage of the defts.

The Skipwith, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 48, not followed.

This was a suit for necessities, and was brought by Joseph Hodgkinson, of Southampton, engineer, against the steamship Pacific and against John Morris and Frederic Palmer Martindale, joint mortgagees of the ship intervening.

The question in this case came before the court on objection to the deft.'s answer.

The petition alleged, amongst other things, that the plt., being duly employed for that purpose, executed in the months of Nov. and Dec. 1861, and the months of Jan. and Feb. 1862, certain work, consisting of a new gallery to the Pacific, and repairs to her hull, cabins and machinery; that in the month of Aug. 1862, Arthur Turner Clarke, the sole registered owner, quitted this country and went to reside at New York, or elsewhere in America, and that at the time of the institution of this suit he had no domicile in this country, and that the mortgagees of the ship have intervened and given bail in the suit.

The answer alleged, amongst other things, that the said Arthur Turner Clarke left this country for the purpose of meeting his said ship at New York, but that he then intended to return to England, and still intends so to do, and that he was at the time of the institution of this suit only temporarily absent from England, and was at such time domiciled in England or Wales, within the intent and meaning of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. That, if the court has jurisdiction, the mortgagees claim priority of payment.

Deane, Q. C. and Middleton appeared in objection to the answer; and Mellish, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson in support.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This is a suit for necessities, and is brought by Joseph Hodgkinson, and defended on behalf of the mortgagees of the ship. A petition has been given in, and an answer filed, and the present question arises on a motion to reject the answer. The necessities were supplied partly in Nov. 1861, and partly subsequently. The mortgage bears date Dec. 12, 1861, and was duly registered at the time. On the 4th Oct. 1863 the mortgagees took possession; and on the 4th Feb. 1864 this suit was instituted. The owner left England in Aug. 1862. There are two objections which I am about to consider, and which I think will dispose of the question before me. The first is, that at the time of the institution of this suit the owner was domiciled in England, and if true, the court could not entertain the case. In order to oust the jurisdiction of the court, the statute requires that the plt. shall prove that the owner was so domiciled at the institution of the suit. A discussion having arisen as to the meaning of the word domiciled, I am of opinion that the Legislature has used it in its known legal sense, such as we find it defined by the highest legal authorities, and I think that if the owner was only temporarily absent animo revertendi the action would not lie. And though it may be true that such a construction would very much narrow the effect of the statute, which is remedial, no such consequence would justify the court in giving to the word domicile a meaning different from that which legally appertains to it. I cannot reject this article, but it must, if it is to be relied upon, be reformed by more specific pleading, that is to say, by alleging where this person was resident at the time when the order for the necessities was given, and when they were furnished. In its present form the article is too vague, as it states merely that he quitted this country at a particular time, and is likely to return, and does not proceed to set forth where he was previously domiciled, and where he is now resident. The most important question, however, is, whether the material man can maintain his claim to priority of payment before the mortgagee. If he cannot, then he has in this case no effectual remedy, for the amount advanced on mortgage would exhaust the funds arising from the proceeds of the ship. The essential element in a mortgage transaction is the pledge of the ship itself; for though the mortgagee may also take the personal covenant of the mortgagor, he relies mainly upon the ship as his security, which becomes fixed when the deed is registered, and which cannot be displaced by the subsequent act of any third person, unless that third person is possessed of some lien which entitles him to precedence. By the law of some countries the material man has a lien upon the ship, and in very early times in this country also he could maintain a suit against the ship in the Court of Admiralty. But the decision of the Privy Council in the case of the Neptune, 3 Knapp, 94, took from this court the last vestige of such a jurisdiction, and from that date until recently the only remedy of the material man was at common law, and there of course he could only proceed against the owner, and not against the ship. This state of things was partly altered by the 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 6, which gave the Admiralty Court jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever for necessities supplied to a foreign ship, and to enforce the payment thereof, whether such ship or vessel might have been within the body of a county, or upon the high seas, at the time when the necessities were furnished. This statute not applying to British vessels the Admiralty Court Act 1861 gave the court jurisdiction over any claim for necessities supplied to any ship elsewhere than in the port to which the ship belongs, unless it should be shown to the satisfaction of the court that at the time of the institution of the suit any owner or part owner of the ship is domiciled in England or Wales. The reason of these enactments seems to be plain. A real action in the Admiralty Court is given against a foreign vessel in all cases, because the owner is assumed to be beyond the jurisdiction and vice versa it is denied against a British vessel where the owner is within the jurisdiction, or for a similar reason where the necessities are supplied in the home port, because the presumption is, that the supplies were made upon the personal credit of the owner, who would there be known and trusted. In other words, the remedy against the ship is given only where a personal action against the owner would be fruitless, and then only when the supplies have not been made upon his personal credit. The material man, therefore, by the mere fact of his furnishing necessities, in no case obtains the ship as a security until he commences a suit in the Admiralty Court; and in the case of a British ship may never obtain it at all, if by reason of the owner having his domicile in this country the suit cannot be instituted. This, I think, shows that the material man has not a maritime lien, for that accrues instantly with the circumstances creating the claim, and not from the date of the intervention of the court. In the present case the defendants on the 12th Dec. 1861, by registering their mortgage, acquired the ship as a security, and at that time the plaintiffs, though they had supplied the necessities, had not instituted a suit, and therefore had no lien on the ship. And it was not until Feb. 4 1864, that the plaintiffs arrested the ship, and thereby acquired security, but the ship was then by law subject to other claims. Under these circumstances the plaintiffs must take the ship, subject to the incumbrances of the defendants, unless the Act clearly prescribed that the claim of the necessities man should override that of the mortgagee. But of this no trace whatever is to be found. It has, indeed, been urged that the court should follow equitable principles in regulating the priority of incumbrances and that the mortgagee having, if the fact be so had the benefit of the supply of the necessities, his claim must be postponed to that of the material man, in the same way that in bottomry bonds the first bondholder is postponed to the second. This argument is not without weight, for upon such grounds rests the law of all those countries which give the material man a lien upon the vessel. But this is not the view of the English Legislature as expressed in the Act, which, as has been before stated, gives him no lien upon, but only a right to proceed against, the ship. For these reasons, after having given the question the best consideration in my power, I have come to the conclusion that, in the circumstances of this case, the mortgagee is entitled to be paid in preference to the material man; and in such case, according to the answer, the whole funds, viz. the proceeds of the ship, would be exhausted. Now, I think I am bound to notice the case of the Skipwith, as reported—and I have no reason to say not correctly reported. It may be that in that case some of the observations made by me, either really or apparently, are not reconcilable with this judgment. The observations may have been correctly reported, but erroneously applied to the facts of the case, as I am now able to ascertain them. I regret that the case of the Skipwith was not brought before the court in a more formal shape, and that it was not more maturely considered; but, if I was in error in that case, assuredly I would never for a mere nominal consistency persist in it. I must order the answer to be amended, but I shall not give the costs of the motion, as the case well deserved serious consideration.

SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK.

THE GEORGE WASHINGTON.

Damage by tort—Collision.

Where a large propeller, lying in a slip, was running her screw for the purpose of testing her machinery, causing a powerful current to set towards the screw, and it becoming necessary to move barges which lay on the other side of the slip, the engineer of the propeller was requested to stop his engine for the purpose, and did so; but while a barge was being moved by his vessel, he started his engine again, and the current made by the screw drew the barge against it, and one arm of it cut into the barge and sunk her, causing damage, to recover which the owners of the barge libelled the propeller:

Held, that the case must be governed by the rules of Admiralty law relating to collisions:

That the case was not one of inevitable accident or mutual fault:

That the engineer was negligent in starting his engine as he did.

Evidence was given of a custom for propellers to run their screws while lying in the slips of New York city:

Held, that, if such a custom exists, the privileges it confers should be exercised with great caution and in such a manner as to interfere as little as possible with the use of the slips by other vessels:

That even though such a custom were proved, yet when the engineer of the propeller had consented to stop his engine for the purpose of moving the barges, the latter had a right to rely on its remaining motionless until they had accomplished their object, provided they were proceeding with no unnecessary delay.

This action was brought to recover about 20,000l. damages for an alleged maritime tort. The facts were as follows:—On the 24th Nov. 1862, the steam propeller, George Washington, lay at pier No. 9 in the North River, in the city of New York, on the north side of the pier. She was a large new vessel, and was in the process of being completed and fitted for sea. For the purpose of trying and perfecting her machinery, she had been running her engine and turning her screw during the day. The screw was 13 feet in diameter, and the effect of its revolution, as she lay fastened to the dock, was to cause a powerful current to set towards her screw from the opposite side of the slip. The slip was about 85 feet wide.

The barge Fair Lady, a vessel belonging to the Philadelphia Steam Propeller Company, who were the libellants in the cause, lay in the same slip on the opposite side from the George Washington. Outside of her lay the barge Garibaldi, and ahead of them both lay another propeller, nearer to the end of the pier. During the day it became necessary for the libellants to move the Fair Lady out towards the end of the pier. This could not be done safely, at least by any ordinary means, while the screw of the George Washington was in motion, as the Fair Lady would be in danger of being sucked over by the current caused by the revolution of the screw within reach of its arms. The engineer of the

George Washington was therefore requested to stop his engine while the barges were being moved. He accordingly stopped it, and the Garibaldi was moved out and made fast near the end of the pier. The Fair Lady was then breasted out from the dock to be also moved forward. She had got about two-thirds of her length past the screw of the George Washington, when the engineer of the latter started his engine, thus setting her screw in motion. The powerful current caused at once by its revolution sucked the Fair Lady over to the stern of the George Washington, where an arm of the screw struck her and cut a hole in her bottom, causing her to sink, by which she and her cargo were greatly damaged, and it was for the recovery of this damage that the action was brought.

For libellants were Messrs. Benedict, Burr and Benedirt. For resps., Mr. Pursons and Judge Curtis.

SHIPMAN, J.—This is a somewhat novel case. It must be subjected to the rules of Admiralty jurisprudence in cases of collision, so far as they are applicable to the peculiar features of the case. Of course, contrary to the rule of common law, if both parties are found to be in fault, the damage should be divided. There is no room for doubt that there was fault, and gross fault. The damage cannot therefore be attributed to inevitable accident. But, after a careful review of the evidence, and a full consideration of the very elaborate and able argument of the advocate for the claimants, I am clearly of opinion that the fault is exclusively chargeable to the negligence and unreasonable act of the person in charge of the George Washington's engine. His own testimony was taken on the trial, and I think, when fairly weighed with the facts stated by the witnesses for the libellants, it confirms the allegation contained in the libel, of negligent and improper conduct on the part of the steamer, and it satisfies me that the collision was brought about wholly by his unjustifiable act in starting his engine at the time he did. The libellants' witnesses furnish clear proof that he was requested to stop his engine, so that the barges could be moved. He admits himself, in his testimony, that he was requested to stop until they could move a boat or boats; he does not recollect which. He did stop, and the libellants proceeded to move the barges. The Garibaldi had to be moved first, as she lay outside of the Fair Lady. While the latter boat was in the act of moving without any delay, he suddenly started his engine and precipitated the collision. He states that, in his judgment, his engine was stopped twenty minutes. He then says, "Before I put the engine in motion again I went on deck and looked, and saw that the space between my ship and the boats on the opposite side, at Pier 10, was greater than where I stopped. I then went below and put my engine in motion again." The collision immediately followed. I think the course of the engineer wholly unjustifiable. He knew, or ought to have known, the effect of the motion of his ship's screw on the waters of the ship, and the danger that must attend the movement of any vessel on the opposite side of the ship. He had been requested to stop his engine for the purpose of allowing the vessel to be moved with safety, and that movement was still in progress. Before he ventured to start his engine, he should have fully satisfied himself that the object for which he had been requested to stop had been accomplished. Why he could not have ascertained that it was not accomplished by his own personal inspection it is difficult to conceive; for the proof is overwhelming that the Fair Lady was in plain sight, but a few yards from the side of his ship, with quite a number of men on her, engaged at that moment in the act of hauling her past his ship.

Q. B.]

CARR AND ANOTHER v. MONTEFIORI.

If he looked at all, with any desire to ascertain the true condition of the Fair Lady, he could only have failed to discover it through great carelessness and inattention. A proper precaution, I think, for him to have taken, would have been to have hailed those in charge of the moving vessel, and thus ascertained from them the condition of things. Some evidence was offered by the claimants to prove that it is a custom for steam propellers to work their screws in the slips of this city; and it has been argued that this is a custom of which the libellants were bound to take notice, and against the consequences of which they should have taken precaution, by holding their barge with stronger lines and more force. An accomplished navigator was examined as an expert, who testified to the custom referred to, and also gave it as his opinion that the movement of the Fair Lady, with no more secure lines than she had out when she was moved, was negligence under the circumstances. But one element upon which he founds his opinion consists in the assumption that the screw of the George Washington was liable to be put in motion at any minute. If the custom exists at all, it must be reasonable and strictly construed. No custom has been proved in this case broad enough to include the assumption of the experts, that propellers may start their screws at any moment without notice to vessels in the same slip and within reach of the dangerous currents produced by their motion, and thus throw upon such vessels the obligation of using perpetual vigilance and extraordinary means of protection. But, whatever may have been the rights of the George Washington under any custom when she had stopped her screw for the purpose of allowing the libellants to move the boats, the latter had a right to rely on its remaining motionless until they had accomplished that object, provided they were proceeding without unnecessary delay. Had not the screw of the George Washington been started, the Fair Lady would have been removed in perfect safety in a few minutes; and, assuming the custom proved to the extent claimed by the claimants, I think she had so far waived her supposed rights under it for the time being as to deprive her of the privilege of then starting her engine until the movement of the Fair Lady could be effected in safety, by the ordinary means and in the ordinary way. There is nothing in the evidence to show that the engineer of the George Washington was deceived or misled by any fault of the libellants, or their servants or agents. In disposing of this case I do not intend to adjudicate upon the validity or extent of the custom set up by the claimants; but it is very clear that if such a custom as is claimed exists, the privileges it confers should be exercised with great caution, and in such a manner as to interfere as little as possible with the ordinary use of the slips by other vessels. Let a decree be entered for the libellants, with an order of reference to compute the damages.

CARR AND ANOTHER v. MONTEFIORI.

Marine policy of insurance—Port of loading.

Where it is stipulated in a marine policy of insurance that the ship and cargo are to be loaded at a particular port, such stipulation is complied with by a constructive loading.

In Aug. 1857 the ship insured, then called the

James N. Cooper, arrived at Montevideo tons of guano on board, which she had sh. Liones Island, Patagonia, destined for Eng. small portion of the guano was wetted, remainder appeared to be in good condition. The part that was wet was removed and reloaded. The ship had been thoroughly repaired. The ship and cargo were then put up for sale, and by Da Costa Brothers, of Montevideo, who bought the ship Dos Hermanos. They determined to send her to Cork or Falmouth, to call for orders to return to port in the United Kingdom, and it was arranged that Messrs. Jacobs and Co., of Montevideo, should advance 4000*l.* on the security of the ship and cargo which were consigned to their London agent Carr, Josling and Co. (the plts.). This arrangement was carried out, and Da Costa Brothers requested to effect an insurance on the cargo. They accordingly did so with the James N. Cooper, of which the deft. is chairman, but nothing was said as to the cargo having been partially wet. The face of the policy the insurance was issued on was as "on the ship Dos Hermanos and her cargo, to and from a port or ports in the river Plate to the United Kingdom." The declaration averring the making of the policy, stated that the ship, with the goods on board, departed on her voyage, and during the continuance of the voyage was obliged to put into a port of refuge, where she was found unfit to proceed on her voyage, and thereon it became necessary to sell her cargo, and they were sold accordingly and wholly lost. The breach laid was the non-payment of the insurance money. The deft. pleaded in answer to this declaration, of which the only material part was that the goods were not shipped on board at any port or ports in the river Plate. The plt. joined issue upon the above plea, and demurred to it, on the ground that the non-payment of the whole of the goods in the river Plate was an answer to the action. The question for the court was, whether the plts. were entitled to recover the policy in respect of both ship and cargo, or either and which of them.

E. James, Q. C. (Millward and Potter with him) appeared for the plt., and contended that the policy covered the cargo:

Rickman v. Carstairs, 5 B. & Ad. 651;
Robertson v. French, 4 East, 130;
Nonnen v. Kettlewell, 16 East, 176;
Gladstone v. Clay, 1 M. & S. 418;
Bell v. Hobson, 16 East, 240.

Brett, Q. C. (T. Jones and Cohen with him) appeared for the defts. that, to enable the plts. to recover the cargo must have been loaded at the port named in the policy, and moreover that the insurers must have been informed of the fact that the cargo had been wetted:

E. James, Q. C. in reply:

Boyd v. Dubois, 3 Camp. 133.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I think our judgment will be for the plts. Two points were made by the defts. in this case on which our opinion is required. First, it was said, the risk, according to the policy, being upon a cargo loaded at Montevideo, and the cargo having been, in fact, loaded at Liones Island, in Patagonia therefore, follows the rule laid down in the earlier cases on the subject, that if the terms of the policy had not been complied with, the cargo would not be covered. Secondly, it was said that material facts had been concealed from the underwriters. As to the first point, it is, no doubt, true that there was no actual loading at Montevideo; and if the at establish the proposition that an actual loading must take place at the port named in the policy, then the defence raised here is a sufficient one. But the case of James v. Ketticwell, 16 East, 176, establishes the proposition that there may be a constructive loading. There the cargo had been loaded at one port, and then entered another, viz., that named in the policy, where a portion of it was removed, examined by the customs-house officers for excise purposes, the duty ascertained on it, and then it was replaced in the vessel. This reloading of part was held a sufficient loading of the whole cargo to satisfy the policy. A constructive loading therefore will be sufficient. Then arises the question, whether there has been such a constructive loading here. It seems that a part of the cargo was taken out in order to ascertain the condition of the ship. The ship was then repaired, and the cargo replaced. These circumstances make the case very similar to Norman v. Ketticwell, but I prefer rather to take the broader ground, that at least there was an entire change in the ownership of the goods and the vessel, and a partial change of destination. This made the voyage commenced from that port a new adventure. I also consider that the cargo was constructively loaded at Montevideo. I do not pronounce any opinion upon the cases to which Norman v. Ketticwell is an exception. It is, however, quite clear that Lord Ellenborough thought, in Bell v. Hobson, 16 East, 240, that they had been pushed quite far enough. To decide the second point, we need give no opinion upon the case of Dupl v. Dubois, 2 Camp. 183, though it certainly does seem to me a very strong thing to say that when articles containing the germs of their probable destruction, such for example as hemp, are placed in a damaged condition on board a vessel, the owner need not be told of it. However, we need not positively decide whether that case is right or wrong. Here a part of the cargo was lost, but that part was landed, and doubtless got dry before it was replaced in the ship. But, even assuming that some damage was done, it is very likely that neither Da Costa Brothers, nor Jacobs and Co., had any knowledge of the circumstances. On these grounds, therefore, I think our judgment should be for the plaintiff.

WILSON v. NELSON.

WILSON v. NELSON.

Marine policy—Valued or open—Construction.

*A marine policy in the usual printed form with blanks for the particulars to be inserted in writing, contained, when filled up, after the words "the said ship and goods are and shall be valued at 1," the words in writing "as under." At the foot of the policy was written "1800*l.* on freight warranted free from capture, &c."*

Held, that the memorandum at the foot referred to the insurable interest and not to the value of the subject-matter of the insurance, and that therefore the policy was an open one.

Action upon a policy of insurance upon the ship George from Quebec to Antwerp.

At the trial before Shew, J., in London, after last Hilary Term, various objections were raised by the defendant, but it was now conceded that they were unavailing unless it could be established that the policy was a valued one, and not an open one. The verdict passed for the plaintiff.

The policy was in the ordinary printed form with blanks left for the particulars to be inserted in ink. At the head of the policy in the margin was "1800*l.* on freight." After the words, "the said ship, &c., goods and merchandises, &c., for so much as concerns the assured by agreement between the assured and insurers in this policy are and shall be valued at," were interpolated in writing the words "as under." Then at the foot of the policy in the margin were the words "1800*l.* on freight, warranted free from capture, seizure, piracy, detention, or the consequence of any attempt thereto."

A rule nisi having been obtained to enter the verdict for the defendant, Bocill and Watkin Williams appeared to show cause, but were stopped by the Court.

Archibald in support of the rule (E. Jones, Q.C. with him).—The words "as under" being written in ink show that it was the intention to express the value on the face of the policy, and it is only reasonable to presume that the 1800*l.* mentioned at the foot of the policy was the value at which the parties set the freight.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of opinion that this is not a valued policy. When the parties say 1800*l.* on freight warranted free from capture, &c., they do not mean to say that the subject-matter of the freight is valued at that amount, but the object is only to specify the amount of the insurance, and the subject-matter of it, and if they meant that it should be a valued policy they should put in the words "freight valued at so much." Here I think it should be construed that the parties do mean to insure 1800*l.* on freight, but that no value is put as applicable to that freight.

BLACKBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion that this is not a valued policy. The insurers bind themselves each in proportion to his subscription to make good the loss to the insured in proportion to the sum insured; and in order to ascertain what that proportion is, it is necessary to know the whole amount insured. Then it is necessary to see what the loss is. That depends in an open policy on what was the value of the subject-matter insured. But the parties may agree that the subject-matter shall be valued at a certain sum, so as to render proof of its real value unnecessary; and if they do this the policy is called a valued one. But then it must appear on the face of the policy that the subject-matter of the insurance is so valued, and that may be expressed in various ways. So that it becomes a question of construction of the policy, does it show that the parties have affixed the value to the subject-matter of the insurance? The policy here is in the ordinary printed form up to the words "valued at," and then follow the words "as under" in writing. Then looking below we find in the margin the words "1800*l.* on freight warranted free from capture, &c." Construing those words in their grammatical sense, they mean that the insurance is 1800*l.* on freight, and not that the freight is valued at 1800*l.* There was no evidence of any mercantile usage as governing this form of the document given at the trial, and I therefore give my judgment simply on the grammatical sense of the words.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the reasons already given by my learned brothers. Mr. Archibald admits that the meaning of the words are ambiguous, and if so that seems fatal to his contention.

SEW, J.—I am of the same opinion.

LLOYD v. GUIBART.

Tuesday, May 31, 1864.

LLOYD v. GUIBART.

Ship—Bottomry bond—Liability of owner of foreign ship—Money paid by freighter to release cargo.

The master of a French ship undertook by charter-party to convey cargo belonging to plt. from West Indies to Liverpool. The vessel put into Fayal in distress, where the master hypothecated the vessel for repairs. On her arrival in this country proceedings were had in the Admiralty Court on the bottomry bond, and plt. obliged to pay money to release the cargo. To an action on an implied promise to indemnify the plt., the defts. pleaded that the ship was a French ship, and the defts. French subjects domiciled in France, and that by the law of France the owners of any French ship may in all cases free themselves from the acts and engagements of the master by the abandonment of the ship and freight, and that they had done so. The plt. demurred to this plea, and also replied (secondly), that the plt. had elected that his goods should be carried to England, and that the law of the country where the charter-party was made, and where the bottomry bond was given, was similar to the law of England, and not to that of France. To this replication the defts. demurred:

Held, that the deft. was entitled to judgment, for the authority of the master to bind the owner of a ship is governed by its flag, and therefore in this case by the law of France, which must be taken on demurrer to be as stated in the plea.

Declaration:

That the defts. were the owners, and interested in a ship called the Olivier, then in foreign parts, to wit, the West Indies, of which ship one J. F. Lemaire was the master; that the plt. at the West Indies caused to be shipped upon board the said ship a cargo, of the value, to wit, of 3000*l.*, to be carried and conveyed from there to Liverpool, and at Liverpool to be delivered by the defts. to the plt. for freight; that the said ship, on the 9th Oct. 1860, set sail on her said voyage to Liverpool, and whilst proceeding on her said voyage, in consequence of injuries sustained on her said voyage, caused by stormy weather, was, by the said master, necessarily taken to a foreign port, to wit, Fayal, to be repaired; that the said ship was there repaired by the authority of the said master, and expenses necessarily incurred by him in and about the said repairs and stores, and victuals for the crew of the said ship, and other necessary expenses incident to the premises. That the said master at Fayal, and neither the defts. or any person interested in the ship being resident there, or natives thereof, or having any agent there, in order to defray the said expenses, amounting to 200*l.*, and in order to enable him to prosecute and complete the said voyage, was compelled to hypothecate and borrow money on bottomry of the said ship; that he did hypothecate the said ship, to wit, by executing three bottomry bonds for three several sums, duly advanced to him in that behalf, and which, together with interest, amounted in the whole to 2400*l.* That by each of the said said bottomry bonds the said ship, freight and cargo was duly mortgaged, assigned and hypothecated so as to make the said ship, freight and cargo a good and valid security in the hands of the obligee thereof for the payment of the said sums therein mentioned, with interest, according to the tenor and effect thereof; and that by the conditions of each of the said bonds the obligee thereof was entitled, in the event of the said ship completing her said voyage, and of the said amount and interest not being paid to such obligee within the time therein mentioned, to wit, ten days after the completion of the said voyage, to seize and arrest the said ship, freight and cargo by way of security for payment of the amount and interest therein mentioned; that the defts. had notice of the premises, and in consideration thereof promised the plt. to indemnify and save him harmless against any loss or damage which might lawfully accrue to him the plt. as the owner of the said cargo by reason of the premises; that afterwards the said ship again set sail upon and duly completed her said voyage and safely arrived at Liverpool with the said cargo on the 25th March 1861; that none of the sums in the said bottomry bonds mentioned were paid, and in consequence of such nonpayment a suit was instituted in the Court of Admiralty in London against the said ship, freight and cargo, by one F. R. Camroux, to whom the said bonds had been indorsed by the obligee thereof, and as the agent and on behalf of the said obligee, for the purpose of obtaining payment of the said three sums with interest, according to the tenor and effect of the said three several bonds. And such proceedings were thereupon had in the said court, that the plt. as the owner of the said cargo, and in order to save and prevent the said cargo from being sold by the said court, and in order to get possession of the same, was compelled to party to the said suit and proceedings, and was com the said court to pay and did pay, to wit, to the said Froux, as such agent and obligee as aforesaid, for and of his said claim and costs, a large sum, to wit, 15*l.* less than the value of the said cargo, and being above the said freight payable in respect thereof. plt. was compelled to pay another sum, to wit, 200*l.*, of his own costs in the said Court of Admiralty. An says, that although all things had been done and had to entitle him as the owner of the said cargo to be in as aforesaid by the defts., and to have had the above two sums of money repaid to him by the defts., yet have not repaid to the plt. the said sums or any part

First plea:

That the contract under which the goods were carried was under a charter-party, and not otherwise the charter-party (in which the ship was described as a French ship) was made between the plt. and the St. Thomas for a voyage from Hayti to a port in London or Liverpool, at the option of the plt. If the ship was French, the defts. were French domiciled and trading in France; and that according to the law of France "it is lawful for the owners of a French ship in all cases to free themselves from the acts and engagements of the master thereof in all that concerns the voyage by the abandonment of the ship and freight." The plea then negatives any express authority given by the master, or any subsequent ratification of his acts, and avers an abandonment of the ship and freight by the law of France would free them from the engagements of the master.

Second replication:

That the plt. had elected that his goods should be carried to England, and that the law which governs St. Thomas where the charter-party was made, and that which governs Fayal where the goods were hypothecated, are both that of England, and not to that of France.

Demurrers to the second plea and the replication.

The other pleadings are immaterial.

Jan. 15 and 19.—Mellish (C. Hutton with him) for the plt.—Under the circumstances stated in the pleadings, the plt. was entitled to be relieved by the owners of the ship. The contract was not made, nor was it to be formed in France. It will be said that a French vessel comes with a limited authority if French owners choose to compete with other vessels. But the law must abide by the general maritime law:

The Gratitude, 3 C. Rob. 240;

The municipal law of the foreign country taken to be unknown; and any qualification imposed on the master's authority by the law of his own country must be taken to be in the private instructions from the owner.

Lush (Hodgson with him) for the defts.—All contracts are governed by the flag of the ship. A foreign ship is part of the soil of the country to which it belongs, in every part of the world. The ship was known to be a French ship, and was chartered as such. And according to French law, as set out in the plea, which on this point must be taken as correct, a French shipowner gets rid of his liability arising from the acts of the master, by abandoning the ship and cargo:

Q. B.]

MEYER AND OTHERS v. DRESSER.

[C. P.]

If the master of the ship had the same authority to bind his owners absolutely, as the master of an English ship would have had in similar circumstances, the facts stated on the record would, according to the decision of the Ex. Ch. in Duran v. Benson, 3 Ex. 644, have given rise to an implied contract on behalf of the owners absolutely, binding them personally, without any limit, to indemnify the plt. And this was not disputed on the argument. But on this demurrer the statement of the French law in the plea must be taken to be accurate, and, according to that, the authority given by a French owner to a French master is not an authority to bind him absolutely by any acts or engagements of his, but a limited authority only to bind him by such acts and engagements, subject (as far as the personal liability of the owner is concerned) to a defeasance on his abandoning the ship and freight. We think that the power of the master to bind his owners personally is but a branch of the general law of agency; and it seems clear that, if a principal gives a mandate to an agent containing a condition that all contracts which the agent makes on behalf of his principal shall be subject to a defeasance, those who contract through that agent with notice of that mandate (containing such a limit on his authority) cannot hold the principal bound absolutely; and we think that, as far as regards the implied authority of the master of a ship to bind his owners personally, the flag of the ship is notice to all the world that the master's authority is that conferred by the law of that flag; that his mandate is contained in the law of that country with which those who deal with him must make themselves acquainted at their peril. There is a singular absence of authority on this subject in our own courts, but the point has twice come before the courts in America, and the decisions there are opposed to each other. In Arago v. Currell, 1 Louisiana Reps. 528, the court in Louisiana held that the limit of the liability of the owner of the Louisiana ship was governed by the law of Mexico where the contract was made by the master, and not by the law of Louisiana, treating the question as one depending on the law of nations. In the more recent case of Pope v. Nickerson, 3 Story, 465, in a case very similar in its facts to the present case, the Court of Massachusetts dissented from Arago v. Currell. Story, J. delivered an elaborate judgment, in which he collects and examines the Continental authorities, as well as those of England and America, and he treats the question as depending on the law of agency, and comes to the conclusion that the limit of the liability of the owners for the acts of the master depended upon the law of Massachusetts, where the ship was owned, and not on the law of the country where she was chartered, or of that where the goods of the plts. were sold by the master. Neither of these decisions is binding on us, but we have derived great assistance from them. The very learned judgment of Story, J., just referred to, affords a complete answer to a plausible argument, in which it was suggested that the general Law Maritime clothed the master of a ship with power to bind his owners absolutely, and that the municipal law of the owners' country was analogous to secret restrictions on the ostensible authority of a partner and other agent clothed with a general power. The authorities cited by Story, J. show that the power given by the common law to the master to bind his owners personally, without any limit depending upon it, to the value of the ship and freight, is rather the exception than the rule in maritime law. Certainly they show that there is no such immemorial rule of maritime law as that contended for. Reason and convenience are certainly in favour of holding that the authority of the master to bind his owners should be fixed and uniform according to the law of his flag which is known to both, rather than that it should vary according to the law of the port in which the ship may happen for the time to be. We think, therefore, that the plea is good. There are two other questions which we have to decide arising on the demurrers to the replication. The second replication to the plea is, that the plt. had elected that his goods should be carried to England, and that the law which governs St. Thomas, where the charter-party was made, and that which governs Fayal, where the goods were hypothecated, are similar to that of England, and not to that of France. On the demurrer to this replication we must assume that the foreign law in those countries is as asserted; but we think that the replication affords no answer to the plea. The law of the place where a contract was made, and that of the place where it was to be fulfilled, are very important on any question as to the validity or the effect of the contract; but, as we have already said, we think the question before us depends, not on the validity or effect of the contract, but on the authority of the agents who made the contract to bind the deft. to it. There is a third replication which was not relied on in the argument, and is clearly bad. The only question in the Admiralty Court was, whether the master had authority to bind the defts. by hypothecating them? That before us is, whether the master had power to bind the shipowners personally, without any defeasance?—two questions perfectly distinct in their nature. Judgment must therefore be for the defts. on all the demurrers.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

MEYER AND OTHERS v. DRESSER.

Charter-party—Right of consignee to deduct from the sum payable by him for the freight the value of missing goods.

Where part of the goods mentioned in a bill of lading were missing upon the ship arriving at its port of destination, it was Held, that the consignee had no right to set off against the freight, or to deduct from the sum due for the freight of the goods delivered, the value of the missing articles.

This was an action for balance of freight. The first count of the declaration alleged,

That after the 14th Aug. 1855 certain persons in parts beyond the seas, to wit, Messrs. Samuel Shultz and Co., at Memel, delivered to the plt. certain goods, to wit, certain timber and wood, to be by the plt. carried and conveyed in a certain ship of the plt.'s from Memel to London under a certain bill of lading, signed for the same by the plt., and there delivered (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever, save risk of boats, so far as ships are liable thereunto excepted) unto the order of the said persons, or to their assigns, he or they paying freight for the said goods and other conditions as per charter-party, with primage and customary average. And the plt. says that afterwards, and after the said 14th Aug., the said persons indorsed the said bill of lading to the deft. in order to pass the property in such goods to the deft., and that thereupon and by reason of such indorsement the property in the said goods passed to the deft., and the plt. says, that by the charter-party referred to in the said bill of lading freight is made payable at certain rates therein specified, and is made payable on the delivery of the cargo one-half in cash and the remainder by gone and approved bills on London at three months' date; and the plt. say, that before this suit all conditions were fulfilled and all things were done and have happened, and all times elapsed necessary to entitle the plt. to have the freight, primage and average paid by the deft. according to the terms of the said bill of lading and charter-party, and to sue the deft. for the nonpayment thereof hereinunder mentioned. Yet the deft. made default in paying the freight, primage and average for the carriage of the said goods according to the said bill of lading and charter-party; and although he paid the plt. a portion of the freight, primage and average payable for the carriage of the said goods, yet the deft. made default in paying the plt. the residue of the said freight, primage and average amounting to a large sum, to wit, the sum of 85*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.*, whereby the plt. has not only lost the sum so due to him as aforesaid, but the use and interest of the money payable for the same.

There was also a count for money agreed to be paid in consideration of the plt. giving up the goods without demanding payment of freight, and for hire of a ship, for balance of freight and money paid.

The pleas were, to the first count, that by the charter-party the freight was not made payable as alleged.

Second plea to the first count, nondelivery of the goods.

There were also pleas of payment and never indebted.

The facts were as follows :

The plt. was a master mariner living at Memel, in Prussia; the deft. is a timber merchant in London. In July 1863 the plt. entered into a charter-party with Messrs. Schultz, at Memel, for a cargo of timber, to be carried from there to London. Messrs. Schultz prepared bills of lading of the timber, which were signed by the plt.; among the items was one of 600 pieces of oak bond staves. The plt. sailed on 16th Aug. and arrived in London on the 14th Sept. Upon the arrival of the vessel in London the cargo was claimed by the deft. and delivered to him. Upon discharge of the cargo it was found that the 600 staves were not on board the vessel, and it was admitted that they never could have been put on board. The deft. insisted on deducting the value, 41*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, from the freight.

The deft. at the trial set up a custom to deduct from freights the value of goods not delivered.

The jury found that the alleged custom did not extend to a case in which the goods were not shipped, and gave a verdict for the plt. for 37*l.*

Munisty, Q.C., having obtained a rule on a former day, pursuant to leave reserved, calling on the plt. to show cause why the verdict found for him should not be set aside and a verdict entered for the deft., on the ground that by undisputed usage in case of goods shipped but not delivered, coupled with the charter-party and bill of lading and the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, the deft. was entitled to have the value of the missing goods deducted from the freight payable by the deft. in respect of the goods delivered, and upon the ground that, according to the law of Prussia the plt. was bound to make that deduction and could not maintain any action for his freight without doing so.

Lush, Q.C. (Sir Geo. Honyman with him) showed cause against his rule, contending that there was no such custom as was set up by the deft., and that his remedy, if any, was by a cross-action. They cited

Bates v. Todd, 1 M. & R. 106;

Brown v. Hare, 1 H. & N. 882;

Ritchie v. Atkinson, 10 E. 295;

Wigglesworth v. Dallas, 1 Sm. L.C. 530.

Manisty, Q.C. (J. Brown with him) contended that there was such a custom, and that the deft. had a right to deduct the value of the missing goods from the freight. They cited

Turner v. Liverpool Docks, 6 Ex. 543;

Gibson v. Winter, 5 B. & A. 96;

Cleworth v. Pickford, 7 M. & W. 314;

Cuthbert v. Cumming, 19 Ex. 809;

Mondell v. Steele, 8 M. & W. 858;

Cowanjee v. Thompson, 5 Moo. P. C. 165.

May 6.—ERLE, C.J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be discharged. The action was for freight according to contract under a charter-party and bill of lading, and upon the plt.'s case it was clear that the sum claimed was due according to the contract. The defence is, that part of the goods mentioned in the bill of lading were missing, and the deft. claimed to set off against the freight, or to deduct from the sum due for the freight of the goods delivered, the value of the missing articles. The question we have to decide is, whether the deft. has a right to deduct the value of the missing articles from the sum that is due for the freight of the articles that were delivered. I think that he has no right to do so. It is very clear that the general principles of law would not give the right, and in respect to this particular instance it was admitted between the parties that the goods mentioned in the bill of lading for which the claim had been made had never been put on board. There was no fraud alleged on either side, but by some mistake they had never been put on board, although they were mentioned in the bill of lading. The indorsee of the bill of lading demanded those goods of the captain, and the captain could not produce them, and by the ordinary rules of law and by the usage which I will advert to presently, there is no ground for saying that the deft. would have a right to deduct for the value of the missing articles. The deft. prayed in aid the Bill of Lading Act, the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, and that statute enacts that "every bill of lading in the hands of a consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration representing goods to have been shipped on board a vessel shall be conclusive evidence of such shipment as against the master or other person signing the same." The deft. says that this statute applies, and the plt. has alleged many reasons why it should not apply. I think most of the objections so made by the plt. have failed, and I think that Meyer, the master of the ship and part owner of one-third of the ship, is a person upon whom the statute operates, being the master who signed the bill of lading. The plt. contends that Meyer was the master, and was signing on behalf of the entire of the owners, he having one-third and two other persons having the other two-thirds, and therefore in this claim for freight it is to be taken that all the three persons interested were plt.s., and that there would be strong evidence against one of the three, if not against all. I think that is entirely untenable. It is an action on a contract, and the law allows the master making a contract by charter-party and bill of lading to sue on that contract. The master, as the owner, is made responsible as if he were the sole person interested. I believe the statute was passed for the purpose of creating a remedy against the masters of foreign ships, and to make them responsible in their capacity of master for the very grievance that has been alluded to in the argument. Because the captains of foreign ships against whom any party had a claim used to get out of port, and if they were out of port they were out of the reach of redress, and therefore the Act has made the master or party signing the bill of lading responsible; and the statute is said to be made in favour of the consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration of a bill of lading. The fact was that the deft. Dresser had purchased of Schultz and Co., of Memel, a cargo of timber, and directed Schultz and Co. to charter a vessel to bring it home. He did not send a vessel, and Schultz and Co., as his agents, chartered the vessel in question, and then the goods were put on board. It is contended that he was not merely and simply a consignee or indorsee for value, but that he was also in the nature of a consignor that he stood in a different relation from that which would be created by the mere purchase of the bill of lading, because the goods were to be shipped by his agent, and if the agent lived at Memel it was part of the case that it was his duty to ship, and any omission could be rectified by an action against the agent who failed to put them on board. Therefore he would have a direct remedy against some one who did not stand in the situation contemplated by this statute giving a right to the consignee or indorsee for valuable consideration, who, according to the contention, would be a person having no other remedy. If the plt. is a consignee for valuable consideration within the words of the statute, and the bill of lading was sent over to him representing the goods to be on board, and on the representation contained in the bill of lading he accepted the bills of exchange drawn against these very goods, he is a consignee for valuable consideration, and if Schultz and Co. indorsed the bill of lading to Dresser, he has a right to the goods under the indorsement of that bill. He is then consignee or indorsee for a valuable consideration of the bill of lading, and so far it would seem to me that the objection would not be tenable if it were necessary to decide the case upon that point. But I do not consider it is necessary to decide the case upon that point, for I will assume, for the purposes of the argument, that the deft. has the right, as consignee or indorsee, to claim that the representations in the bill of lading are conclusive against Meyer the plt. Assuming that he has a right by virtue of a bill of lading and the statute to say that the goods were put on board, though in point of fact they were not, I still think the deft. fails to make out that according to law he has the right to deduct from the freight due for the goods delivered the residue of the goods that were missing, and so for the purpose of the case taken to have been put on board. I consider it to be established by law, that in respect to a claim for freight, where the cargo delivered is damaged, and where money is due in respect of those damages from the shipowner, the freighter cannot set off the amount so due in respect of the payment of freight. The case of Dakin v. Orley, is replete with learned authorities upon that question, which say that the freighter cannot set off against the demand for freight, damages done to the goods. Neither could he, as I think it follows, deduct from the sum due for the freight of other goods the value of the goods that were missing. Misconduct on the part of the captain giving a right to the owner of the cargo is a right to be enforced by a cross-action and not a right to be enforced by a claim of deduction or set-off. The law of England I consider to be so established. But the deft. on the present occasion gave evidence that there was a usage pervading the mercantile world which gave him a right to deduct from the amount of freight the value of the missing goods; and the evidence of the deft. himself speaks of the universality of that usage. He says: "Speaking both as a merchant and a shipowner having vessels coming from all parts of the world, I deduct for short delivery in the wood trade. A vessel of mine was short of bacon from New York, and the deduction was made. I have had it done in every trade in every place." It is therefore the claim of a usage pervading universally the mercantile world, known amongst merchants and known amongst shipowners. Now, I should say that the observations made on behalf of the plt. as to the right according to law being controlled by this usage, is a claim that cannot be sustained. According to my view, the law is that such a right to deduct or to set off does not exist. Therefore it is a self-evident contradiction to my mind to say that the law does not give the right, and yet that there is an universally established usage to have that which the law does not give. If it were an universally established usage, it would be law. An universal usage which is not according to law cannot be set up to control the law. That is a good objection to giving the party the right which is here contended for. I also think that this evidence of usage was not evidence of usage to create a right according to custom. I am of opinion that the deft. cannot maintain his right to deduct the value of the missing goods from the freight, and that the plt. is entitled to keep his verdict.

MEYER AND OTHERS v. DRESSER.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion, that, but for the alleged usage and the Prussian law, unquestionably the plt. was entitled to recover the freight in respect of the goods which were actually carried, and that the deft. was not entitled to deduct or to set off the value of the goods which never were put on board. Then does the custom, or does the Prussian law help, the deft., and absolve him from the liability which, prima facie, he is under? First, with respect to the alleged custom, it is quite clear that, if there had been any particular usage affecting this case, it ought to have been read into the contract to ascertain what was the effect of the usage on the contract, and if you establish a usage and show that the effect of that is to extinguish the debt, you make a defence as to a portion of it, notwithstanding that the ordinary law would not give it. Then the usage which was proved in this case, assuming it to be valid, was to the effect that you may deduct the value of the goods, which have been put on board and lost by the default of the master during the voyage, from the freight. Now that will not answer for the deft., without his bringing in the 3rd section of the Bill of Lading Act, and without his insisting upon the effect of the third section making him as a consignee for value a person who may insist against the master that the goods were actually on board, and then add to that a contract which deals only with goods actually on board. I take leave to say both with respect to the application of the custom, and of the Prussian law, that if they were made out to be in favour of the deft., I very much doubt whether the framers of the 3rd section of the Bill of Lading Act ever had in their minds such matters as these, or that it ever was intended by the 3rd section that the consignee was to have anything more than his remedy against the master by the ordinary law for having signed a bill of lading for goods on board which he had not delivered. It is not necessary for me to express any opinion upon that. As to the usage, it appears to me not made out that there was any particular usage affecting this case. I apprehend that a usage to affect a case must be some practice of merchants laying down or creating a right between the parties to a contract in respect of some matter which is not provided for by the contract. It must be something more than a mere mode of carrying on business adopted with reference to the settlement of debts by payment or otherwise, something more than a usual mode of settling accounts by allowing a claim, and one not merely binding upon the parties only if they choose to agree to it. With respect to the evidence of alleged usage in this case, it appears to be nothing more than that in ordinary cases as between the shipowner and the consignee of goods, where the shipowner has an admitted given claim against the consignee in respect of freight, and the consignee has an admitted claim against the owner for loss of goods, or damage to goods actually put on board, people usually agree to set off the one against the other. It does not deal with cases of dispute or cases in which it is necessary to settle the rights of either of the parties—the rights of one and the other are ascertained by law; it is a mere mode of settling the account, it is a mere mode of payment in satisfaction of an admitted right, which is very often resorted to, because it is a convenient method of arranging such claims and to avoid disputes. But when a dispute does arise it is quite consistent with all that has been alleged that that dispute should be settled by the general law of the land. It appears to me that the usage is altogether out of the question.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. I am quite incompetent to say anything on the subject of the Prussian law. It is quite plain that it does not apply to this case, for two reasons. No doubt that prima facie the lex loci contractus governs; but in this case the contract, although made in Prussia, was for the delivery of a cargo in England, and for the payment of the cargo in England. This is a case in which the contract is to be interpreted by the law of the country where it was to be performed, not by the law of the country where it was made. Further than that, it seems to me, as has been already remarked by my Lord and my learned brother, that this is a matter of procedure. It has been decided over and over again in this country that the Statute of Limitations is a matter of procedure, and is to be governed by the law of the country where the remedy is sought, and that the lex fori prevails. I am not aware of any decision in this country as to the law of set-off. It has been held in America that the law of set-off is a portion of the procedure, and my Lord says in this country also. The case is precisely the same as if the contract had been made in England. If it were necessary to express an opinion, which it is not, whether the debts were indorsees for value or consignees for value of the bill of lading, I should be disposed to agree entirely with what has fallen from my Lord on that subject. It is not necessary to express any opinion whether the plts. are bound by the signature. Mr. Lush says all the plts. might have joined and might have sued. No doubt they might, but if they had chosen to sue in that way, and one of them had signed, I apprehend, as he would have been disqualified himself, so would all his companions as plts. in the suit have been disqualified likewise. As Lord Ellenborough said, in the case which has been alluded to, you cannot recover under such circumstances. If you want his strength to enable you to succeed, you must fail by his weakness when you join him. This is a stronger case than that—a case in which they have chosen to sue, to save all difficulties, in the name of the party who signs. If they take the benefit of his services as the plt. in the action, they must take the benefit with the burden that he has under the enactment of the statute, and that which affects the person actually signing affects him. Therefore, this is a case in which the words of the statute apply so far as the signature of the party is concerned. I think, notwithstanding the evidence which has been given of the custom, that the plt. is entitled to the full freight without any deduction. My Lord and my brother Willes have called attention to the authorities in which from Mondel v. Steel down to the case in this court in the last term, and also in the Admiralty Court, it has been in effect determined that neither damage to the goods nor loss can be set off against the freight. Then can custom change the law? I need say no more than this, that if this is to be considered as a general law for all mankind in all places, it is an attempt to prove the law by a usage, which cannot be done. If it is to be treated as a local custom it clearly is not a local custom. If it be a custom of a particular trade it seems to be only a mode of settling accounts. Suppose it were anything else: has there been time for it to grow up, if I may so express myself, and to act as an estoppel? From these difficulties the learned counsel ende escape by saying that it is a usage with to which the parties must be deemed to have contracted, and must therefore be considered as the contract. There is some loose evidence as to other parts of the world, but evidence at all it must be evidence of use in place there. I do not suppose they contr Prussia with reference to a Prussian custom might or might not apply in the cases which have arisen.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. this alleged usage, if it be taken to have practice or mode of settling accounts in undisputed claims, would be a highly reasonable and most convenient mode. But if it be beyond that, and set up as being a universal rule, which is to control all contracts, even in case of disputed claims, it appears to me it would be most objectionable, and would be directly contrary to that which has been held as the law with reference to the payment of and preventing parties making deductions from freight in the shape of unliquidated damages. The reasons given I think this usage cannot be in the present case, and with reference to the statute, I would merely say that I entirely with the doubts which have been suggested than expressed, by my learned brother Willes. I very much doubt whether it ever was in contemplation of the Legislature, in passing the statute to enable parties to use the statute as a created thereby for the purpose of carrying out establishing such a usage as has been attempted on the present occasion to be set up. For the reasons I think the plt. is entitled to the verdict.

RONNEBERG AND OTHERS v. THE FALKLAND ISLANDS COMPANY.

Charter-party—Costs in defending action by the plaintiffs for non-delivery of goods lost by negligence of the defendants.

The captain of a vessel belonging to the plaintiffs occasion to stop at the Falkland Islands on his way to Valparaiso, entrusted a quantity of gunpowder to the care of the defendants, which was lost through the negligence of the defendants. On the arrival of the vessel at its destination, the consignee demanded the gunpowder and upon its not being forthcoming, sued the plaintiffs for its value, which claim he resisted, but he was compelled to pay:

Held, that the defendants were only liable for the value of the goods and not for the costs incurred by the plaintiffs in defending the suit at Valparaiso, as in so far as the plaintiffs were not acting as a reasonable man should have

Declaration.—That the plaintiffs entrusted to the defendants certain goods, to wit, 40 cwt. of gunpowder, to be by the defendants safely and securely stowed in a certain ship of the defendants, called the Faithful, certain terms then agreed upon between the plaintiffs and the defendants; and the plaintiffs say that before the action brought by the defendants had happened and all times had elapsed necessary to the performance by the defendants of the said bailment, and to sue the defendants for the breach hereinafter mentioned, yet the defendants did not securely keep or store the said gunpowder according to the terms of the said bailment, but therein made default, and further disregarding their duty under the said bailment while they had the said gunpowder in their care, and without the knowledge or consent of the plaintiffs removed the said gunpowder from the said ship Faithful, and placed it in another and different vessel, and by reason thereof the said gunpowder became wholly lost to the plaintiffs. And the no defts. for that the pils. entrusted and delivered to the defts. certain gunpowder to be taken care of by the defts. for the pils. upon certain terms agreed upon between the pils. and the defts. in that behalf, and amongst others, upon the terms that the defts. should use due and proper care and diligence in the premises, and the pils. say that, although all things had happened and all times had elapsed necessary to entitle the pils. to sue the defts. for the breach of duty hereinafter mentioned, yet the defts. did not use due and proper care and diligence in the premises, but conducted themselves so contrary to the said terms, and so carelessly and negligently and improperly therein, that the said gunpowder was wholly lost, and the pils. say that, by reason of the said several premises the pils. have been entirely deprived of the said goods, and have incurred and become liable to pay and have paid large sums of money by way of damages to the owners of the said goods, and were compelled to pay the said parties their cost of claiming the said damages, and have thereby incurred heavy costs themselves in and about defending themselves from the claim of the said parties, and by means of the premises the pils. have been and are otherwise damaged. (There was also the common counts for money paid and interest.)

The defts. by their pleas traversed all the pils.'s allegations, and pleaded a set-off to the common counts for use of a warehouse and store and for money paid.

The case was tried before Erie, C. J., at Guildhall, when the jury found a verdict for the pils. for 402l. 12s. leave being reserved to the defts. to move to reduce the verdict by the amount of the costs of the proceedings at Valparaiso.

The following were the material facts in the case: The pils., who were shipowners, were in March 1862 possessed of a ship called Johnston Whiffin, which was chartered by Messrs. Smith and Gregory for a voyage to Port Stanley in the Falkland Islands, and thence to Valparaiso with a general cargo consisting, amongst other things, of 400 kegs of gunpowder for Valparaiso. The ship sailed on the 26th April, and arrived at Port Stanley on the 25th July, but having gunpowder on board she was not allowed to enter the harbour; but the storekeeper of the defts. sent the Fairy (a small schooner of which the captain approved) into which the powder was discharged. Three days after this the powder, without the consent of the captain, was transhipped into a lighter called the Lilly which on the 27th July sank in a gale of wind. Some of the powder was recovered in a damaged state, and the captain refused to take it on board and sailed for Valparaiso without it.

Messrs. Allsop, who were the consignees of the powder, applied for it on the arrival of the vessel, and upon being told the circumstances, arrested the ship. Legal proceedings were commenced and defended by the captain on behalf of the present pils. in the court at Valparaiso, and on the 18th Nov. judgment was given in favour of Messrs. Allsop for the value of the powder, together with the law expenses, amounting together to 402l. 12s.

A rule having been obtained on a former day,

Lush, Q.C. and Sir George Hargrave showed cause, and contended that the captain in resisting the claim acted as a reasonable and prudent man should have done, and therefore that the defts. ought to pay the costs incurred by such resistance. They cited

Taitell v. Bell, 11 M. & W. 228;

Brown v. Hall, 7 C. B. N. S. 303.

Knox, Q.C. and C. Pollock contended that, unless the pils. could bring forward some circumstances to show that the captain was justified in defending the action, the damages ought to be reduced according to the terms of the rule. They cited

Mayne on Damages, 2K. 29;

Lewis v. Peake, 7 Taunt. 163.

Erie, C. J.—I am of opinion that this rule should be made absolute for reducing the verdict by the amount of the costs of the legal proceedings at Valparaiso. The jury found that there was a want of care on the part of the company as bailees of the powder, and so the company were liable for the value of the powder, and would have been liable for any consequential damage for loss of powder there. But then the captain went on to Valparaiso, having refused to take any of the powder, saying he held the company responsible to his owners for all the powder. When he arrived at Valparaiso the consignees demanded the powder. It appears to me that any captain of a ship who allows goods to be taken out of his ship in the course of the voyage has no answer to give to the person who holds the bill of lading when he demands the goods from him. The captain denied his liability, and the ship was seized for the purpose of obtaining the value of the goods. The abstract of the proceedings which we have before us shows that there was great deliberation before the judge came to the conclusion he did. It seems to me the company are not at all responsible for the contract between the captain and the consignee. It is quite a separate question, and one which the company have nothing to do with.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question here is, whether the captain has given any evidence that the expense which he incurred at Valparaiso has anything to do with the wrong inflicted upon him by the Falkland Islands Company. I am of opinion that he has not done so; on the contrary, I think it was an unreasonable expense, and that he did not adopt such a course as a prudent and reasonable man would have done.

WILLER, J.—I am of the same opinion. It was clearly for the pit. to establish his right to the costs of the special damage, and that the course he adopted was such as a prudent and reasonable man would have done. The proceedings show that his liability was not a doubtful question, for he was clearly liable. He does not show that he had any difficulty in procuring the amount of the value of the goods he failed to deliver; it may be that he had nothing to do but to draw on his owners for it, and therefore all the costs may have been unnecessary. It seems to me that the pit.'s right to incur those costs had not been established.

Rule absolute.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

HILBERT v. HATTON.

Trover—Principal adopting and ratifying acts of agent—Liability of principal for agent's wrongful act.

A ship at sea having gone on shore was abandoned. The persons called from the shore took possession, brought her up to the harbour, and there sold her. Defts.' agent bought her, and wrote informing defts. of the purchase, and asked for their instructions, but did not inform them of the circumstances. Defts. wrote to their agent, suggesting the making a haul of the vessel, but asking, "You do not say from whom you bought her?"

Held, that this was evidence to go to the jury of an adoption of the bargain, so as to make the principal responsible for the act of his agent, and that trover would lie against the principal for the conversion by the agent.

This was an action of trover for a ship. It appeared that the ship had gone on shore off the Breakers of Bonny, and she was abandoned. The persons called from the shore took possession of her, and brought her up to the harbour of Bonny and there sold her. The person who bought her was a man named Thompson; he was the manager of agent for the defts., who lived at Liverpool or London, and it was proved that they were merchants doing business at Bonny river. It was not disputed that the sale of the ship under the circumstances was an illegal act; the question was, whether the defts. had adopted the contract of Thompson, their agent, and ratified his acts, knowing the facts of the case, so as to render them liable to the plts. in this action of trover for the conversion. The cause was tried in London, before Bramwell, B., when a verdict was found for the plt. A rule nisi was afterwards obtained to set aside that verdict and enter a nonsuit on the ground of there being no evidence of a conversion, or for a new trial on the ground of misdirection in the learned judge's telling the jury, that if the defts. ratified the act of Thompson in purchasing the ship, they were liable although they had no knowledge of the circumstances which made the sale illegal.

Vernon Lushington showed cause, but the Court stopped him, and called upon the defts. to support the rule.

Cohen (Mellich, Q. C. with him).—First, there was no sufficient demand and refusal to maintain trover for the defts. Secondly, Thompson did not communicate all the facts to the defts. about the purchase of the vessel by him, and there could be no adoption of his contract, or ratification of his acts, unless they knew all the circumstances of the case. The transaction was voidable, and the owners had the right, after knowing the facts, to exercise their option about it:

Feb. 1.—MARTIN, B. said:—It was admitted at the trial of this case, and no question was made before us upon it, that the sale was an illegal act; that the men had no business with the ship or to sell her. When a person takes possession of the chattel of another without justifiable cause, and sells it without justifiable cause, there can be no doubt that he is guilty of an act of conversion. Upon the 1st Jan. 1863 Mr. Thompson wrote to his employers the defts.: "I have purchased the brig John Brooks for you at a very cheap rate, and I shall act according to your instructions with respect to her." Therefore Mr. Thompson purchased this vessel and took possession of her, and proposed to act according to the instructions of the defts. with regard to her. There can be no doubt that he would be liable to an action. The question is, whether or not the defts. are so. They answer the letter of the 1st Jan. on the 24th Feb., and that answer was to the following effect: "We duly received your letter of the 1st Jan., informing us of your having purchased the brig John Brooks, but you do not say from whom you bought her," &c., &c. (reads the letter down to the words) "make a hulk of her." The question is, whether there was evidence to go to the jury that Messrs. Hatton had adopted the act of their agent Mr. Thompson with respect to the ship. I cannot see how any difficulty can arise in the matter. When an agent writes saying he has bought a ship for his principal, and thereupon the principal, instead of repudiating the bargain, says that he had better make a hulk of her on the coast of Africa; if that is not an adoption of the bargain so as to make the principal responsible for the act of his agent, I do not understand the law of this country. If he adopted the act of Mr. Thompson in buying the ship and using her, he is responsible. The argument which was addressed to us was to this effect, that there was no adoption of this contract, and no ratification of Thompson's (the agent's) act, because the defts. did not know all the circumstances. If they knew all the circumstances which made this act dealing with another man's chattel a conversion, I apprehend that the only adoption necessary was a ratification of that which was the wrongful act. Reference was made to the case of Burroughs v. Bayne, in which the matter was very much considered, and Alderson, B., in giving judgment in that case, says (and I adopt his view of the matter as to what constitutes a conversion): "Any asportation of a chattel for the use of the deft., or a third person, amounts to a conversion, for this simple reason, that it is an act inconsistent with the general right of dominion which the owner of the chattel has in it, who is entitled to the use of it at all times and in all places. When, therefore, a man takes that chattel either for the use of himself, or for another it is a conversion. So, if a man has possession of any chattel, inconsistent with my general dominion over it, and the use which at all times and in all places I am entitled to make of it, that consequently amounts to an act of conversion." I am of opinion that in this case this rule ought to be discharged. I am authorised by Bramwell, B. to say that in his opinion the rule ought to be discharged.

Rule discharged.

LLOYD v. THE GENERAL IRON SCREW COLLIER COMPANY (LIMITED).

Liability of shipowner—Damage of the sea—Accident. The plt. shipped goods on board defts.' vessel to be safely and securely carried from Genoa to London, and there delivered, "barratry of master or mariner," "accidents," "damage of the sea," &c. excepted. Defts. vessel when at sea, by the gross carelessness, negligence, mismanagement and improper conduct of defts. servants and mariners, ran foul of and struck against another vessel, whereby plt.'s goods on board were damaged and lost:

Held, that defts. were liable to the plt. for such loss.

This was a demurrer to a replication in an action brought for not safely conveying goods from Genoa to London, in a vessel called the Black Prince, under a bill of lading which excepted the act of God and other perils, including all accidents and damage of the seas and navigation of whatsoever nature or kind. It was alleged that, through the gross negligence of the defts.' servants, the Black Prince ran against the ship Araxes, whereby the vessel was damaged and the goods lost.

Declaration stated that

Defts. were owners of the Black Prince, lying at anchor at Genoa, and bound on a voyage from that port to London; the plt. caused to be delivered to the defts. and they received certain goods of the plt. to be by them shipped on board the said steam-vessel and safely and securely carried thereby from the said port of Genoa to the said port of London, and there to be delivered to the plt. or his assigns (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, pirates, robbers, thieves, barratry of master or mariners, restraint of princes and rulers, fire accident, or damage from machinery, boilers, steam, or from other goods by contact, sweating, leaking, or otherwise and accidents or damage of the seas, rivers, and steam navigation of what nature or kind soever excepted), by or they paying freight for the said goods in cash on ship's arrival, free of interest, at the rate of 50s. per ton of twenty hundred weights, gross weights, with 15 per cent. primage and average accustomed. The defts. did not safely and securely carry and deliver the said goods, but took such bad and improper care of their said steam-vessel, and navigated directed and managed it in so careless, negligent and improper manner, that by and through the gross carelessness, negligence, mismanagement and improper conduct of the defendants, their servants and mariners in that behalf, and without otherwise, the steam-vessel with great force and violence rammed of and struck against a certain other vessel, to wit, the Steam wherry pl't's goods on board defts.' vessel were wrecked and the goods became wholly lost to the pl't.

Plea :

1 That defts. were prevented from carrying and delivering the goods agreeably to the terms upon which they received the same by the excepted perils.

Replication :

That the supposed excepted perils in the third plea mentioned, consisted wholly of the collision in the declaration mentioned, that the collision arose and was wholly caused, and the said supposed perils were incurred by and through the gross carelessness, negligence, mismanagement and improper conduct of defts. by their servants and mariners in that behalf and not otherwise, and that defts. were not prevented from carrying and delivering the said goods by the said excepted perils, or any of them, further or otherwise than in this replication mentioned.

Demurrer and joinder.

Jury, Q. C. (Haines and Coker with him).—There is no material difference between this bill of lading and the ordinary common form; the same construction is not to be put on these words in a bill of lading as in a policy of insurance. The object of a policy of insurance is to indemnify against perils of the sea; that of a bill of lading is safe carriage. In insurance cases you look to the proximate cause, in bills of lading to the real cause, and the real cause here was the defts.' negligence; their servants' negligence is their negligence. The terms of the bill of lading, as stated in the declaration, do not exempt the defts. from liability for loss which was occasioned by their negligence. Independently of any special contract, they were liable for the consequences of their negligence in and about the carrying of the goods, although those consequences may be lost by the perils of the sea within the meaning of a policy of insurance. Collision is only part of the sea when it is without fault or negligence.

Mr Geo. Hoagman (Lush, Q. C. with him). for the defts. argued that they were protected by the exception in the bill of lading; by the terms of the bill of lading they were exonerated from responsibility for collisions at sea, of whatever character they may be. The terms of the bill of lading exonerate shipowners from responsibility for damage arising from perils covered by insurance; and underwriters would be responsible for the collision in question. The insertion in the excepted parts of barratry shows that the defts. were to be protected from liability for the wrongful acts of the master and crew. The allegation of negligence in the defts.' servants was wholly immaterial and surplage. Neither the declaration nor the replication charge the defts. themselves with any negligence. Under this bill of lading the shipowner was protected from liability from collision at sea, however caused, whether by negligence of his own servants or not, and pl't's remedy was against the underwriters, if insured; and if not, then he must be considered to have taken upon himself all the risk. In Story on Bailments, sect. 515, it is said, "If a carrier-ship should be struck with lightning and thereby her cargo should be totally destroyed, although there may have been some negligence or misconduct of the master and crew in the voyage, still it seems that the whole loss will or may be attributed to the perils of the sea as causa proxima, notwithstanding any such negligence or misconduct."

[MAX CASE—VOL. II.]

Smith v. Scott, 4 Taunt. 126;

Bleeker v. Shippard, 14 Mass. P. C. C. 471.

POLLOCK, C. B.—We are all agreed that the pl't in this case is entitled to the judgment of the court. The declaration distinctly discloses the terms of the contract under which the defts. were to carry the pl't's goods safely and securely from Genoa to London, there to be delivered to the pl't. It sets out the bill of lading, in which there are certain exceptions: barratry of the master or mariners, leaking or otherwise, and accidents or damage of the sea, &c., of what nature or kind soever. The declaration goes on to say, that the defts. did not safely and securely carry and deliver the pl't's goods, but took such bad and improper care of their vessel, and navigated it in so negligent and improper a manner that, in consequence of such gross carelessness and mismanagement and improper conduct of the defts. by their servants in that behalf, and not otherwise, the defts.' vessel ran foul of another vessel, whereby the pl't's goods on board defts.' vessel became wholly lost. The defts.' plea, as applicable to this matter, is, that they were prevented from carrying and delivering the goods agreeably to the terms on which they received them by the excepted perils. The pl't., by his replication, says that the collision before referred to arose, and was wholly caused, by and through the gross carelessness, negligence, mismanagement and improper conduct of the defts. by their servants and mariners in that behalf, and not otherwise; and upon those pleadings we are now to assume that this was the fact. The question, then, is, whether, under those circumstances, the pl't. or the def't. is entitled to the judgment of the court. It appears to me clear, from the authorities, that the pl't. is entitled to it. In these cases the general rule is, that you look not to the causa proxima, but to the immediate or to the real cause. There is a well known distinction between a marine policy and an insurance on a man's own life; as, for instance, if in the latter case a man goes home in such a state of intoxication that he knows not what he is about, and an accident happens to him in consequence, the parties claiming are as much entitled to the demand as if he were as sober as a judge; but here the admitted cause of the loss of the pl't's goods by the defts. is the gross negligence on the part of the master and crew of the vessel. It has been before decided, and it is now settled, that, under such circumstances, the owner is liable in consequence of such gross negligence. I think, therefore, the pl't. is entitled to recover.

MARTIN, B.—I am of the same opinion. It strikes me this is not quite the correct course the cause should have taken, and that this is an inconvenient mode at present of raising such a question. If the matter had come before me to say whether the issues in fact should not be decided first, I should certainly have directed the issues of fact to have been tried first, and before the argument of the demurrer.

BRANWELL, B.—I also think the pl't. is entitled to judgment. This is an important case only with reference to the amount between the parties, but not otherwise. The question is, what is the contract? Here the bill of lading says [the learned Baron referred to its terms and stated the exceptions in it]. The defts.' vessel running foul of another vessel by the gross negligence and carelessness of those who were managing it, is certainly not an accident within the meaning of either of those exceptions. Looking at the word "accident" in connection with the other terms used as exceptions in the bill of lading, it is clear to my mind that defts. are not protected by it; and that was the view occasioned by damage of the seas, nor by barratry, and the authorities to which we have been referred by Mr. Brett make the present case free from doubt.

CHANNELL, B.—The plt.'s replication, which is demurred to, expressly alleges that the collision referred to which was the cause of the plt.'s loss, was occasioned wholly by the gross carelessness, negligence, mismanagement and improper conduct of defts. by their servants, and not otherwise, and we must now take that to be true, and admitted by the deft. to be true. The question then before us is, I think, decided by authority, and the plt. entitled to our judgment.

TOBIN v. HARFORD.

Time policy on ship and goods.

Where a policy of insurance upon a ship engaged in the African trade contained the words, "outward cargo to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after arrival at the first port or place of trade," and was indorsed "on ship 2000l., cargo 8000l., with liberty to extend the valuation of the homeward cargo;" and the ship, after having discharged a portion of her cargo at the first place of trade, and after remaining more than twenty-four hours, sailed with the remainder and was totally lost:

Held, that the owners were only entitled to recover upon the portion of the cargo actually lost, and not for a total loss of the whole.

This was an appeal against a decision of the Court of C. P. making absolute a rule to enter a verdict for the deft. and reported in 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 21, C. P.

The action was brought against the underwriters on a policy of insurance, which was a time policy on the ship Shark and her cargo for twelve months, beginning from the day of the vessel sailing from Liverpool. In addition to the usual clauses the policy contained the words, "outward cargo to be considered homeward interest twenty-four hours after arrival at the first port or place of trade," and the indorsement was as follows: "for ship value 2000l., cargo 8000l., with liberty to extend the valuation of the homeward cargo."

The vessel left Liverpool on the 24th June, the value of her invoiced cargo being 6226l. 5s. 10d., and arrived at Kinsembo, on the African coast, on the 14th Aug., where she discharged cargo to the value of 2952l. 8s. 3d., and on the 17th of the same month she sailed for the Congo, and was totally lost on the 19th. It was proved that she had not taken any fresh cargo on board at Kinsembo, and it was admitted that she was proceeding to the Congo for homeward cargo, and would have obtained some there.

The defts. before action paid for a total loss of the ship, and also paid 43 per cent. into court to cover the loss of that portion of the cargo which was on board. The plt. however claimed for the loss of the whole. The court below held that the owners were only entitled to recover upon the portion of the cargo actually lost, and not for a total loss of the whole, and it was against this decision that the plt. now appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 18.—POLLOCK, C. B.—I believe, with the exception of my brother Bramwell, who entertains some doubt upon the matter, but does not differ from our judgment, we are all of opinion that the judgment of the court below ought to be affirmed for the reasons stated in the judgment of that court. I will merely add for my own part, the rest of the court not being responsible for what I say, that the question, as stated by Mr. Mellish, seems clearly to be, "What is the meaning of the word 'cargo'?" Whether it means such goods as may accidentally be on board the vessel at a particular moment, or whether it must not have reference to the anticipation of that which the vessel is really afterwards to carry, I think there cannot be much doubt. Applying to the word the ordinary rule of construction, I think there cannot be a question that it must mean not the accidental goods, which no doubt may be called the vessel's "cargo" in one sense, but that must have reference to something more, to be derived from the known employment of the vessel and not to that which is really a matter of accident.

CROMPTON, J.—I am of the same opinion, for the reasons given by my brother Williams in the court below, and now given by the Lord Chief Baron, who also expressed in the course of the argument.

BRAMWELL, B.—I am sorry to say, although my Lord thinks there is not much doubt about it, in my mind there is considerable doubt, and I think that my own unassisted judgment would not have come to the same conclusion. This is a valued policy on ships and goods, and it is upon a voyage where the ship is to sail with more or less cargo in her, and come back with more or less cargo in her. The character of the trade is such that it is impossible for the assured to say at any time what is the quantity of cargo on board, and what its nature and value. Probably he can tell when she goes out what she carries; probably he can tell when she is final on her voyage home what she has got—but as to the intermediate ports, he cannot tell even beforehand or by advice, what is to be given to him. In order to guard against that he says, "I will effect a policy for 8000l.," whereby it is to be assumed that the ship has always on board 8000l. worth of goods. It is said that it is a reproach to the policy. No doubt it is; but the justification of it is, that it is the least gamblers' speculation that the assured can enter into. If I had had no policy at all, his voyage would have been of a more wagering and speculative character, and in no other possible way, according to his account, can he insure himself. Therefore, although this is wagering, it has the merit of being the least wagering transaction that can be entered into in relation to the matter in hand. Then it is said that this is a fallacious view. I do not mean to say that it is altogether fallacious, because we are considering what construction is to be put on this document and when doing so it is said we may as well consider the worst condition of things that may happen, and then it is within the mischief. But it is not to

Ex. Ch.]

TOBIN v. HARFORD.

supposed that the parties have entered into an agreement to bring about that state of things, and therefore it is not altogether a fallacious argument. On the other hand people ought to construe documents not only in relation to extreme impossibilities, but also with reference to what is likely to happen, that although it might happen that there might be a couple of guns on board of the vessel when she went to the bottom, and the man would be a gainer by that transaction, yet that was not a matter that was very likely to occur. She would probably always have on board a substantial cargo, as in this particular case. At one place she might put out goods to a considerable amount, at another place she might take in probably what was worthless, but the probability is that she would always have on board a substantial and valuable cargo. But inasmuch as we have not delegated to us the power to make agreements for parties, but merely to construe the agreement for them, I think the best thing we can do is to consider what construction these parties have put on the agreement. I do not see that there is anything unreasonable in that. Then what construction ought it to receive? It is a policy on "ship and goods," and, manifestly, but for the statement of value, it is a policy upon whatever goods are on board at the time, because she is at liberty to put some out and take some in, and put them out again, and so forth. Therefore, it would be a policy on whatever goods are on board at the time, the ship being valued at 2000*l.*, and the cargo valued at 8000*l.* It seems a strange thing that it is so, making every allowance as I do for the unmethodical way in which the policy is drawn, that the body of the policy is on whatever goods are on board from time to time—that the introduction of the word "cargo," which I sincerely believe means no more than goods in the meaning of the parties, means that it is not to be a valued policy upon the goods, but that it is to be a valued policy on a sort of entity, or thing, which is called a cargo, and that you are afterwards to find what proportion the actual goods on board bore to the cargo. Then avowedly there is not only considerable difficulty in applying that when you come to construe this instrument; but it is an impossibility, because it certainly was conceded by Mr. Mellish that it does not mean a full cargo. If she took an incomplete cargo—that is a word I ought not to use, because it may give rise to a mistake; but, if she took a partial or not a full cargo out with her, and was totally lost, it is conceded, as I understand, that the 8000*l.* would be recovered. So if lost on her final voyage home with not a full cargo, the 8000*l.* would have been recovered. Therefore, the word "cargo" here does not mean a full cargo. Then what does it mean; what other meaning shall I say can be given to it? I wish to do the parties justice, but I have some difficulty in doing so. It is said it is an intended cargo, or a destined cargo, or the cargo which it was right she should have at the time, and not an incomplete cargo. Why so? It possibly may be that if they got to a port and a quantity of cargo was there, and she had got some on board, but was afterwards blown out to sea and lost before she had got the residue, for aught I know you might then say there was not; the intended cargo in that sense was not lost. Therefore, you must apply the expression here used to such a case as that. Supposing that is so, why, in this particular case, had she not got on board her cargo? She had got on board everything that it was intended she should have there; she was not in a state of incompleteness in any sense; she had got on board all that she was intended to have. She goes out with a great quantity of goods and lands some of them at this place, Kinsembo, and then she is lost with the residue. Suppose she had started with the residue and landed none at Kinsembo, if I understand Mr. Mellish's concession right, the plt. would have been entitled to recover the whole amount. She would then have had on board her destined and intended cargo, and having put none of it out it would have been a cargo lost within the meaning of the policy and the assured have a right to recover the 8000*l.* Does it not seem strange that, because besides what she takes out something more is landed at this place, they cannot recover the 8000*l.* Suppose she had taken something on board at Kinsembo; suppose she had filled up with a variety of goods of small value, or had taken some on board, would she not have had her destined cargo on board? I suppose it is admitted that she would. It seems to me to be a little strange that taking out these few comparatively worthless goods at Kinsembo should make her have her cargo on board. Putting this construction on the policy and on the words of the body of it, as I have mentioned before, no one can say that it is an insurance of the goods that are on board. All these circumstances would have made me think—of course I cannot think so now, after the unanimous judgment of the Court of C. P. and of my learned brethren here—but all these considerations would have made me think but for that, that this word "cargo" was simply identical with the goods; and consequently that the true construction of the policy would have been in conformity with what Mr. Bovill contended. It is not denied to a certain extent that the agreement between these two parties meant, "We cannot tell from time to time what may be on board, therefore we will take it, from time to time, the goods that are on board are worth 8000*l.*" That is the conclusion which I should have come to. Then, with respect to the authorities, I think they are in favour of Mr. Bovill's contention. I do not wish to go through them at any length. There is the case in East, of Shawe v. Felton, about the slaves who consumed the provisions. It is said there, that if the assured does not lose it in meal he loses it in malt; that if the slaves had gone to the bottom the parties would have had the benefit of the stores that had been taken out. But the court do not put it upon such a ground as that. Suppose it had happened that the slaves had been saved and the ship had gone to the bottom? [Bovill.—They were saved.] Mr. Mellish distinguished it upon that ground; then that ground fails him. The reasoning of the court there is very much to my mind in confirmation of Mr. Bovill's contention. In Forbes v. Aspinall, the case about the freight, there the court expressly say, that because the intended cargo is not on board, the whole of the freight is not the subject of the loss: they must take such a proportion as the cargo put on board bore to the intended cargo. I think that also is in Mr. Bovill's favour, because here the whole of the intended cargo was on board. Then a similar remark applies to the case of Curstairs v. Rickman. I think, if I had been left to myself, upon the authorities I should have decided this case in favour of Mr. Bovill. It is said, if a construction were put on those words adverse to him, that would have made nonsense of the policy, because confessedly it cannot now be said that this is a valued policy. It is not a valued policy in reference to the matter that has happened. I am at a loss to understand the meaning of the Court of C. P. confessedly acknowledging that this being a valid policy, must be left out of consideration. In what way they may suppose the 8000*l.* is to be paid I am at a loss to understand. However, I must of course concur with the judgment of the court.

BLACKBURN, J.—I would say a very few words, agreeing, as I do, with the majority of this court, that the Court of C. P. were right in their decision, and right also in what I understand to be their reasons. With regard to the real point to be decided, in my mind the fact that this is a valued policy is a mere accident, and has nothing to do with the question. I think, if this was an open policy, the question of whether it was a total or a partial loss is independent in this case, as, in my mind, it ought to be in every case, of the question whether the policy is valued or not valued. The question in all cases is, what is the subject-matter that is covered by the insurance? Let us see whether the whole of the subject-matter is lost, in which case it would be a total loss; or whether only a part is lost, in which case it would be a partial loss, the amount of which would depend on the proportion which the part that was lost bore to the subject-matter of the insurance. Then, if that is a valued policy, the value being admitted, the sum when reduced to figures is proved. If it be an open policy you must prove the value of the whole subject-matter. Then it would come to the same result after it is proved, and it being a valued policy only dispenses with the proof. However, in my mind the question comes to be, what is the subject-matter of insurance in this policy? The policy itself is made up, as every policy ought to be, of a printed form originally intended for an ordinary voyage policy altered to meet this peculiar African trade, and further altered into a time policy for six months. They get the old form of policy, and then some manuscript is left untouched and unaltered, and it is not very surprising that the document should be a little difficult to construe. Thus much appears clear enough, that this is a policy partly on the ship, with which we are not now concerned, and partly on the cargo. I think to my mind it is immaterial whether it said on cargo or goods; goods, I think, would mean cargo; cargo would mean goods. I do not think there is any great difficulty in them. It is the goods which on such a voyage would be all that are to be carried by the vessel as her cargo, and if it had been the word "goods" it would have meant that. The fact appears to be this, that this ship sailed on this time policy from Liverpool, and that it attached on this cargo which she had on board. The nature of the adventure on which she was bound to the coast of Africa was, that the cargo taken on board at Liverpool was intended to be substituted and exchanged by barter for cargo the produce of the coast of Africa. They have words in the body of the policy intended to meet that state of things, and which no doubt were framed in those terms when originally the natives were in the habit of carrying on the barter from their canoes alongside the ship, and as you parted with the European goods which they wanted to receive you obtained from the natives the produce of their country in exchange. The effect of that is, to say that if it had not been for the policy that would have applied to the goods put on board when the ship sailed, and is to continue to attach to what is substituted for it. There is the leave to barter, exchange and trade for goods, property and so on, and a variety of other words, the meaning of which is to say that this policy on the cargo that went out is to be also on the cargo that came in the place of it afterwards. In this case it appears that the cargo that went out from Liverpool to Africa arrived on the coast of Africa, and that 57 per cent. was safely landed, and the ship was lost with the other 43 per cent. on board. Nothing being substituted for the 57 per cent. which was left, it seems very clear that, as nothing had been put on board to take the place of that which was safely landed, the portion on which the risk had originally attached was only 43 per cent., and that in this case 43 per cent., and 43 per cent. only, was lost. That is in effect what was decided in the court below. There comes a further matter, had other produce been partially put on board, which would come, to my mind, to a question to be decided, and it might be a troublesome one, whether that which was partially put on board was the whole of what was intended to be substituted, or only a part of it; and that would be a very difficult question, not of law, but of fact. When the question arises it will be time enough to consider it. But the court below had it evidently present to their mind. They expressly point to that by saying that it was sufficient to ascertain the datum of what was the full cargo put on board. So it would be in this case if some other produce had been put on board, and the ship was lost. That would be a puzzling question. I hardly know how to get at this datum except by a compromise or agreement between the parties. That does not affect the present case. It seems to me to be clear enough that what was lost was 43 per cent. of the cargo and no more. That being so, I think the decision of the court below was perfectly right, for the reasons I have stated. I think that a difficulty may arise hereafter, but it will be a difficulty as to the facts, which does not arise in the present case.

Judgment affirmed.

ADMIRALTY COURT.

Reported by ROBERT A. PRITCHARD, D.C.L., Barrister-at-Law.

May 31 and June 14, 1864.

THE EDWIN.

Master—Appointment of—Wages—Disbursements—Liability of ship.

A master appointed by a person fraudulently in possession of the ship, has, nevertheless, if innocent of the fraud, a claim against the ship for his wages and disbursements actually made by him on behalf of the ship.

But he has no claim for ship's disbursements, for which he has only rendered himself liable, and which he has actually paid.

The Chieftain, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 120, followed.

This case came before the court upon a motion to direct the answer to be amended in a claim for wages brought on behalf of James Smith, the late master of the Edwin, against the said vessel, her tackle, apparel, and furniture, and against Matthew Isaac Wilson, of Liverpool, shipowner, intervening.

The petition for the pl. set forth that, in Sept 1863, the Edwin, belonging to the port of Liverpool was lying there under the sole control and management of Jacob Michael, of London, shipowner, and owner thereof, the said Jacob Michael having then as the pl. was informed, recently purchased her from Edwin Holford, her former owner, who subsequently, in the same month, and at the request of Michael, executed a bill of sale according to the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 thereby transferring to John William Michael, his son, the entirety of the ship, for the valuable considerations therein expressed to have been paid to Mr. Holford; that while the ship was so lying in Liverpool, Jacob Michael appointed the pl. as master, with wages at 15*l.* per month, for a voyage from Liverpool to Quebec, and thence to some port in the United Kingdom, and accordingly, on the 4th Sept., Smith took command as master; that the ship was laden with a general cargo at Liverpool under Michael's superintendence, and sailed on her voyage for Quebec, which she reached about the 2nd Nov.; that at Quebec, the master having, by order of J. Michael, discharged the cargo shipped

THE EDWIN.

Liverpool, took in a cargo of wood goods, and sailed from thence to Queenstown (Ireland), where he called for orders; and that, shortly after his arrival there with the ship, a person from the office of Messrs. James Scott and Co. came alongside the vessel, and claimed to take the control thereof on behalf of M. I. Wilson, as her then owner; that the master thereupon communicated the alleged claim to Jacob Michael, who informed him that Wilson had no interest in the ship, and instructed him not to allow any person to take possession of her unless by force of some legal process; that the master then left Queenstown for Hull, where he arrived in Feb. 1864, and then engaged several hands to assist his crew in discharging the cargo there; that on the 7th of that month he was forcibly dispossessed of the ship by eighty men, acting in pursuance of an alleged power of attorney from M. I. Wilson, and that 76*l.* 10*s.* or thereabouts, being the balance of wages earned by him as master of the ship on the said voyage, is now due, and he has been unable to obtain payment of it, or any part of it, from either J. Michael or M. I. Wilson, or any other person on their behalf; that in Nov. 1863, at Quebec, he made certain necessary disbursements on account of the ship, including insurances of the freight to be earned on the homeward voyage, the said disbursements amounting altogether to 480*l.*, in payment of which he drew a bill on Jacob Michael, who refused to accept it, and he (the master) has been sued for, and is advised that he is now personally liable to pay the same; and that he also made divers necessary disbursements on the ship's account at Queenstown, and at the Isles of Scilly, and at Deal, on his voyage from Queenstown to Hull.

The answer on behalf of Matthew Isaac Wilson pleaded that in the month of Sept. 1863 one Edwin Holford was the true and registered owner of the Edwin, then lying at Liverpool; that in that month Jacob Michael, by fraud, obtained possession of the ship from Holford; that the fraud consisted, among other things, in the said Jacob Michael giving, as purchase-money for the ship, certain bills drawn by and in the name of John Wilson on and accepted by W. N. De Mattos, the payment whereof would become due in Jan. and Feb. 1864, and was further guaranteed by Jacob Michael, he well knowing that neither himself, nor John Wilson, nor De Mattos, would be able to pay the said bills at maturity; that the said bills were all dishonoured at maturity, and neither J. Michael, nor I. Wilson, nor De Mattos are able to pay the same, and Holford has received no money whatever for the ship; that the bill of sale was never registered, and was, by reason of the fraud, wholly void in law, and the possession of the ship by J. Michael was without the authority of the true owner, and wholly illegal; that in September Jacob Michael, being so illegally possessed of the ship, hired Smith to act as master, and that, on or about the 12th of that month, she sailed from Liverpool for Quebec; that whilst there the deft.'s house there acted as agents for the ship, and a cargo of timber on ship's account was there purchased, by order of Jacob Michael, of the deft.'s house, under an arrangement between the deft. and Jacob Michael that payment for the said timber should be made by certain acceptances of De Mattos; that the ship sailed with a cargo of timber from Quebec about the 27th Nov. 1863, and that about the 7th Dec. De Mattos stopped payment, and the fraud of Jacob Michael was then, or shortly afterwards, discovered; that Holford was then under large liabilities to the deft., and on being pressed by the deft. for security, he, in the firm belief that the possession of the ship and the bill of sale had been fraudulently obtained from him by Jacob Michael, on the 11th or 12th

Dec., executed a bill of sale of the ship to the deft., which was duly registered on the 12th Dec. 1863; that the deft. thus became the true and lawful owner of the ship, and the said Holford has since failed; that, before the arrival of the ship, Jacob Michael, J. W. Michael, and one Thomas Early Smith, obtained an injunction from the High Court of Chancery to prevent the deft. taking possession of her and the cargo, but that injunction was afterwards dissolved; and upon the arrival of the ship at Queenstown, the deft., as he lawfully might, endeavoured to take possession of the ship, but was prevented by the act of the master; and, on her arrival at Hull, he, on the 7th Feb. in this year, lawfully took possession of her and the cargo, and thereupon discharged the present plt.; and in the last article of the answer it was contended that neither the deft. nor the ship could be made liable in law either for the wages of the plt. or the disbursements (if any) made by him on ship's account, or in respect of any bill of exchange drawn by the plt. on Jacob Michael, and by him dishonoured.

Tristram appeared in objection to the answer.

V. Lushington in support.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The question for the consideration of the court is, whether, assuming, as I must, all these facts to be true, the claim of the master to his wages is barred? The argument necessarily assumes that Michael, being in fraudulent possession of the ship, could not by any contract of his bind the ship or make the real owner responsible; and it goes the whole length of contending that the master, appointed by a fraudulent possessor, could not recover wages or disbursements. It is not alleged that the master was party to this fraud, and, of course, I must conclude that he was perfectly innocent of it. Now, can it be true, as a legal position, that a master so appointed could neither lawfully hire seamen or execute a bottomry bond, or do any other act necessary for the navigation of the vessel? I cannot assent to the truth of that proposition. No authority has been cited which appears to me to apply to this case; and, independent of authority, it appears to me that great injustice would arise from the maintenance of such a proposition. I cannot conceive anything more unjust than to subject a master utterly ignorant of the fraud to a forfeiture of his wages; and when the argument is pressed, as it has been, to a similar extent with regard to the seamen, it almost amounts to an absurdity. I shall not decide that by virtue of contract the master can recover his wages, but I shall refer to the immemorial custom of the Court of Admiralty, to look to the service done, and hold that, as the claim of the seamen is founded upon that service, and the summary petition in such cases always alleged service performed as the ground of the claim against the ship, so, by statute, the master has the same remedy as the seamen. The claim of the master therefore depends upon the service performed, wholly independent of contract, and the performance of the service, without fraud, constitutes a lien against the ship. For these reasons I shall direct so much of this answer as goes to the extent of alleging a forfeiture of wages to be expunged. With regard to disbursements, I must follow the same opinion which I expressed in the Chieftain (supra). By the 10th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, the court has jurisdiction to give a remedy for "disbursements" made by a master on account of the ship; but with regard to the liability of a master beyond that, however hard my decision may be, or with whatever severity it may operate upon him, I have no jurisdiction to give a remedy. With respect therefore to those averments in the last article of the answer which deny the plt.'s right to recover for his wages and disbursements actually made by him, the answer must be amended, but the rest of the averments in that article must remain, viz., those which assert that the deft. is not liable for bills of exchange drawn by the plt. and subsequently dishonoured, for money for the ship's use.

Collision—New sailing regulations—H. M. ships—Notices of particular customs.

Neither the sailing regulations issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, nor those published under the authority of the Merchant Shipping Act 1863, are applicable to Her Majesty's vessels.

Questions of navigation as between ships belonging to Her Majesty and those of private persons must be tried by the general rules of the sea.

The powers, if any, of the Lords of the Admiralty under 54 Geo. 3. c. 150, s. 2, to vary by notice the general sailing regulations, must, to have any effect whatever, be exercised in strict conformity with the Act.

This was an action of damage and was brought by the owners of the three-masted brigantine Promise 180 tons, from Newcastle (coal laden), for Devonport, against the Hon. J. W. Spencer, captain of H. M. S. Topaze, 2659 tons burden, which had arrived from the Pacific, and was about 1 p.m. on the 19th Dec. last, in Plymouth Sound, proceeding for Devonport-harbour. The brigantine stated the wind as N.W., the steamer as N.N.W., and the weather was represented as fine and clear, and it was almost slack water. The Promise alleged, that she was proceeding under all plain sail, close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading W. by S., and making about one knot, when the steamer was seen bearing about S. by E., distant half a mile, whereupon the brigantine kept her course till the steamer approached, rendering a collision imminent, when her helm was put hard a-port, and the steamer with her starboard side, between the main and mizen rigging, struck the jibboom of the Promise and carried it away, doing other considerable damage. The case for the Queen's ship was, that she was making about five knots, entering the Deep Water Channel between Winter Rock and Asia Shoal, and was in charge of Commander Aylen, Queen's Harbour Master, appointed pursuant to the provisions of the 54 Geo. 3. c. 150, to bring such vessels into harbour; that whilst the steamer was so proceeding, the brigantine Promise was seen near the south side of the Winter Rock, standing to the westward, right into and across the Deep Water or Man of War Channel, heading about W. by S. and making about two knots; that the Deep Water Channel is only 240 yards in width, and there was abundance of water over every part of the sound and on the shoals for vessels of the burthen of the Promise to pass over the same; that the Promise is a Plymouth trader, and it was well known to her master and those on board her that the Topaze was standing right into the Deep Water or Man of War Channel, and that there was plenty of water over every shoal in the Sound for the Promise to pass over; that Commander Aylen, on approaching the Promise, waved her to pass astern of the Topaze, but no attention was paid thereto; on the contrary, the Promise continued her course across the Deep Water Channel; that there was not room at such time for the Topaze to port her helm to pass under the stern of the Promise without going over the Winter Rock, and thereby endangering the safety of Her Majesty's said ship; she said Commander Aylen thereupon starboarded the Topaze's helm, keeping as close as possible to the Asia Shoal; that the Promise improperly ported her helm, which brought her jibboom in contact with the Topaze's starboard quarter davits; that in order to prevent obstruction to Her Majesty's ships of war when coming into or going out of harbour at Devonport, it is customary for all Her Majesty's ships in the Hamoaze and Sound to have the pilot jack displayed at the foretop-gallant masthead whenever a ship of war belonging to Her Majesty is proceeding to enter into or go out of harbour, in order to notify such fact to all merchant ships and private ships moving, and thereby to warn them to leave the Deep Water Channel open for the navigation of Her Majesty's ship of war, and such custom was well known to the master of the Promise and those on board her; that at the time of the said harbour master bringing the Topaze into the Deep Water Channel, the pilot jack was displayed, according to the said custom, at the foretop-gallant masthead of all Her Majesty's ships in commission in the Hamoaze and Sound.

The witnesses on both sides were examined and sworn, and in support of the custom as to Her Majesty's ships as above, evidence of the following notice was given:

"Notice.—The Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty have directed, in order to prevent the harbour channels at Devonport from being obstructed by vessels in motion when ships of war are entering or proceeding out of the harbour, that the union jack be hoisted on board any vessel moving as heretofore, and in future the pilot jack will be displayed at the same time at the foretop-gallant masthead of all Her Majesty's ships in commission in the Hamoaze and Sound whenever a vessel is proceeding into or out of the harbour. And their Lordships have also directed me to cause a notice of this arrangement to be promulgated at the Custom-house of this port &c., to warn any merchant vessel moving at the time to be careful on the approach of a ship of war, and that they steer as close to the shore as practicable, so as to keep the Deep Water Channel for the navigation of Her Majesty's ships. Which is hereby signified to all whom it may concern.

"THOS. SAMPSE PARLEY,

"Admiralty Superintendent.

"Devonport, 30th July 1860."

The following is the clause of the Act of Parliament under which the notice was given.

54 Geo. 3. c. 150, s. 2:

It shall be lawful for the Lord High Admiral, or three or more of the commissioners for executing the office of lord high admiral of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland for the time being, and he and they is and are hereby authorized and empowered from time to time as occasion shall require, to make such rules, orders and regulations, in writing under his or their respective hand or hands, or the hand of him or their secretary, as he or they shall think proper, for the preservation of His Majesty's moorings, and for the mooring, anchoring and placing of all private ships of war, transport and all other private and merchant ships and vessels, lighters, barges, boats and other craft whatsoever, in all ports, harbours, havens, roads, roadsteads, sounds, channels, creeks, bays and navigable rivers of the United Kingdom so far as the tide flows and ebbs, where or near to which His Majesty now hath, or where His Majesty, his heirs or successors, may at any time or times hereafter have any docks, dockyards, arsenals, wharfs, or moorings, and harbour masters to be appointed as heretofore mentioned, for open intending the same for the purpose of insuring free and safe ingress, egress and regress unto, into, to and from the said ports, harbours, havens, roads, roadsteads, sounds, channels, creeks, bays and navigable rivers, and to and from His Majesty's said docks, dockyards, arsenals, wharfs and moorings therein; and for that purpose to order and direct open spaces along the sides of, over, against, or near such docks, dockyards, arsenals, wharfs and moorings as they shall judge necessary to be kept open, and free, and to cause the same to be marked out by piles, beacons, or other visible marks and to order and direct what spaces and distances shall be appropriated to and for the sole use and purpose of moorings for His Majesty's ships and vessels of war and armed ships or vessels in His Majesty's service; and also to specify the distances from His Majesty's docks, dockyards, arsenals, wharfs, moorings, ships and hulks, within which no private ship of war, transport, or any other private or merchant ship or vessel, lighter, barge, boat, or other craft whatever, shall be moored, anchored, or placed, and for all and every or any other the purposes aforesaid; and also from time to time to vary and alter such rules, orders and regulations as occasion shall require for the purposes aforesaid; and also from time to time to appoint proper persons, to be called the King's harbour masters, to superintend such ports, harbours, havens, roads, roadsteads, sounds, channels, creeks, bays and navigable rivers, for the purposes aforesaid, and to enforce obedience to all such rules, orders and regulations, all which said rules, orders and regulations shall, upon the making thereof, and also from time to time whenever the same shall in any manner be varied or altered, be forthwith printed and published in the London Gazette, and being also placed and put upon pasteboard shall be constantly kept hanging up in some open and conspicuous part of the Custom House or other place of public resort for business in the port, harbour, or haven, for which the same shall be made, or where the same shall be directed to be in force, to the intent that the same may be seen and read, and copies or extracts taken therefrom by all persons interested therein.

Dame (Clarkson with him) for the Promise.—The Topaze was to blame. She is bound by Art. 15 of the new sailing regulations issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862: (The Inflexible, Swa. 32.) Even if Her Majesty's ships are not bound by the regulations, the rule of sea applies, and the steamer should have given way. There is no valid custom requiring a vessel to keep out of the Deep Water Channel, when Her Majesty's ships are entering or leaving harbour. As to the rule, of which notice is said to have been given, the 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, s. 2, requires the signature of the Lords of the Admiralty or their secretary, but the notice is signed by neither one nor the other. Again, there was no publication in the London Gazette, as required by the Act. But, in point of fact, the section in question gives no power to issue such a rule; it has reference to mooring, &c., and not to sailing.

The Queen's Advocate (the Admiralty Advocate with him) for the defts.—Capt. Aylen was duly appointed under 54 Geo. 3, c. 159, and proper instructions (supra) were given him. It is not necessary to publish those instructions in the Gazette. The new sailing regulations published under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 do not apply to ships of war. Under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 4, Her Majesty's ships are expressly excluded, except in certain cases, as salvage, &c., and the Amendment Act 1862 does not alter this. Even if the regulations do apply to Her Majesty's ships, they are only applicable at sea and not in harbour. At all events, the present deft. the Hon. W. S. Spencer, captain of the Topaze, is not liable; but commander Aylen, who was in charge of the Topaze. The Promise ought, at all events, to have altered her course when Capt. Aylen waved her to do so. But she evidently had no look-out at all. At least, the notice is evidence of a custom for vessels to keep out of the Deep Water Channel when the Queen's ships are going in or out. Publication in the London Gazette is not made indispensable by the Act—not a condition precedent to the validity of the rule.

Dames, Q.C. in reply.

Dr. LUSHINGTON, in his address to the Trinity Masters, directed them that, neither the sailing regulations made in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, nor those in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, applied to Her Majesty's ships of war; that the custom contended for by the defts. had not been made out by the evidence; and that the rule attempted to be set up was utterly invalid. It was very doubtful whether there was any power given by the Act to make such a rule; and if there were, it was perfectly clear that almost everything which the Act required to make a rule issued under its authority binding had been omitted in the present instance. His Lordship, however, observed that, in holding that no such rule as the one set up existed, he by no means meant to question the propriety of some regulation to the same effect, supposing it issued in pursuance of an authority clearly given and with the prescribed formalities. Having disposed of these points, the learned Judge then went on to observe that the only rule which remained to guide the court in the decision of this case was the general rule of the sea as applicable to the facts proved in evidence.

Ultimately, the Trinity Masters found that the Topaze was solely to blame for the collision—an opinion with which Dr. Lushington entirely concurred.

Salvage of life—Jurisdiction—Contribution by owners of cargo.

The payment of salvage is not governed by the ordinary rules which prevail in mercantile transactions on shore, but by a due consideration of the benefit received, combined with a just regard also for the general interests of commerce. It is a political as well as a commercial transaction.

The words "persons belonging to such ship," in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, include the passengers on board the ship as well as the master and crew, and therefore sailors are also entitled to remuneration for saving the lives of the passengers.

Seemly, that under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the owners of cargo may be liable to contribute in respect of salvage of life, even though the sailors have rendered no direct benefit to the cargo.

The old law as to remuneration for life salvage considered.

This was a salvage suit brought by the steam-tug Aid, the Ramsgate lifeboat Northumberland, and the luggers Champion and Lotus, and their respective owners, against the ship Fusilier and her owners. On the 3rd Dec. last it was blowing a most violent gale from the north-west, and at about 6.30 p.m. signals of distress were seen by the chief officer of the coastguard at Margate to be fired from the Girdler, Tongue, and Prince's Channel lightships. Information was telegraphed to the harbour master at Ramsgate, who despatched the steam-tug Aid with the lifeboat about 9 p.m., and upon rounding the North Foreland they were exposed to the violence of the gale, the seas washing over the tug's funnel, and her bows being frequently under water; the lifeboat also experiencing great danger from the very heavy seas, and although the tug's engines were worked to their highest power, her utmost speed attained was only three knots per hour. After unsuccessful attempts, until one a.m. of the next day to find the vessel, it was ascertained from those on board the Prince's lightship, that there was a large ship aground on the Girdler Sand, towards which the tug and lifeboat then went, and when within half-a-mile of the vessel (which proved to be the Fusilier, from London, with a general cargo and ninety-five passengers) for Australia, the lifeboat was cast off from the tug and proceeded to the ship; two of the lifeboat's crew then boarded the ship, incurring risk in so doing, and were requested by the master and pilot to take the passengers out of the ship and place them in safety, and then to take the crew off if necessary. Accordingly, twenty-four persons (women and children) were conveyed from the ship by the lifeboat to the tug, and in three trips more all the ninety-five passengers were placed on board the Aid, the lifeboat returning to the ship to save the crew, if required. The Aid then made for Ramsgate with the passengers, and also with an order for an anchor and chain, sent by the captain of the Fusilier. When the Aid was near the Prince's Channel lightship, a wrecked vessel was seen on the Shingles Sand, the crew of which was clinging to the mast. The lifeboat was then signalled, and she succeeded in getting alongside and rescuing the crew, which were put on board the tug, the vessel turning out to be the Demerara, from London for Greenock. The lifeboat was then taken in tow by the Aid, and they arrived at Ramsgate at about noon, when the weather had slightly moderated, and the Fusilier's passengers and the Demerara's crew were then safely landed. Upon the required anchor and chain (weighing together thirteen tons) being obtained, the employment of two luggers became necessary to take them off, which was accomplished by the Champion, thirty-four tons, and the Lotus, eighteen tons, in tow of the Aid. They left Ramsgate with their own crew and the crew of the lifeboat, fifteen hands in all, about six p.m., and at about midnight anchored near the Fusilier; and as the wind had increased and it was dangerous to attempt to put the anchor and chain on board, they remained there all night. Two other tugs were then attempting to tow the Fusilier, and the Aid's hawser was, at the request of those in charge of the ship, sent on board, and the three tugs then went ahead, and continued towing until after high water, when, finding the ship could not be moved, the hawser was cast off, and soon afterwards the tug's master being told her services were no longer required, she made for Ramsgate, which she reached about midday of the 5th. About four p.m. the gale, which had been from the west, having changed to the south, and increased, the luggers were ordered by the pilot of the Fusilier to proceed to the Nore and remain there until the weather should get finer. They reached the Nore on the 6th about six p.m., and two men who had remained on board the Fusilier—one from the lifeboat and the other from one of the luggers—assisted on the 6th in getting up the passengers' luggage and portions of the cargo. The luggers remained at anchor till the morning of the 10th, when by orders from the Fusilier they proceeded to her, but returned again to their former position, as the anchor and chain were not required. The luggers were afterwards about two p.m. of the 11th taken in tow, and about six p.m. they came up with the Fusilier, which had no anchors at her bows, and was in tow of two tugs off Northfleet, and the luggers by direction then proceeded to Blackwall-docks and arrived there on the afternoon of the 12th, the anchor and chain were placed on shore, and the luggers reached Ramsgate on the afternoon of the 14th.

THE FUSILIER.

[ADM.]

Deane, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the salvors.

Manisty, Q. C. and V. Lushington, on behalf of the owners of the Fusilier, contended that neither the ship nor her owners were liable in law to pay compensation for services in the nature of life-salvage rendered to passengers. That passengers were not "persons belonging to any such ship or boat" within the meaning of the 459th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. That the principal risk incurred by the Aid and the Northumberland was so incurred before they were aware that the Fusilier required any assistance, and not with any view to the benefit or advantage of the Fusilier. That at the time when the said vessel reached the Fusilier, the gale had very considerably abated, and that in rendering the said services to the passengers on board the Fusilier, no risk was incurred by the said vessels or their crews, nor was the Fusilier or her cargo at that time in any great danger; and that as to the claim of the Champion and Lotus, no salvage services were rendered by either of them. The value of the property was 54,500*l*.

The Queen's Advocate and Potter on behalf of the owners of the cargo.—Previous to the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the court had no power to award remuneration where life alone had been saved, and it is only where property also has been rescued from destruction that the court can take the salvation of life into its consideration according to the construction of sect. 459 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the owners of the ship only are liable to pay for life salvage, and if the fund is insufficient recourse must be had to the Mercantile Marine Fund; and in construing sects 458 and 459, a distinction must fairly be drawn between saving the lives of passengers and those of the crew of a vessel.

Sect. 458:

In the following cases (that is to say), whenever any ship or boat is stranded, or otherwise in distress on the shore or any sea or tidal water, situate within the limits of the United Kingdom, and services are rendered by any person; (1) in assisting such ship or boat; (2) in saving the lives of the persons belonging to such ship or boat; (3) in saving the cargo or apparel of such ship or boat, or any portion thereof; and whenever any wreck is saved by any person other than the receiver within the United Kingdom; there shall be payable by the owners of such ship or boat, cargo, apparel, or wreck to the person by whom such services or any of them are rendered, or by whom such wreck is saved, a reasonable amount of salvage, together with all expenses properly incurred by him in the performance of such services, or the saving of such wreck

Sect. 459:

Salvage in respect of the preservation of the life or lives of any person or persons belonging to any such ship or boat as aforesaid shall be payable by the owners of the ship or boat in priority to all other claims for salvage; and in cases where such ship or boat is destroyed, or where the value thereof is insufficient, after payment of the actual expenses incurred, to pay the amount of salvage due in respect of any life or lives the Board of Trade may, in its discretion, award to the salvor of such life or lives, out of the Mercantile Marine Fund such sum or sums as it deems fit, in whole or part satisfaction of any amount of salvage so left unpaid in respect of such life or lives.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—It is alleged in this case that salvage services have been rendered by the asserted salvors with respect to ship and cargo, and particularly in saving the lives of ninety-five persons including women and children, passengers on board the vessel. Several questions of law have arisen respecting what is called life salvage, and to the questions I will address my attention before considering the particular facts of the case. The ancient law respecting salvage of life, when not connected with the salvage of property, was, that where no ship or cargo had been saved, no property rescued from destruction, and life alone preserved, no suit for salvage reward could be maintained. One reason for this state of the law was, that no property could be arrested applicable to the purpose, and therefore there could be no proceeding in respect of the ancient foundation of a salvage suit. It is true that an anomalous case might arise, and indeed has arisen, where one set of persons exclusively saved life, and another wholly distinct set saved the ship and cargo; but, even in this state of things, the salvors of life alone could not render the proper claim amenable to their claims. When both life and property had been saved, it was the practice of the court to make a corresponding increase in the amount of salvage; and this doctrine does, I think, rest on too high authority to be doubted. The practice, too, was, that all the property salvaged, in proportion to its amount, should be liable to pay such increased rate of salvage, the ship, the freight and the cargo each in proportion to its value. Such being the state of the law and practice of the court, it sometimes happened that persons who had risked their own lives, perhaps, and salvaged life only, or so little property as not to afford the payment of an adequate reward, could not be justly compensated. In remedying this grievance no doubt the leading motive for a legislative enactment was to encourage the salvaging of life; but there was a subsidiary ground—the encouragement of salvors generally, for such reward operates as a further incentive to salvage exertions. This being so, it would be reasonable to suppose, a priori, that the remedy given by the Legislature would be commensurate to the evil, and effect no further change; but of course any such inference must ultimately depend on the words of the statute. As to the 458th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (for the effect of the 459th section I will consider presently), I think that the object of that section was to define what should constitute a salvage service; and then three special circumstances are stated, each of which, when occurring separately, would constitute a salvage service, and would also do so if in any way combined. The Act then proceeds to declare, that payment shall be made by the owner of any ship or cargo of a reasonable amount of salvage. Now, if the statute ended here, I should say that the effect of it was simply to constitute the salvaging of life to be per se a salvage service, and to leave the mode of payment to be according to former practice; for I cannot find any words in this section adequate to effect so serious a change in the law as to abrogate all former authorities and practice, and introduce an entirely new system of payment, and in effect require the court to depart from the ancient law, which incidentally, and only where life and property were saved, threw upon the cargo a part of the proportionate increase of the salvage reward by reason of the salvage of life. The existing grievance was not the mode of payment in charging the cargo in part, but the absence of all payment for life salvage. I think that the old law was only altered by this section to the extent of making salvage of life alone a salvage service to be paid as heretofore. It has been said that the words “in salvaging the lives of the persons belonging to the ship or boat” do not include passengers. If this argument be well founded, then it follows that the saving the lives of passengers is not to be paid for at all either by the ship or cargo or otherwise; or, in other words, that it does not constitute a salvage service, and that the Legislature, in defining what constitutes a salvage service, has omitted it. The contention upon the words of the statute is, that the master and crew alone are meant, but if this were so, why did not the Legislature express the intention in plain terms? as nothing could have been more easy. With reference to the words, “belonging to such a ship”—“belonging” is certainly a word ancipitis usus with reference to the subject-matter; but one of the rules of construing statutes, and a wise rule too, is, that they shall be construed according to the common understanding and acceptance of the terms; and I think that nothing is more common than to say of passengers by a ship that they are passengers belonging to the ship, and would be included under the expression “persons.” But the lives of passengers are surely as valuable as those of the master and crew, and it does seem, prima facie, somewhat strange that the Legislature, in providing for salvage for saving life, should exclude this class of persons, for the object of the Legislature must be, surely, to save all, and not only a particular designation of persons. The more extensive the construction, the greater is the reward, and the greater the encouragement to encounter difficulty and danger; but a contrary construction would be, in effect, an inducement to abandon life instead of to save it—to recover property instead, and this in direct opposition to all moral obligations, which I must consider, and am bound by law to consider, as the foundation of all legislation. I have no doubt, therefore, that passengers are included in this section. As to the question of payment, I do not hesitate to say that I have experienced doubt and difficulty in my endeavours to ascertain the true meaning of sect. 459. The word “cargo” is not to be found in this section. It is by inference only that the law relating to the payment of salvage by the cargo can be affected. That law must remain as it was, unless I can fairly arrive at the conclusion that the Legislature has intended to alter it, and has done so. This section requires that the owner of the ship shall pay salvage for life in priority to all other claims, and, in case the ship has been lost, or is of too small a value, the Board of Trade may pay what is needful from the Mercantile Marine Fund. This enactment proves the anxiety of the Legislature that salvage for saving life shall always be paid, but it leaves it doubtful whether it was intended to alter the old law, or to supply what was wanting under the old law only—whether it was intended to throw the whole burden in all cases on the ship, or only to give priority of payment when the ship was the only fund to which recourse could be had. If the latter be the true construction, there would not be much difficulty in applying the statute to the circumstances contemplated—viz., where, besides life, the ship alone was salvaged, and not the cargo. But if the true construction is that the cargo, though salvaged, should not contribute to life salvage, then the old law would be wholly altered, and the court would have to consider, when life and ship and cargo had been salvaged, first, what is due for life salvage, and throw that burden exclusively on the ship, and then to assess the salvage on the ship and cargo. This construction would work a great change in the law, and go much beyond the grievance which existed—the want of reward for life salvage alone. For what reason should I put upon the statute a construction which would, in its operation, exclude all cargoes from contribution to life salvage? Not upon precedent, certainly; for the practice has been to increase the amount of remuneration for the salvage of life when ship and cargo have been salvaged, and of that increase, in a large proportion of cases, the cargo has borne the larger share; and, be it remembered, such precedents have the sanction of Lord Stowell. Then, if the cargo is not to be relieved from bearing its proportionate burden on precedent, how stands the case upon reason and principle? The claim, of course, can be preferred only against so much of the cargo as is salvaged; and it may be said, what interest have the owners of the cargo in the saving of the lives of the master and crew, and it may be the passengers; and it may be asked, why should they be taxed for the salvaging of life; is it not sufficient for them to pay for the salvage of their own property? But is the payment of life salvage always founded upon the benefit reaped by the party who is called upon to pay? Both by this statute, and by the law before the statute, the owner of the ship might pay for life salvage when he reaped little or no benefit therefrom. By this statute the owner of the ship must pay to the utmost extent of the little which may be saved. The salvors of life must be paid in priority, even where the salvors of the ship were different persons, and that, too, in cases where it might be very difficult to affirm that the owner of the ship was benefited by the saving the lives of the master and crew, and much more difficult to assert the same as to passengers. The sole ground, therefore, for charging the ship with the payment of salvage for life is not the actual benefit received in each individual case. As to the cargo, it may assuredly be truly said, that when the master and crew are taken from the ship because of imminent danger, and the ship left without men to man her, such a proceeding cannot be held to be a direct benefit to the cargo. And only in some very exceptional cases may the removal of the passengers be an advantage incidentally. It is not then from any direct benefit to the cargo that it should contribute in case of life salvage? But the payment of salvage depends upon much higher and more general principles; and I think I am supported both by Lord Stowell and Mr. Justice Story. Salvage is not governed by the ordinary rules which prevail in mercantile transactions on shore, but by a due consideration of the benefit received, combined with a just regard also to the general interests of ships and commerce. It is a political as well as a mercantile transaction—so says Lord Stowell, so says Mr. Justice Story—as, for instance, when a larger reward is given because of the greater value of the property saved. The ship, the master, the crew, the passengers and cargo ought to be considered as one component firm, though each may differ in their respective conditions. I consider that all are interested in maintaining the great principle of adequate remuneration for salvors, though it may and must happen that sometimes the benefit conferred will be the saving of life only, sometimes of the ship, sometimes of the cargo; and I think that none are more interested in the maintenance of this great principle than the owners and underwriters of the cargo, who must have the greatest pecuniary interest at stake. For these reasons I shall decree the salvage payable to be borne by the ship and cargo, as heretofore accustomed in similar cases. The learned Judge then stated the facts of the case, and said: The violence of the gale of Dec. 3 is a matter of notoriety, and the courage and exertions of the men in the lifeboat deserve the highest praise. The principal salvors, no doubt, considering for the moment that the services were all distinct, were the Aid, the lifeboat Northumberland, and the persons on board them. I shall give the sum of 700*l.* to the Aid, and the same to the lifeboat. The services of the luggers were not attended with the same danger, but were of very long duration. The luggers themselves and the crews were detained from the 4th to the 14th Dec., and I shall give to those two luggers 800*l.*, especially on the ground of their long detention.

THE FUSILIER.

In a cause of damage, though it may be intended to contradict a witness as to statements made by him before a receiver of wreck, it is not necessary to subpoena the receiver of wreck to produce the original deposition, as a certified copy will be sufficient for the purpose.

This was a motion to review the taxation of costs in a cause of damage. On the trial the defts. had subpoenaed the receiver of wreck at Leith to produce an examination taken by him of the master of the plt.'s vessel. The deputy-registrar, on taxation, refused to allow the defts. the costs of the attendance of the receiver of wreck, on the ground that the expense might have been saved by the use of a certified copy of the examination, under authority of the 449th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. That section provides as follows:

Any examination so taken in writing as aforesaid, or thereof, purporting to be certified under the hand of the receiver or justice before whom such examination was made, shall be admitted in evidence in any court of justice, in any person having by law or by consent of parties authority to hear, receive and examine evidence, as prima facie proof of the matters contained in such written examination.

E. C. Clarkson, for the defts., contended, although a certified copy of the examination question would, no doubt, have been availed they merely wished to put it in as part of evidence, yet, inasmuch as they wanted to make of the examination for the purpose of examining, and, if necessary, of contradicting the plt.'s witnesses, pursuant to the 24th of the C. L. P. A. 1854, it was necessary to produce the original in court on the trial. This could be done by bringing the person in whose custody it was up to London to produce it. They then submitted that the expenses of such a production should be allowed as part of the costs in the trial. The 24th section of the C. L. P. A. 1854 says that,

A witness may be cross-examined as to previous statements made by him in writing, or reduced into writing, on the subject-matter of the cause, without such writing being shown to him; but if it is intended to contradict such witness by the writing, his attention must, before such cross-examination can be given, be called to those parts of the writing which are to be used for the purpose of so contradicting him; and it shall be competent for the judge at any time during the trial, to require the production of the writing for his inspection, and he may thereupon use it for the purposes of the trial as he shall think fit.

V. Lushington appeared for the plts.

Dr. LUSHINGTON, after observing that the registrar would not interfere with the discretion exercised by the registrar unless it were clearly shown that error had been committed by that officer, said that to allow the present motion would be to render the attendance of the receiver of wreck necessary in almost every cause of damage; and entail upon suitors the very expense which the object of the 449th section of the Merchant Shipping Act to avoid. That a certified copy of the examination might have been used for the purposes mentioned in the 24th section of the C. L. P. A. 1854; and that, although it might be true to say that a certified copy would not in every case be so satisfactory as the production of the original, nevertheless, answer the purpose of the law.

Application refused, with costs.

Collision—Inevitable accident—Pleading.

In a cause of damage, when the evidence is taken by an examiner appointed by the court, the defence of inevitable accident must, if it is to be relied on, be distinctly pleaded.

This was an action brought by the owner of the late schooner John Gaynor, to recover damages from the owner of the American ship E. Z., on account of a collision between the two vessels on the 25th Sept. 1862, whereby the John was sunk.

The material portions of the answer of the defendant were as follows:

ADM.]

THE THOMAS A. SCOTT.

1. They deny the several allegations in the plts.' petition contained.

2. On the 24th Sept. 1862 the said ship E. Z. left Liverpool for New York, having on board a full crew, and being in all other respects well fitted and equipped for the voyage, Richard Chandler being master. When the said ship left Liverpool the weather was very thick and hazy, and continued so to be almost without intermission until after the happening of the collision hereinafter mentioned.

3. The said Richard Chandler hove the lead from time to time on board the E. Z., and about noon on the 25th Sept. made out Ardglass Point, in Ireland, as the nearest land, whereupon the said ship bore up for the North Channel Passage, the wind being then a fresh breeze from southward.

4. The proper Admiralty lights were kept duly fitted and burning on board the E. Z., at all proper hours, and proper look-out kept, the said Richard Chandler being on the deck of the said ship. The E. Z. was then making at the rate of about seven knots the hour, under easy sail.

5. About ten o'clock on the said night of the 25th Sept. (the weather then being very foggy and thick, and the night very dark), the look-out of the E. Z. reported a light nearly right ahead of, and at a very short distance from the said ship. The helm of the E. Z. was immediately put hard aport, but before the ship could sufficiently answer her helm, the E. Z. came into collision with a schooner, which proved to be the John Gaynor.

The evidence had been taken before an examiner.

Triss, Q.C. and Clarkson appeared for the plts.

Brett, Q.C. and Charles Russell, for the defence, contended at the hearing, that though inevitable accident had not been pleaded in terms, it was nevertheless competent to them to raise such a defence if it clearly appeared upon the plts.' evidence:

The East Lothian, 1 Lush. 241.

Dr. LUSHINGTON, in addressing the Trinity Masters, observed that the strictness of the rule requiring inevitable accident, when relied upon as a defence, to be pleaded, originated in the old practice of having the evidence taken, as in the present case, before an examiner, and the depositions read at the trial—a system under which it was necessary that the examiner should be able to ascertain at once from the pleadings what the precise issues were. His Lordship added: "If you mean to charge the other party with any specific offence, it should generally be stated in your pleading. In some cases it is of course impossible for one party to say precisely in what the fault of the other consisted. But if inevitable accident be relied on, it should be pleaded."

On the merits, the COURT pronounced the E. Z. solely to blame, and decreed accordingly.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Reported by R. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate in Admiralty.

(Before Hon. W. D. SHIPMAN.)

THE THOMAS A. SCOTT.

Jurisdiction—National vessel—Salvage.

Where a libel was filed to recover compensation for salvage services rendered to a vessel, which, though not commissioned in the navy of the United States, was owned, manned, supplied and armed by the United States, and used in the transport service:

Held, that the judicial tribunals of a country cannot entertain suits in which the sovereign power of that country is sought to be made a party resp.:

That the property of a state or nation cannot, as a general rule, be proceeded against in its courts:

That the court has no jurisdiction over the vessel in question, although she is merely a transport.

The libel in this case was filed by Charles Hargitt, master of the British steamer Labuan, on behalf of himself and the owners and crew of the vessel, against the propeller Thomas A. Scott, in rem, to recover salvage for services rendered to her on the 14th April 1864. The Labuan was bound from New York to Liverpool, but by stress of weather was compelled to put back to New York. On the way back, when about eight miles east of Barnegat light, she fell in with the Thomas A. Scott bound from New Orleans to New York in distress, having lost her rudder and propeller, and being out of provisions. The Labuan went down to her and took her in tow, and towed her for about eighteen hours, till she was taken in tow by a steam-tug, about four miles below Sandy Hook, and brought into port. The propeller was valued at 200,000 dollars, and the libellant prayed for an award of salvage to the amount of 20,000 dollars.

Process was issued against the vessel, and thereupon the district attorney of the United States appeared in the suit, and filed a claim on the part of the United States, and interposed a plea to the jurisdiction of the court.

The plea alleged that the Thomas A. Scott belonged to the United States, and was in their exclusive possession; that she was bought by the War Department of the United States, and paid for out of the appropriation for the support of the army; that she was not commissioned in the navy, but belonged to a class of vessels owned, manned, supplied and armed by the United States, and employed for purposes connected with the operations of the army; that the Scott was, at the time she was fallen in with, returning from New Orleans, whither she had carried a load of powder, shot and shell, for the use of the army, and that she had been, while owned by the United States, employed in transporting troops, commissary, quartermaster and ordnance supplies; that she was armed with two thirty-two pound brass guns and one thirty pound Parrott gun, and was a public armed vessel of the United States; therefore the plea denied the jurisdiction of the court.

For the libellant were Da Costa and Judge Marvin; for resps., Andrews, Assistant District Attorney.

By the COURT.—It is a well-known rule of law that the judicial tribunals of a country cannot entertain suits in which the sovereign power of that country is sought to be made a party resp. Neither can the property of the state or nation, as a general rule, be proceeded against in its courts. In conformity with this rule it was held in the Court of Admiralty in England, in 1816, in the case of the Comus, cited on the discussion in the case of the Prins Frederick, 2 Dods. 464, that a libel for salvage would not lie against public armed ships of that nation. After a somewhat diligent search, no case has been found where a public armed vessel, or any other public property, the title and possession of which was exclusively vested in the Sovereign, has been held amenable to judicial process, unless, indeed, cases of prize may be said to partake of such a character. It has, indeed, been held that in cases of general average the masters or owners may retain all goods in their possession until their share of the contribution is either paid or secured: (The United States v. James Wilder, 3 Sum. Rep. 308.) The discussion, in the opinion of this case delivered by Story, J., takes a wide range, and it is perhaps inferable from parts of it that in cases of the salvage

THE THOMAS A. SCOTT.

of private ships the goods of the United States on board should be held equally subject to the Admiralty process in rem for their proportion of the salvage due. But I do not understand the point decided to go beyond the case of general average, where goods of the Government form part of the cargo on board of a private vessel. Still, it must be admitted that a case of salvage of a private ship, where part of the cargo belonged to the sovereign power, could not be very well distinguished from the one decided by Judge Story. In cases of general average and salvage, the master or owners have a lien on the res salvaged; but the learned judge, in the case just cited, remarks that "in such cases the nature and use of the articles, as the means of military and naval operations, may repel any motion of any lien whatever grounded on the obvious intention of the parties." These remarks were made with reference to arms, artillery, camp equipage, and such like materials of war belonging to the Government as might be shipped with other cargo of a merely private nature, for transportation in a private ship. This court is informed that the Government has invariably acquiesced in the rule laid down in the case of the United States v. Wilder, by paying general average on its own goods shipped as a part of the cargo of private vessels. Whether this acquiescence has extended to military stores in time of war, and designed for use in active military operations, the court has no means of determining. Certainly the argument ab inconvenienti against the sovereign power submitting its military materials designed for active hostilities to the unavoidable delays of judicial tribunals, is very formidable. This argument applies with as much force to the case of judicial proceedings against transport ships as to their cargoes, consisting of supplies and munitions of war. Indeed, both the transport ship and cargo would often be involved in the delay consequent upon any proceeding in the court against either. A number of cases have been cited on the argument by the counsel for the libellants in support of the jurisdiction of the court, which I will now notice. The first is the case of the Betsy, 1 Marriott R. 80. This case was determined by the English Court of Admiralty in 1777, and related to the recapture, by one of the King's ships, of a vessel which had fallen into the hands of the Americans. The Navy Board contended that the demand of the officers of the King's ship of one-eighth salvage was not within the Act of Parliament, as that extended only to ships and goods of His Majesty's subjects retaken from the enemy. But the Court held that of common right salvage is always due for recapture, and therefore, it would be illiberal to construe the Act of Parliament narrowly. The case is not very fully reported, but I infer from it that, prior to the prize Acts of Parliament, it had been, under some form of proceeding, customary for the Admiralty Courts to decree salvage to the naval officers of the King's ships instrumental in the recapture of vessels taken by the enemy, and that the custom in 1777 was expressly recognised and implicitly sanctioned by Acts of Parliament then in force. The next case cited was that of the Marquis of Huntley (decided in 1835, and reported in 3 Hagg. 246), chartered by the Government and having Government naval and ordnance stores, together with a lieutenant and several invalid soldiers, on board. On her voyage from Leith to London she got on to the Middle hand off Essex, where she experienced very bad weather, and finally was relieved from very great peril by several private vessels. An action for salvage was entered against the ship, cargo and freight, and an appearance entered and bail given for the ship and freight only. When the case was ready for hearing, the court, having ascertained that no salvage had been paid on the stores, nor any account furnished of their value, expressed its opinion that in a case of such great merit, and where three lives had been lost, there ought to be a remuneration in respect to the stores, and directed the case to stand over, that the matter might be represented to the Admiralty. This was done. The King's Advocate appeared, and after stating the value of the stores, and that the Government was anxious that the salvors should be rewarded liberally, left the amount of that reward to the judgment of the court. The case then proceeded. The case of the Athol, 1 W. Rob. Rep. 37, decided by Dr. Lushington in 1842, was instituted for damages caused by a collision. The facts were these: A brig was run down in the Channel, by Her Majesty's troop ship Athol, and was totally lost. A memorial having been presented to the Lords of the Admiralty praying compensation, or otherwise that the Admiralty proctor might be instructed to appear to answer to a suit to be commenced in the court, a letter was addressed to the proctor and owners of the lost brig by the Secretary of the Admiralty, stating that the Lords Commissioners declined to interfere. A motion was then made before Dr. Lushington for a monition against the Lords of the Admiralty, calling upon them to show cause why the damage should not be pronounced for and compensation awarded to the owners of the ship and cargo, and to the master and crew for the loss of their effects. The Judge declined to grant the motion, for the very good reason that he had no power to enforce an appearance, or the payment of damages as against them. In the course of his opinion he says: "In cases of king's ships, loaded with cargo or treasure, salvage has been awarded; but no case has occurred within my recollection in which the Crown alone was concerned." The motion having been refused, on application by the proctor for the Athol, the Court directed that a communication should be made by the registrar to the Lords of the Admiralty, stating that the motion for a monition had been made to the court, and the Lords of the Admiralty subsequently directed that an appearance should be given by the Admiralty proctor for the Athol, in order that the court might adjudicate upon the question. Two other cases were cited on the argument—that of the Swallow and the Inflexible, both Her Majesty's ships (1 Swab. 30 & 32.) These, however, were suits against the commanders of these vessels, and not in rem against the ships. It was sought only to subject the officers personally, though the Lords of the Admiralty, in one case at least, directed an appearance in behalf of the officer. In none of the cases referred to, all of which I have noticed, has the English court attempted to deal adversely with the public property of the Sovereign, except where there has been a voluntary appearance on its behalf and a submission of the case to the judgment of the court, unless it be the case of the Betsy, in which I think the action of the court must have rested upon some Act of Parliament. It is unnecessary to remark that there is no Act of Congress conferring special jurisdiction upon our courts in cases like the present. On the whole, therefore, I conclude that the court has no jurisdiction over the Thomas A. Scott, even assuming her to be merely a transport. She is exclusively owned by the sovereign power, and therefore is not amenable to the judicial tribunals at the suit of private parties. The libel must, therefore, be dismissed as the cause now stands. But, inasmuch as the Government may be desirous of making compensation to the salvors in case they are able to prove a meritorious claim for salvage, I will withhold the decree for the present, until the attorney can advise with the proper department and take its direction in the matter.

TOBIN v. THE QUEEN.

[C. P.]

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. MAYD and LUMLEY SMITH, Esqrs.,
Barristers-at-Law.

Jan. 27 and April 22 and 30, 1864.

TOBIN v. THE QUEEN.

Petition of right—Claim against the Crown for unliquidated damages for wrongful seizure and destruction of suppliant's ship—Slave trade—5 Geo. 4, c. 113; and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 73.

Where a captain of one of Her Majesty's ships seized a vessel belonging to the suppliant, believing her to be engaged in the slave trade, and, without taking her to the nearest port where there was a Vice-Admiralty Court, destroyed her, whereas she was not engaged in such trade, upon a petition against the Crown by the owners of the vessel for unliquidated damages, it was Held, that the statement did not show a complaint in respect of which a petition of right could be maintained against the Queen, upon three grounds: first, that the captain, in seizing the vessel, was not acting in obedience to a command of Her Majesty, but in the supposed performance of a duty imposed upon him by Act of Parliament; secondly, that, assuming he was an agent employed by the Queen to seize vessels engaged in the slave trade, he was not acting within the scope of this authority in seizing a ship not engaged in the slave trade, and therefore did not make his principal liable for a seizure made without authority from that principal; and, thirdly, that a petition of right could not be maintained to recover unliquidated damages for a trespass.

This was a petition of right, the suppliants being Thomas Tobin and James Aspinall Tobin. The suppliants were shipowners and merchants at Liverpool, and for several years had been engaged in the African trade. In 1860 they purchased at Loando St. Paul, on the coast of Africa, the Mary and Isabel, a packet boat, since called the Britannia, for the conveyance of their merchandise to and from their storehouses and factories on the said coast. It was not registered when purchased as a British ship, neither was it intended to be brought, and never was brought by them, after they so purchased it, to any British port or place where it could be registered as a British ship, and never was so registered, and, consequently, after the time of its being so seized and destroyed as thereafter mentioned, it was not registered, and had no right to a national flag. It was then alleged, that this vessel, laden with a cargo of palm oil and red African planks, which were not spare planks fitted for being laid down as a second or slave deck within the meaning of the Act for the Suppression of the Slave Trade, arrived at a place called Cabendo, on the said coast, in Aug. 1862, and while there, on the 20th Sept. 1862, she was seized at a vessel engaged in the slave trade by and under the orders of Capt. Douglas, then being commander of Her Majesty's ship Espoir, and employed under the authority of her Majesty for the suppression of the slave trade, and on the alleged ground that she was not in a fit state for a voyage to St. Helena, being the place within Her Majesty's dominions to which she ought to have been taken for the purpose of being brought to adjudication in the Vice-Admiralty Court there touching the said seizure as aforesaid. She was afterwards, together with the oil and other property of the suppliants, burnt and destroyed by the said Capt. Douglas. That the said vessel was not at that time in any way engaged in the slave trade, or liable to be condemned.

This petition having been demurred to on behalf of the Crown,

The Attorney-General (the Solicitor-General, Phinn, Q.C., and West with him) now appeared in support of the demurrer, and contended that torts were not within the law as to petitions of right; the petition was the proper remedy where the Crown had property in its hands belonging to the suppliant, and had the ship been brought home and kept in dock, then the suppliants might have been within the authorities and the principle; secondly, that there was nothing in the statutes that empowered the captain to seize any other ships than such as are found equipped for the slave trade; and thirdly, that the Crown could not be prejudiced by the negligence of its officers. Sir Hugh Cairns (Bovill, Q.C., and Kemplay with him), for the suppliants, contended that the Crown had a right to seize the goods of a subject forfeited under certain conditions, and to appoint persons to look out for and seize such goods, and that if such person seizes such goods believing that he has a right to do so, and deals with them in such a way that they cannot be restored. Cur. adv. vult.

April 30.—ERLE, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the court.—In this case the suppliant has petitioned for the amount of damages sustained by him from the loss of his vessel, and by the demurrer to the petition, the following facts are admitted:—That the vessel was seized, as being engaged in the slave trade, by Captain Douglas; that he commanded a ship of Her Majesty, and was employed for the suppression of the slave trade, according to the statutes relating thereto; that the vessel of the suppliant was afterwards destroyed by him in the supposed performance of his said duties, and that the said vessel was not, at the time it was so seized, and destroyed, in any way engaged in the slave trade, or liable to any proceedings as if it had been so engaged. This statement shows a wrong for which an action might lie by the suppliant against Captain Douglas; but we are of opinion that it does not show a complaint in respect of which a petition of right can be maintained against the Queen, and for this opinion we rely on three grounds: Firstly, that Captain Douglas, in seizing the vessel, was not acting in obedience to a command of Her Majesty, but in the supposed performance of a duty imposed upon him by Act of Parliament; secondly, if it be assumed that he was an agent employed by the Queen to seize vessels engaged in the slave trade, that he was not acting within the scope of this authority in seizing a ship not engaged in the slave trade, and for that reason did not make his principal liable for a seizure made without authority from that principal; and thirdly, that a petition of right cannot be maintained to recover unliquidated damages for a trespass. As to the first ground, if the vessel of the suppliants had been lawfully seized, Captain Douglas would have performed a duty imposed upon him by the statute 5 Geo. 4, c. 113, s. 43, enacting that vessels engaged in the slave trade shall be seized by the commanders of ships of Her Majesty; and although it is taken in law that he was appointed to the ship and ordered to the station and employed by the Queen, still we think that the duty which he had to perform in relation to the slave trade was not created by command of the Queen, nor would he have been doing an act which the Queen had commanded if the seizure had been made lawfully under the statute. The allegations on the record show that the seizure, although intended to be in accordance with the provisions of the statute, was unlawful, because not authorised thereby. They further show that the vessel was not seized for the purpose of making it the property of Her Majesty, and if lawfully seized it would not have been in the possession of Her Majesty. But under sect. 44 the captors had the duty of taking it to the Vice-Admiralty Court for condemnation, and if condemned, the captors were bound to sell and divide the proceeds of the sale; and it could not be till after these contingencies had happened and the sale had taken place, that the interest of the Crown in a share of the proceeds of the sale, according to the statute, would commence, and under sect. 55 the captors would have been liable to a judgment against them in that court for damages and costs, if they had been found to be in the wrong. Thus, as Capt. Douglas would not have been an agent of the Crown if he had lawfully seized and kept the vessel, under the statute, still less ought he to be held to be such agent in seizing and destroying it unlawfully. Secondly, if it be assumed that Capt. Douglas had authority from the Crown to seize all ships engaged in the slave trade, so that the seizure, if lawful, would have been made by him in the capacity of agent for the Crown, still, if he seized a ship not engaged in the slave trade, he would not act within the scope of that authority, and would not make his principal liable for that wrong. Thus, where a warrant was granted by the Secretary of State to apprehend the author of the North Briton, and the deft., upon good ground of suspicion, apprehended the plt., who proved that he was not the author; the deft. was held not to have acted in obedience to that warrant, and to be responsible without a justification therefrom: (Money v. Leach, 3 Bur. 1742.) It is unnecessary to cite authorities to show that the agent cannot make the principal liable for an act done beyond the scope of his authority. The general rule is not disputed. But, the claim of the suppliant to hold the Queen liable for the act of a captain in Her Majesty's navy was rested upon a supposed analogy between the relation of servants to masters and of bailiffs to sheriffs on the one hand, and the relation of persons in Her Majesty's service to the Queen on the other hand; so that, as a master is liable for any wrong done by his servants in the course of their employment in his service, and a sheriff is responsible for any wrong done by his under-sheriff or his bailiffs in the course of performing the duties of the shrievalty, so the Queen ought to be held responsible for any wrong done by a captain of the navy in the course of his employment. It is unnecessary to cite authorities for the purpose of showing that masters and sheriffs are so liable; the law on the subject is in constant application. But, the argument for the suppliant fails, because, in our judgment, there is no analogy between the relation of the captain of a Queen's ship to the Queen, and the relation of servant to master or bailiff to sheriff, so as to create the liability here in question. The liability of a master for the act of his servant attaches in the case where the will of the master directs both the act to be done and the agent who is to do it. The act of the servant is then held to be the act of the master, and the servant acting in the course of his employment is a general agent on that employment, and makes his principal liable for all that he does within the scope of his authority as such general agent; and further, in respect of all his acts within the scope of that authority, they are the acts of the principal, notwithstanding any private arrangement to the contrary between the principal and such agent. This doctrine is frequently exemplified in cases of collision either on land or water. The master is liable for the act of the coachman employed by him to drive his horses whether he was so employed for a single drive, or in constant service, and, notwithstanding the orders were to drive slowly and on the proper side, and the coachman drove fast or on the wrong side, the master is held responsible upon the ground that he has put the servant in his place to perform a service ordered by himself, and over which he has absolute control at all times. It is needless to cite the cases showing where the liability attaches but we refer to some classes of decisions in which the limits of the liability are defined in order to show that the analogy supposed by the suppliant does not exist. When the duty to be performed is imposed by law and not by the will of the party employing the agent, the employer is not liable for the wrong done by the agent in such employment. On this principle it has been declared that "superior public officers such as the Postmaster-General, the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury, the Commissioners of Customs and Excise, the Auditors of the Exchequer and the like, are not responsible for the negligence or misconduct of inferior officers in their several departments, though the superior officers appointed them and had the power of dismissing them." See Whitfield v. Lord L'Despencer, Cowp. 754. So also unpaid trustees appointed under Acts of Parliament for local purposes employing men to perform a public duty are exempt from some of the responsibility which is incurred by the employer of men to work for his own interest. (Sutton v. Clark, 6 Taunt. 29; Baker v. Harris, 4 M. & S. 26; and Duncan v. Findlater, 6 C. & F. 903.) So also the captain of a ship employing a pilot is not responsible for damage caused by the ship when under the control of the pilot, for the pilot performs a duty imposed by Act of Parliament, and is not under the control of the captain. (Lucey v. Ingram, 6 M. & W. 302.) So the employer of a licensed drover whose helper caused damage is not responsible, because the drover has a distinct calling and a duty imposed by law, and the helper was the servant of the driver: (Milligan v. Wedge, 12 A. & E. 737.) Furthermore, where the agent is not appointed by the will of the employer, such employer is not responsible for the wrong done by the agent. Thus the employer of a contractor to perform a contract for work by himself and his workmen is not responsible for the contractor's workmen as he did not choose them: (Rendle v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 4 Ex. 244.) So the hirer of horses to be driven by the coachman of the horse letter is not responsible for that coachman for the same reason: (Laugher v. Pointer, 5 B. & C. 547; Quarman v. Burnett, 6 M. & W. 499.) Furthermore, where the wrong is done in the performance of an act by the servant which the master has not directed, the master is not responsible. Thus, where the coachman had driven his master's carriage to the stable, and then drove out again for a purpose of his own without his master's order, and contrary to his duty, and in so driving caused damage, the master was not responsible. The drive was not by his order, and he therefore was not driving by the hand of his servant: (Mitchell v. Crassweller, 13 C. B. 237.) Upon this review of the cases we think that the supposed analogy between the relation of the Queen to a captain in Her Majesty's navy, and the relation of a master to a servant fails in the following respects: First, that the Queen does not appoint a captain to a ship by her own mere will as a master chooses a servant, but through an officer of state, responsible for appointing a man properly qualified; and, secondly, that the will of the Queen alone does not control the conduct of the captain in his movements, but a sense of professional duty; and, thirdly, because the act complained of was not done by order of the Queen, but by reason of a mistake in the path of duty. Then, with respect to the supposed analogy to the responsibility of the sheriff for his under-sheriffs and bailiffs, we think we need not distinguish it further than by saying that the sheriff is under responsibility which is peculiar to that office. The under-sheriff is a general agent for the sheriff in respect of the duties of the shrievalty in the fullest extent, with the unusual power for a deputy to appoint a deputy, and make the principal responsible for every act of a bailiff done under a warrant issued by the under-sheriff; and as we do not suppose that the suppliant would place any real reliance on the responsibility of the sheriff for his bailiff, as of itself establishing the responsibility of the Queen for every party employed in the administration of Government, we do not say more on the point than that on these two narrower grounds our judgment is for the Crown. On the third ground above mentioned, namely, that a petition of right cannot be maintained to recover unliquidated damages for a trespass, our judgment is also for the Crown. The complaint is of a wrong done in destroying a ship, and the claim is for damages, the same as might have been awarded if, instead of a petition of right, an action of trespass had been brought against the trespasser. For the purpose of showing that a petition of right cannot be maintained for this complaint, we propose to refer, first, to the principle that the Sovereign cannot be guilty of a wrong, and so cannot be made liable to pay damages for a wrong of which he cannot be guilty; and then to the authorities which show where a petition of right will and will not lie, premising that the statute 23 & 24 Vict. c. 35 alters only the form of procedure to be adopted by suppliants resorting to a petition of right, and does not alter the law relating to the subjects for which the petition can be maintained, it being declared by sect. 7 that no remedy is thereby given which was not before existing. The maxim, that "the King can do no wrong" is true in the sense that he is not liable to be sued civilly or criminally for a supposed wrong: that which the Sovereign does personally the law presumes will not be wrong; that which the Sovereign does by command to his servants cannot be a wrong in the Sovereign, because if the command is unlawful it is in the law no command, and the servant is responsible for the unlawful act, the same as if there had been no command. Lord Hale says: "The law presumes the King will do no wrong, neither, indeed, can do any wrong, and, therefore, if the King command an unlawful act to be done, the offence of the instrument is not therefore indemnified. But, though the King is not under the coercive power of the law, yet in many cases his commands are under the directive control of the law, which consequently makes the act itself invalid, if unlawful, and so renders the instrument of the execution thereof obnoxious to the punishment of the law." Lord Coke also says to the same effect, in commenting on the pro ceptum Regis in the statute Westminster 2nd (2nd Inst. 186): "The King being a body politick cannot command, but by matter of record, rex præcipit and lex præcipit are all one; for the King must command by matter of record, according to the law;" and he adds: "Markham said to King Edw. IV. that the King could not arrest any man for suspicion of felony as any of his subjects might, because if the King did wrong the party could not have his action. If the King command me to arrest

TOBIN v. THE QUEEN.

a man, and I do arrest, he shall have his action for false imprisonment against me, albeit he was in the King's presence;" and he adds Bracon says: "Nihil aliud Rex potest quam quod de jure potest." To the same effect is 3rd Bl. 246: "The King can do no wrong, which antient and fundamental maxim is not to be understood as if every transaction by the Government was of course just and lawful, but means only two things: first, whatever is exceptionable in the conduct of public affairs is not to be imputed to the King, nor is he answerable for it personally to his people; for this doctrine would destroy the constitutional independence of the Crown; and, secondly, that the prerogative of the Crown extends not to do any injury." This maxim has been constantly recognised, and the notion of making the King responsible in damages for a supposed wrong tends to consequences that are clearly inconsistent with the duty of the Sovereign. We come now to the authorities showing where the petition of right will and will not lie. We pass the class of claims founded on contracts and grants made on behalf of the Crown with brief notice, because they are within a class legally distinct from wrongs. In the Bankers' case, 14 State Trials, 83, Lord Somers so treats them, giving various instances of petitions for money on account of wages, and work, and debts, and goods, founded on contract, and he makes no allusion to a claim against the King for damages for a wrong. We pass from the class of claims on contract in all systems of law distinguished from claims found on wrong, and proceed to the more numerous class of claims where petitions of right have been brought in respect of property either wrongfully taken on behalf of the Crown or wrongfully withheld. As a general principle, property does not pass from the subject to the Crown without matter of record. In the time of feudal tenures rights in property accrued to the Crown on very many occasions, and officers had the duty of enforcing the rights of the Crown. The right accrued on some of the occasions by matter of record, and on other occasions powers existed for making the right matter of record by office found. The officer seized or justified seizure under these records, and their right to seize was a subject of frequent contest, tried either by petition of right, or monstrans de droit, or traverse of the office found. It has been said that the petition of right took its origin under Edw. I, and was substituted for a præcipe against the King; and it has been suggested that, if the fact were so, it would indicate that an action lay against the King where it would lie against a subject, that is, where a præcipe might issue. But, in our opinion, the point relates to procedure only, and not to the law of right, and therefore is not material on the present inquiry. The authority for the notion is found in Fitz. placit. 8, in the 22 Edw. 3. A petition of right had been referred to Parliament, and the Parliament ended, and it was decided that the petition of right was thereby brought to an end also. At the end of the placitum containing this decision, Fitzherbert adds: "Et fuit dit qu' en temps le Roi Henry et devant le Roi fuit implede come tous autres homines, Edward Roi son Fitz ordeign que homines sue voit versus Roi per petition mes unques Roi ne seriot adjudge sinon per eux memes et lour justiciariis." I had better read it in English, though I have set it out in French: "And it was said that in the time of King Henry 6, the King was impleded as every other common man, but Edward King his son ordained that men should sue against the King by petition, yet the Kings should not be adjudged but by them and this justicia." To this we subjoin a counter authority from Brostali Petition, placitum 12, c. 24, Edw. 3, where Wilby, speaking of a petition in some cases, and a traverse of office, in others, "dixit qu'il anera tel brief precipe Henric regi Angliæ in lieu of that which is now given by the prerogative." To this dictum of Wilby, Brooke, C. J. adds: "Quare de tiel brief car videtur quod unquam fuit car le Roi nepoit escrire ne countermaund lui mesme." If it was necessary to decide whether the subject had a right to proceed by a settled form of writ called a "processe" against the King before the petition of right was introduced by Edw. I., we should incline to the negative for the reason given by Brooke, C.J., and because before and in the time of Edward I. the rights of the people were deriving their origin after the conquest from grants by Royal Charters, and were in the course of gradual extension, by confirmations of charters and by such statutes as the following, namely, "articuli super cartas," for enforcing such charters, and the Statute of Petitions of Edward I., which reciting "the grievance to the folks who come to the King in Parliament by the theory of the petitions whereof the most part might have been despatched by the Chancellor and the justices, provides that all petitions which touch the seal do come first to the Chancellor; and those which touch the Exchequer do come to the Exchequer; and those which touch justices or law of the land do come to justices; and those which touch jewry do come to the jewry's justices;" and the Ordinance of Petitions, 21 Edw. 1., whereby "the King ordained that all the petitions which shall be delivered to them whom he has assigned to receive them, shall be all at once well examined, and that those which touch in Chancery be set in one; and those that touch the Exchequer in another place; and so with those that touch the justices; and those which be before the King and his council severally in another place." From these statutes and ordinances it is clear that many complaints were disposed of by personal application to the King in Council, and it is not probable that the subject should have a defined right to a writ against the King when the rights between subject and subject and the writs for enforcing them were in an unsettled state. But whatever was the form of procedure, the substance seems always to have been the trial of the right of the subject, as against the right of the Crown, to property, or an interest in property, which had been seized for the Crown, and if the subject succeeded, the judgment only enabled him to recover possession of that specific property, or the value thereof, if it had been converted to the King's use. The form for trying this question has gone through several changes: Traverse of Office found, Monstrance de Droit, and Petition of Right were the forms in most frequent use. Amendments of the procedure were made by the statutes 34 Edw. 3 and 36 Edw. 3, and 2 Edw. 4, allowing many questions to be raised by traverse in cases where theretofore a petition of right was necessary, and much learned discussion is to be found in the books relating to the use of these different forms. Lord Coke has much learning thereon, both in his commentary on these statutes, for substituting "traverse" for "petition," 2nd Inst. 68, and in his judgment in the case of the Saddlers' Company, 4 Rep. 58. In Coningsby v. Mallons, Cas. temp. Hen. 8, Keilway 184, all the judges give separate judgments of much research, to the effect that a monstrance de droit was wrong in that case, and that the plts. ought to have had a petition. The form of proceeding was much considered, for the reporter adds that the Chancellor gave judgment for an amoreas manus without the advice of any justice or King's Counsel: "et hoc contra legem ut dicitur et fuit dit qu'il ces que l'office fuit trovè par le faux subillite de Sir Richard Empson et Dudeley, en le temps de l'auter Roy les queux fueront les hauts et cruels approvers, &c." In the Bankers' case, 14 State Trials 60, Lord

Somers has made an elaborate collection of learning relating to the form of proceeding against the Crown, and adjudged that a petition of right was the proper form for recovering payment of an annuity granted by the Crown. The subject, therefore, has been amply considered: the authorities are abundant, and we refer to them as establishing strongly the negative proposition that a petition of right does not lie to recover damages from the King for a mere wrong supposed to have been done by him. Not a single instance of a recovery of such damages from the King has been cited. The force of this negative evidence is increased by many considerations. The occasions for using the remedy, if it existed, were frequent. The right to seize the property of men either outlawed or attainted, or heirless, would be certain to lead to contested claims from its unlimited extent. It is probable that wrong would be done by the King's officer enforcing such a right from its undefined limits, and it is clear that wrongs were so done from the provisions made for giving redress. As early as Edward I., in the statute Westminster, 2nd articuli super cartas, c. 18, is an enactment making escheators liable for any wrongs they may do in seizing for the Crown, and in case of their inability to pay, giving recourse to the superior escheator; and in chapter 19 is an enactment that, after a judgment of restitution in case of a wrongful seizure, all the issues and profits between the seizure and the restitution should be fully restored. Lord Coke, in his comment on this chapter, says: "Issues meant profits not paid over; but money once in the King's coffers shall not be restored." It is likely that such a rule would not prevail if the question arose now, but we refer to it as showing an improbability of paying unliquidated damages for a wrongful seizure, when the restitution of the profits made by the wrong-doer is so imperfectly enforced." Throughout these enactments no mention is made of a remedy against the King for compensation in damages. Against him the redress to be obtained is restitution only. If damages are sought they are to be obtained, if at all, from the officer who did the wrong. Where the question raised by a demurrer to a petition of right was whether the Crown was responsible for negligence in servants employed under the Crown, whereby damage was caused, Lord Lyndhurst decided in the negative: (Lord Canterbury v. The Attorney-General, 1 Phil. 321.) His words are: "For the personal negligence of the Sovereign, neither this nor any other proceeding can be obtained. Upon what grounds, then, can it be supported for acts of the agent? If the master is answerable on the principle qui facit per alium facit per se, this does not apply to the Sovereign, who cannot be required to answer for his personal acts. If the master is responsible by reason of his negligence in retaining a careless servant, this principle does not apply to the Sovereign, to whom negligence cannot be imputed. As to damages done by ships of war, the commander is not responsible for damage done by one of the crew without his participation. But, if the principle now to be contended for be correct, the negligence of the seaman in the service of the Crown would raise a liability in the Crown to make good the damage which might be enforced by a petition of right." He then refers to the authorities and discusses Gerveis de Clifton's case after mentioned, and decides that the petition of right could not be maintained. So also where the chief officer of the marine at Calcutta made an order against employing the steam-tug of the plt., and thereby caused loss, it was held upon appeal that no suit could be maintained, for reasons not here relevant; but in disposing of the question, whether the deft. below could justify a wrong under the order of the Supreme Government, the Court says, p. 237: "If the act which he did was in itself wrongful as against the plts. in the court below, and produced damage to them, they must have the same remedy, by action, against the doer, whether the act was his own spontaneous and unauthorised, or whether it were done by the order of the superior power. The civil irresponsibility of the supreme power for tortious acts could not be maintained with any show of justice if its agents were not personally liable for them:" (Rogers v. Rajendro Dutt, 13 Moo. P. C. 236.) For an example of the liability of the officer in the employ of the Crown for damage caused by him, we refer to the case of Medraza v. Willes, 3 B. & Ald. 353, where the captain of a man-of-war destroying a Spanish slave-ship wrongfully, but, as he believed, in performance of his duty, was held to be liable to the Spanish owner for damage to the amount of 20,000*l.* When the claim was for a sum of money alleged to have been specifically appropriated to the suppliant, and the objection was made that a petition of right was not maintainable for such a claim, the court did not decide against the suppliant on this point, because it had many clear grounds of judgment against him on other points. On this point the Court says: "Considering the length of time that has expired since anything has been practically done in a petition of right, the imperfection of all the authorities and the obscurity that hangs over this portion of law, the course that has been taken (in hearing the case to the end upon the merits and upon form) can hardly excite surprise, much less should it provoke censure:" (Baron de Bode's case, 8 Q. B. 210.) If the court entertained so much doubt about allowing the suppliant to proceed when claiming a sum of money said to be specifically appropriated, it probably would have decided without hesitation against a claim for damages for trespass. We have said that the suppliant adduced no case in which damages had been recovered against the King for a wrong. He pressed on our attention the case of Conrad of Colerne to prove the contrary; but, as we understand it, the case has not that effect. There the suppliant had joined a Dutchman in sending a cargo of oats to London. They were shipped from Cornwall in the Dutchman's ship, and when it arrived in London war had been declared between England and Holland, and the ship and cargo were seized as the property of an enemy; but, as half the cargo belonged to an Englishman, his petition for a restitution of his moiety of the oats would be normal. His claim would be for a specific chattel, not for damage. On the argument much reliance was placed on the case of Gerveis de Clifton, p. 22, Edw. 3, 12, and we therefore examine it at length. There the suppliant suggested that divers trenches and gutters were made in "l'eau de Trent" by the wardens of the Castle of Nottingham, whereby his lands were "surondis" (surrounded or inundated) to his damage. This petition was sent to the Chancellor, and by him to an inquisition in due course. By the inquest it was found that the suggestion was true "et outre que trenches furent faits en soil" by the wardens, whereby the King had built four mills; whereupon the suppliant presented a second petition, "priant restitution de ses damages et que ces soit redresse." This petition was indorsed to be sent to the Chancellor that he should send it and the verdict on the inquest to the King's Bench, and that the justices there should cause to come before them the wardens, "qui ou son et les serjeants du Roi" and "qu'ils fassent droit." The Chancellor sent the tenour of the verdict and an objection was made that he should have sent the verdict; the plt. was directed to bring it if he wished to proceed, and the wardens were discharged from further attendance. So the proceeding seems to have ended. The brevity of the report makes it obscure; but, as we understand it, the statement shows a dispute between the owner of a dominant and a servient tenement in respect of the easement of bringing water to a mill. The petition seems to admit a right to the tenement, but complains of an excess in the exercise of the right whereby the lands of the suppliant had been surrounded or inundated, and prays a restitution of his damages, and that this should be redressed. The indorsement that the petition should be sent to the King's Bench, and that the wardens for the time being and the serjeants of the King should attend as parties to the case, shows that an important question of right was in issue, for the attendance of such person would be incongruous if the question was the value of the crop damaged by the water. The report as it stands is not, as we read it, a precedent for a claim of damages for a wrong, but a suit to try a right, and whatever was the claim nothing was decided in relation thereto. This view of the effect of the report is confirmed by referring to Robert de Clifton's case, forty-nine years before, see Rott Parliament, 18 Edw. 2, No. 3, as in Baron de Bode's case, by Anstey, p. 59. We gather from this record that weirs in the Trent and watercourses thereupon to the Castle mills, through the lands of the Clifton family, in Wyleford, had been made by Robert de Tiptoft, some time warden of the castle, probably in the time of one Gerveis de Clifton, to whom Robert succeeded as kinsman and heir, and that turves had been taken from the same lands from time to time to repair and maintain the weir and watercourse. The petition does not deny the right of the wardens thus to act, but claims compensation, because in the exercise of the right damage was done to the land. In this case also nothing appears to have been decided, but the question to have been tried, if the case had gone on, was whether the suppliant should have some compensation given him. The first petition of right by Robert on his first coming to the property is not found, but the commission and requisition founded thereon shows its nature. The commission was to Whatter and Willoughby on the plaint of Robert, kinsman and heir of Gerveis de Clifton, showing that the wardens had made weirs and trenches through the meadows "which were of Gervaise, and unto Robert after his death descended as in one hand they now exist," and the Trent water out of its right and ancient course had led whereby the lands circumjacent had oftentimes been overflowed, and have dug and from day to day come to dig from the said meadow turves for the reparation of the weirs and trenches, so that he Robert the profit of his meadows in ready will doth lose, whereupon he hath prayed relief; whereupon the King in order that right should be done wills to be certified how many trenches and weirs had been made, and in what places the water of the Trent had been diverted, and what damages to the said Robert have chanced and do chance, yearly, and what profits unto the King and his castle from the trenches and weirs do yearly chance, and by what wardens and out of what cause the trenches and weirs were made; and so directs an inquest to be held. The return to the inquisition shows that two weirs had been made in the Trent, and two trenches had been made through the lands of the said meadows, and the Trent water thereby turned out of its right course, whereby the meadows have been inundated, and the wardens have dug turves in the lands for reparation, whereby profits have been lost, and the damages which have already chanced to Robert are 15*l.*, and damages do yearly chance to the value of 10*l.*; and they say that the trenches and weirs are to the profit of the King and his castle to the value yearly of 30*l*. for without that watercourse four of the mills to grind are unable, and that Robert de Typtoft made the trenches and weirs. The said petition of right, grounded on this commission and inquisition, prayed that allowance may be made unto the said Robert of the damages aforesaid; and prayed the said Robert, if it please the King and his council, that the bailiwick of the house of Faveril may be assigned to him in recompence for his aforesaid damages. The indorsement on this petition is special, and shows that an "important" interest was in dispute. "For that this thing doth touch the King so highly, and the said inquest is but of office, let there be some great men of the King's council assigned to survey, inquire and certify the King." We consider that the right is not disputed either to the watercourse or the turbary, because there is no complaint of trespass in digging the trenches or the turves, but there is a hardship or grievance resulting, either from an excessive or neglectful exercise of the right, whereby an overflow with damage was caused, for which the suppliants seek compensation. In Robert's case the bailiwick of the House of Faveril is the recompence proposed. In Gervas' case the restitution of his damages, and that the overflow may be redressed, is the subject of the prayer. In each case the petition is for relief from the exaction of servitude in excess beyond the right of the dominant tenant. So each is, in effect, a petition that the King would remove his hand from the property of the servant tenant to the extent of the excess. These cases should be read with the remembrance that neither of them advanced beyond the first stage, and in neither was there a trial of the contested facts, or of the law applicable thereto. There may have been a local custom relating to Trent water within the liberty of Nottingham, or the house of Faveril. We find in Domesday, under the head of "Nottingham Boro," a trace of a local custom relating to the Trent, "Aqua Trentis et via versus Eboracum custodiuntur ita et si quis impedierit transitum navium et si quis araverit vel fossam fecerit in via Regia, intra duas perticas, emendare habet, per VII. libras." There may have been a grant by those from whom the property was derived to the suppliants. We see in Domesday Book, under the head of "Terre Wilhelmi Faveril, in Nottinghamshire," that he held Wykeford and Clifden, and a part of Nottingham Boro. There may have been moiety of possession severed when the Crown became possessed of the house of Faveril, of which Robert de Clifton desired to obtain the bailiwick, and the right to take the water and the turves may have been subject to the duty of making compensation for any damage caused by the exercise of the right. We refer to these matters of conjecture consistent with the facts as they are stated in the cases, and on the review, we come to the conclusion that principle and authority coincide in showing that a petition of right lies not to recover unliquidated damages for a mere wrong, and that neither of the cases of the Clifton's are an authority for a contrary conclusion, and we adopt Lord Lyndhurst's remarks as confirmatory of this conclusion. In Lord Canterbury's case, 1 Phil. 33, he remarks that Gervas' case went off because the tenour of the verdict, and not the verdict itself, had been returned to the Q. B., a defect easily cured if the claim could be supported, but it does not appear to have been renewed; and that the complaint of a similar grievance to the same property, by the wardens of Nottingham Castle, in the 18 Edw. 2, and a prayer for the favour of an appointment to be steward, indicated that the wardens had a right to bring the water to the castle mills, and did what was complained of in assumption of a right, and that the complainant was not demanding a right, but begging some account of a hardship suffered by him. The reasons and authorities we would add our view that there is good ground for maintaining which we find to be the law on this subject each of the Queen's subjects who believed been at any time, in any reign, wronged administration of civil or military affairs, for the Queen for the time being for the same which he might estimate his damage, the pernicious result would be great. And we: an abstract of the petition of right, adduced dence in Irwin v. Sir Geo. Grey, 3 Foa. & Fin. an example of the mischief that might arise was the law. By that petition, the suppli 1861, sought compensation for a series of wrongs in the course of legal proceedings beg in 1854, wherein he was convicted of a misde in representing that an assistant-barrister signed, and a Mr. Johnson was acquitted in s cation for perjury, instituted by Mr. Irwin wrongs imputed were the withholding fr injuries certain letters, and the guilt of those was imputed to Mr. Lyttleton, Lord Morp Lord John Russell, Secretaries for Ireland, a Attorney-General and the Crown Solicitor in at the time respectively. The question to I would have been, whether the wrongs wer mitted so as to damage the suppliant; the effect, to try, in 1861, whether some verd turned in 1854-5 were right, and if not, v her present Majesty should compensate Mr for the damage sustained in paying costs, being imprisoned and fined, and also in bei herited by his father, by paying to him 100,0 so much thereof as the jury might deem it p give. Upon each of the three grounds abo tioned our judgment is for the Crown. I o say that this judgment, in the result, has t concurrence of all my brethren. We adduce number of reasons, but some of them have concurrence of my respected brother Willes.

Judgment for the C.

Friday, May 27, 1864.

BERKEFORD AND OTHERS v. MONTGOMERIE AND OTHERS.

Ship and shipping—Power of shipowners to hire where the owners of the goods have failed to: Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 186 26 Vict. c. 67), s. 67.

By sect. 67 of 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, which a shipowners, under certain circumstances, to a land goods which they have imported from parts, it is enacted that if at any time before are landed or unshipped, the owner thereof h entry for the landing and warehousing thereof particular wharf or warehouse other than that the ship is discharging, and has offered and be to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner he to make such delivery, and has also failed at of such offer to give the owner of the goods o formation of the time at which such goods co livered, then the shipowner shall, before his unshipping such goods under the power hereby him, give to the owner of such goods, or of st or warehouse as last aforesaid, twenty-fou notice in writing of his readiness to deliver t and shall, if he lands or unships the same such notice, do so at his own risk and expens of goods when the owner of the goods offers to take them, and gives no information of the time at which they can be delivered, is not excused from giving notice under this enactment because no such information was asked for.

The first count of the declaration stated:

That before and at the time of the grievances hereinafter mentioned the plts. were owners of goods, to wit, of hides, within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, and were entitled as agents for the owners thereof to the possession of the same. That the defts. were shipowners within the said Act, and were authorised to act as agents for the owners of a certain ship called the City of Edinburgh, and were entitled to receive the freight, demurrage and other charges in respect of the said ship. That the said goods were imported in the said ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom in the said ship, and that before the said goods were landed or unshipped they made entry of the said goods within the meaning of the said Act for the landing and warehousing thereof at their wharf called Pickle Herring Upper Wharf, which said wharf was not the wharf at which the said ship was discharging, and were entitled and ready and offered to take delivery of the said goods, of all which premises the defts. had notice. That all things were done, and had happened and existed, and all times had elapsed to entitle them to take such delivery, and to land the said goods, yet the defts. did not allow them to do so. That the defts. and all persons whose duty it was so to do failed to make such delivery, and failed at the time of such offer to give the plt. correct information of the time at which the said goods could be delivered. That without the consent of the plts. the defts. landed and unshipped the said goods at a wharf or place (to wit) at the London Docks, other than the plts.' wharf, which had been named in the entry as aforesaid, and without giving to them, being the owners of the said goods and wharf as aforesaid, twenty-four hours' notice of their readiness to deliver the said goods, and did not bear or pay the expenses of landing and unshipping the same; and that, by reason of the premises, the plts. were compelled and obliged, in order to obtain possession of the said goods, to pay divers large sums of money and the expenses which had been incurred by reason of such landing and unshipping as aforesaid, and also lost the use of, and had to pay large sums for the demurrage of divers barges and lighters which they had employed to take delivery of the said goods, delivery of which the defts. failed to make, and did not allow the plts. to take as in that count mentioned.

The second count was in trover, for bales of hides; and the third count was on account stated.

The defts. pleaded the general issue, and traversed the allegations that the plts. had made entry of the goods within the meaning of the Act; that they were ready and willing and had offered to take delivery of the goods; and that they did not have twenty-four hours' notice as alleged. The fifth plea to the count in trover denied that the goods were the plts.'

The facts proved at the trial, before Byles, J., in London, at the sittings after Hilary Term last, were as follows:—The City of Edinburgh, on board of which were the goods mentioned in the declaration, being 50 bales of hides, arrived at the London Docks on the 24th March, and reported herself inwards on that day. In the afternoon of the 26th March, the consignees of the goods entered them inwards at the Custom-house, and obtained an order for their delivery over the side for landing at the plts.' wharf, called Pickle Herring Wharf. This order was at once sent to the plts. with bills of lading for the goods indorsed to the plts. The plts. sent the order and bills of lading to their lighter-man, and his apprentice Kaney, a lad of about eighteen years of age, was sent by him to the ship to ask if the goods were ready for delivery. He arrived at the ship at or about four o'clock in the afternoon, and applied to the second mate for the goods. The mate was the only person on board when the hatches were down, and no unloading was going on at the time. The mate told him that the goods were not ready for delivery. Kaney had a lighter alongside, but there was a lighter of his master in the dock at the time about 100 yards distant from the City of Edinburgh, and he could have removed the goods by it if they had been ready for delivery. The usual working hours in the docks are from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., though on occasions work is done after the latter hour. Kaney left the order with the mate and went away. On the 28th March the hides were reached, and part of them unloaded at the London Docks. The mate then remembered that he had received the order for landing at the plts.' wharf, and he produced it. The Custom-house officer who was on board told him that, after receiving such a notice, he had no business to land them at the London Docks without giving notice to the owners of the goods. The mate applied to the superintendent of the docks for directions, and was told to unload the remainder. The whole of the hides were then landed, and the dock company refused to give them up to the plts. without payment of the sum of 10*l.* 2*s.* 6*d.* for their warehouse charges. The plts. paid this sum under protest and brought the present action to recover it back.

Sect. 67 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), enacts as follows:

Where the owner of any goods imported in any ship from foreign parts into the United Kingdom fails to make entry thereof, or having made entry thereof to land the same or take delivery thereof and to proceed therewith with all convenient speed, by the times severally hereinafter mentioned, the shipowner may make entry of, and land, or unship the said goods at the times, in the manner, and subject to the conditions following (that is to say):

If at any time before the goods are landed or unshipped the owner thereof has made entry for the landing and warehousing thereof at any particular wharf or warehouse other than that at which the ship is discharging, and has offered, and been ready to take delivery thereof, and the shipowner has failed to make such delivery, and has also failed at the time of such offer to give the owner of the goods correct information of the time at which such goods can be delivered, then the shipowner shall, before landing or unshipping such goods under the power hereby given to him, give to the owner of the goods, or of such wharf or warehouse as last aforesaid, twenty-four hours' notice in writing of his readiness to deliver the goods, and shall, if he lands or unships the same without such notice, do so at his own risk and expense.

The verdict was entered by consent for the plts. for the amount claimed, the defts. having leave to move to enter it for them, the court having power to draw inferences of fact. A rule nisi having been obtained accordingly,

F. M. White showed cause.—The plts. had offered and been ready to receive the goods, and had been told that they were not ready for delivery, and no correct information had been given them of the time at which they could be delivered. The plts. were not bound to ask for such information, and they were entitled to twenty-four hours' notice from the defts. before the defts. were justified in unloading the goods at the London Docks.

Giffard and Murphy supported the rule.—The plts. had only colourably complied with the statute. They had applied for the goods, but were not in a condition to receive them if they had been ready for delivery, for they had only sent one boy and had not provided him with a lighter. No information had been given of the time when delivery could be made, because none had been asked for.

The following authorities were referred to:

Gatliffe v. Bourne, 4 Bing. N. C. 314; 7 M. & G. 850, Ex. Ch.; and 11 Cl. & F. 45, H. of L.

ERLE, C.J.—On considering the evidence which was given at the trial of this case, I think that our judgment ought to be in favour of the plts. The shipowners had a right to land the goods unless the merchant had brought himself within the seventh condition of sect. 67 of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862. Now the facts show that the merchant did offer to take the goods, and did, in fact, intend to take them if they were ready. He gave the bills of lading and delivery order to a lighterman, the regular channel for the conveyance of goods from a ship to a wharf, and sent him on board to get the goods. How can this be called a colourable compliance with the statute? If what was done had been done in the middle of the day, and two lightermen had gone instead of one boy, and the lighter had been alongside, nothing more could have been done. But the question is, what was the intention with which the delivery order was given to Kaney and Kaney sent on board. If the demand was made within working hours, a lad of eighteen, with a lighter lying a few yards off in the docks, was quite able to receive the goods. Great stress was laid on the fact that Kaney went on board at four o'clock, while for many purposes the working hours in the docks cease at four. If the goods had been at the top, the mate might have said, "I accept your order, but work is broken off, and you shall have them when work begins again." But the goods were not ready, and the boy was told that they were not ready. I think that there was a good compliance by the plts. with the statute. If there is an offer and readiness on the part of the owner of the goods to take delivery, and the shipowner fails to deliver them, and fails to give correct information of the time when the goods can be unloaded, then twenty-four hours' notice must be given to the owner of the goods or the owner of the wharf for landing at which they have been entered. The owners of the goods had, in my opinion, complied with the conditions of the statute, and therefore the defts. had no right to unload them without giving notice of their readiness to deliver them.

WILLIAMS, J.—I have felt some difficulty, not about the law, but about the conclusion of fact at which we ought to arrive. The first controverted fact is, whether the owner of the goods did offer, and was ready, to take delivery of the goods, and the shipowner failed to make delivery. In point of law, I think that Mr. Giffard is right, and it is not sufficient for the shipowner to have failed to deliver, but the owner of the goods must have been in a condition to receive the goods if his offer had been accepted. Was the owner of the goods ready to receive them? My Lord and my brother think that he was, and I must be wrong in coming to a contrary conclusion, but it is a question of fact only. As to the remaining point of law, whether there was a failure on the part of the shipowner to give correct information of the time at which the goods could be delivered, it was argued for the defts. that the shipowner must not only have given no information, but must have declined to give any information when asked. I think that that is not the proper construction of the passage in the statute which is inserted in ease of the shipowner. The seventh condition puts him under terms of giving twenty-four hours' notice. If he does not give, when the goods are applied for, correct information of the time at which they can be delivered. If he fails to take advantage of this opportunity, he must give the twenty-four hours' notice.

BYLES, J. stated that he and Willes, J., who had left the court, concurred as to the points of law; and as to the questions of fact, they came to the same conclusions as the Lord Chief Justice.

NORTHARD T. PEPPER.

17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 443, 448.—Examination by receiver of wreck.—Admissibility of evidence.

In an action for a collision between two ships, the deft's counsel, in order to show that the plt's ship was in fault, proposed to put in evidence the statement of the plt's captain made on oath, under sect. 448 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, before a receiver of wreck:

Held, that such evidence was inadmissible, notwithstanding sect. 448 of the above-mentioned Act enacts that such examination shall be admitted in evidence in any court as prima facie proof of all matters contained therein, as the question as to which ship caused the damage to the other was not a matter which the receiver had power to examine into under the 448th section.

This was an action for a collision between two ships, tried before Byles, J., at Guildhall, when a verdict was found for the plt., leave being reserved to move to set that verdict aside and have a new trial, on the ground of the improper rejection of evidence, and also on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

It appeared that during the trial it became important to the deft. to prove in support of his case that the damage to the plt's ship was on her starboard bow, as this would have shown that it was the plt.' and not the deft.'s ship which was in fault. In order to prove this the learned counsel for the deft., in his cross-examination of the captain of the plt.'s ship proposed to put in evidence his statement on oath taken before a receiver of wreck, under 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 448, both for the purpose of contradicting the witness, and as substantive evidence but the learned judge refused to admit it.

A rule having been obtained on a former day,

Edward James, Q. C. (Warton with him) not showed cause.

Brett, Q. C. appearing in support of the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

May 31.—ERLE, C. J. now read his judgment.—In an action for collision was the examination of the captain of the plt.'s ship, taken by the receiver of wreck at Grimsby, under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 448, admissible for the deft. under sect. 448 for the purpose of proving the fact that the damage to the plt.'s ship from the collision was on her starboard bow, such fact being offered for the purpose of showing that the plt.'s ship was in fault? I think not, because the question, which ship caused the damage to the other, was not a matter which the receiver had power to examine into under sec. 448. The jurisdiction here in question, "to examine," is given to the receiver when any ship or has been in distress on our coast in respect of seven matters. First, the name and description of the ship. Secondly, the name of the master and owners. Thirdly, the names of the owner of the cargo. Fourthly, the ports or place from and to which the ship was bound. Fifthly, the occasion of the distress of the ship. Sixthly, the services rendered. Seventhly, such other matters or circumstances, relating to the ship or cargo, as the receiver thinks necessary. The question whether the colliding part of the plt.'s ship was the starboard or the port bow, appears to me irrelevant to each and all of these matters. An enactment altering the law as to evidence and creating statutory evidence whereby the rights of parties may be defeated, must be construed strictly. The law of evidence, as it stands, is intended to maintain truth any alteration of that law for a particular purpose

C. P.]

NORTHARD v. PEPPER.

is intended to maintain the truth in a better manner as far as that particular purpose is concerned, and no further; otherwise the alteration would have been carried further. The Merchant Shipping Act is a code of many laws relating to ships, and is divided into eleven parts, and each part is subdivided into portions. Each part and portion is appropriated to a specific purpose; in several parts there are alterations of the law of evidence, and each alteration is adapted to the specific purpose of that portion where it occurs. For example, by sect. 7 the seal of the Board of Trade is evidence of the making of all documents issued by the Board of Trade; this facilitates proof of the authenticity of the documents. By sect. 14 inspectors may hold inquiries and report to the Board of Trade upon the matters therein specified; on these reports the Board of Trade may act in respect of matters under their superintendence. By sect. 282 a provision is made against the loss of evidence from the evanescence of seafaring witnesses; thereby an official log is required to contain not only matters relating to the crew, but also every death, marriage and birth on board, and every collision; and by sect. 285 all entries in any official log-book shall be received in evidence in any court, saving all just exceptions. The admissibility of each of these entries must be regulated by the value of the subject of the entry. Part 8 contains the section now to be construed. By its title it relates to wrecks, casualties and salvage; and I gather from sect. 432 that "casualties" here means casualties resulting in a death; therefore, as far as the present question is concerned, the part may be taken to relate only to wrecks and salvage. This section in the first place creates a power in the inspecting officer to make inquiry (inter alia) whenever any ship causes damage to any other ship, and the result of this inquiry is to be sent in a report to the Board of Trade, and is not made admissible in evidence in any peculiar manner created by statute. Then follow the sections in question, 448 and 449 above mentioned. It seems clear that sect. 448 did not authorise the receiver to inquire into the blame due to either party in a collision, because it had been before specifically provided for and assigned to the inspector's office as last mentioned. Under sect. 448 the inquiry by the receiver of wreck into the seven matters above specified is for his guidance in performing the duties of his office connected with the wreck. If that inquiry is confined strictly to these seven matters in their relation to ship and cargo, the result thereof would not be likely to affect materially the rights of litigants by admissibility in all courts. It perpetuates prima facie evidence in relation to the identity of the ship and the voyage and the occasion of distress. Under head 5 he may inquire into the cause of the distress; for instance, whether there is damage to the hull, or the loss of a mast or of an anchor, and whether such damage was caused by stranding or collision, or the like. But for the purpose of the receiver of wreck, the part of the ship where the damage was received is as immaterial as the quarter from which the wind was blowing at the time the damage was done. I think his report is only evidence as to the matters into which it was his duty to inquire, and that the part of the hull supposed to be struck in the collision is not one of those matters. Hearsay evidence is admissible for pedigree; but where the deceased parent told the child who were his father and mother, adding the place of his birth, the declaration was admissible only for the pedigree and not for the locality of the birth. In the portion of part 8, relating to salvage, provision is made for deciding on claims of salvage before justices of the peace by sect. 461 and the following sections; and, by sect. 464, an appeal is given; and, by sect. 465, the justices may send a copy of the proceedings before them, and such copy is made evidence, but only for the Court of Appeal. Upon this review of the statute, I think the rules of law relating to evidence are altered only for a specified purpose, and that the sections are drawn with great legal knowledge, confining each alteration to its appropriate purpose; and on this construction of the Act the examination of the captain was not admissible as substantive evidence that in the collision the star-board bow of the plt.'s ship was struck. I do not advert to the other grounds of rejection; but, as this was a point made by the deft.'s counsel, it suffices to decide it against him.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I do not say anything to depart from what my Lord has said. It was argued by Mr. Brett that the evidence was improperly rejected, and that the language of the 449th section is given without any restriction whatever, that "the examinations taken in writing in pursuance of the 448th section shall be admitted in evidence in any court of justice, as prima facie proof, as proof of all matters contained in such written examination." Now it is clear that these general words must necessarily to some extent be controlled. It never was meant that the matters contained in the examination were matters spoken to by a witness without having power to speak of his own knowledge; in other words, that this matter received in evidence is not to mean any matter contained in such examination. I think it necessary to put some limit upon the generality of the words, and it seems to me contrary to the good sense and meaning of the words to impose any other limit than that the matters contained in such written examination must be taken to mean matters contained in such written examination into which the receiver might inquire. According to the ordinary rules of law that would be so, otherwise he might inquire into matters which it was no part of his duty to make an inquiry into. Having taken this view of the subject, it seems quite unnecessary to give any opinion upon the point, as to which I have formed no opinion, namely, whether, looking at the history of this part of the statute in question, the true meaning of the statute is not that the evidence and the examination is admissible where the inquiry is limited to an inquiry into the wreck.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It appears to me that the jurisdiction of the receiver is confined to inquiry into matters relating to the vessel, or the cargo or stores. That is expressly stated in the introductory part of the section, and the words in the section are to be read as though the inquiry was to be limited to that which is stated in the early part of the section, because the receiver is to examine any person with regard to any part thereof; that is, of the ship or of the cargo, or any part thereof. This inquiry is to be limited to circumstances affecting the property which has been brought into port by reason of the stress of weather, and that will appear still more clearly by reference to sect. 14, which provides, in certain cases, for an inquiry into the nature and causes of any accident or damage which any ship has sustained or caused, or has appeared to have sustained or caused. There such an inquiry as it is imagined or alleged the receiver could have entered into is expressly provided for in apt words, and specifically in words which leave no doubt that the language of the 448th section was not intended to apply to or include the case of an inquiry into who was in fault in a collision which had caused distress, which distress brought the vessel under the jurisdiction of the receiver. I therefore take it to be clear that the receiver had no jurisdiction to inquire into a question as to who is in fault. Well, then, it is true that the receiver may have jurisdiction. Though he has not jurisdiction to inquire into that question, he may have it to receive evidence of facts which may be relevant and material with reference not only to the inquiry before the receiver himself, but also to inquire who was in fault in causing the collision, and that is the ground upon which Mr. Brett insisted, with greater apparent justice, upon the admissibility of the fact of the injury having arisen on the starboard side, and a moment's consideration will show that evidence and a deposition of a fact which may be known, assuming it to be material to the question of wreck, is admissible, and that deposition is evidence of the same fact, because it is also relevant to the first question that arises in this case, the question of who was in fault in the collision—a moment's consideration will show that that would be a most unjust, and I was going to say absurd, construction of the statute; for though it may be very true that the fact was material to be inquired into before the receiver, and that he had authority to inquire into it for the purpose of wreck, yet it would appear that the very witness who proved the fact would also, if the receiver had authority to inquire into it, have stated other facts which would have shown that, notwithstanding his first statement, the blame was upon different shoulders from those to which it might be imputed if his first statement was taken alone; as, for instance, if a witness were to say, as in this case, that the damage was upon the starboard side. But supposing the receiver had jurisdiction to inquire into that, could he go on to show that by reason of the state of the wind or of the currents, or by reason of the conduct of the persons on board the defendants' vessel, the defendants were to blame and not the plaintiffs; or, that the plaintiffs were to blame and not the defendants? Now the notion of limiting the examination of a witness to a fact, because it was relevant to the inquiry before the receiver, he having no jurisdiction to investigate the whole matter, or as to who was in fault, is exceedingly startling, and as it is inconsistent with any reasonable construction of the Act of Parliament, I must seek for another, and adopt it if it can be found, as I think it can be found, because the examination is to be received "of all matters contained therein;" and the nature of the case limits the matters contained in the examination to matters which could have been completely investigated before the receiver. Was the present a matter which could not have been completely investigated before the receiver? It is impossible to impute to the Legislature that they could have intended garbled evidence to be admitted, and therefore one must read the Act as it appears to me to be "admissible on an issue which could have been completely investigated before the receiver." This construction is consistent with the whole of the Act of Parliament. There are various sections, 107, 182, 175, 244, 269, 250, 268, 370, 285, 324, 537, all sections which relate to the admissibility of evidence, and they are limited to the admissibility of evidence of certified documents, to the admission of statements contained in documents certified by official persons. When the Act of Parliament comes to deal with the acts of other persons, as in the case of the log, you find the limitation "subject to all just exceptions" introduced. When the Act of Parliament comes to deal, in sect. 370, with depositions of witnesses, such depositions are only allowed to be admitted under safeguards which are not provided by the section under consideration. It would be therefore not only inconsistent with the ordinary notions of law, but inconsistent with the whole frame of the Act of Parliament, if these notions be read in a fair sense.

CLAPHAM v. LANGTON.

Byles, J.—I agree with the rest of the court notwithstanding the universality and apparent probableness of these enactments, there are actions which must be implied for the reasons by the other members of the court, and I agree with them. I only wish to say, that I do not myself preclude by what I now say, if there should arise from considering whether there are other limitations even within those. But matter it is quite unnecessary to consider agree that the rule should be absolute on the ground.

Rule discharged upon the point of impropriety of evidence, and made absolute on the ground that the verdict was against the weight of evidence.

Marine insurance—Seaworthiness—Vessel—river navigation.

A newly built vessel was insured for a voyage from Tyne to Odessa, including her trial trip. The time and dimensions of the vessel were part of the policy, and it was proved that they were to convey to persons acquainted with shipping a vessel was not built for ocean navigation, nor an ordinary sea-going vessel. The vessel tended, after accomplishing the voyage, for re-strengthening appliances were rendered as to render the vessel as seaworthy for the voyage could be made, considering her build. In fact of the voyage she suffered damage by perils of

Held, that, if the insurer was informed of the nature and description of the vessel, and the greater risk of the voyage, and if the vessel strengthening appliances were rendered as to such a vessel could reasonably be made, not object that the vessel was not seaworthy ordinary sense of that term.

Bill of exceptions to the ruling of Cockburn at Nisi Prius.

Declaration on a policy of marine insurance risk was at and from the Tyne to Odessa, or port in the Black Sea, with leave to call at intermediate ports and places, for any purpose; kinds of goods and merchandise, and also body, tackle, apparel, ordnance, munition, boat and other furniture of and in the good vessel called the Kaiaz Boratinsky, the breadth, draught and tonnage whereof were specified in a memorandum made on the face of the policy at the time of making the said policy, and upon the adventure upon the goods loading, and upon the ship, &c., including trip during her abode there, and until she have arrived at as above, and been moored four hours. The said ship, &c., goods, agreement in the policy, to be valued at the policy was underwritten by the defendants, and the claim was for a general average loss. Plea, that at the time of the commencement of the said voyage from the Tyne, the said vessel was not seaworthy for the said voyage.

evidence that before the making of the policy on the 27th June 1859 he wrote to the deft.:

Please hand the quotation for covering a new iron steamer hull to Odessa or another port in the Black Sea, including outfit charges. She is of the following dimensions: 300 feet long, 28 feet beam, 24 feet deep, engines of 100 horse power (with paddles), built by Messrs. Robert Stevenson and Co. She will have two masts, with fore and aft masts, and yard with a square sail. Her gross registered tonnage will be about 400 tons, will have a British crew to take her out, takes no cargo and only coals enough for ship's use to Gibraltar, where she will coal again. Value 12,000*l*. Steams out.

On the 1st July 1859 the plt. again wrote to the deft., stating that the steamer would not get away till after the 15th July:

Therefore, please send me a quotation for all July. Her dimensions are 32.25 feet, depth 6 feet 3 inches, tonnage 404 tons gross register. I allude of course to the boat mentioned in my letter of the 27th.

On July 5, 1859, plt. again wrote:

I expect the steamer will sail about the 17th, or it may be a few days sooner or a few days later, but you can put in the policy "waranteed to sail before the 1st Aug." She will make a trial trip to sea for a few hours before that time, and I wish to have that covered also. In valuing her at 12,000*l*, we are not putting an excessive value upon her, and only a moderate percentage upon what she has cost her owner, including of course her outfit, and the insurance and expenses. One reason of her costing more than usual is, that she is partly made of homogeneous metal or steel. Will you therefore insure that runs upon her so valued, including a trial trip, and we describe her in the policy by name as the Iron Steamer. Captain Elliott, and put into the policy that she is of the following dimensions: Length 300 feet, breadth 28 feet, draught of water about 2 feet, tonnage 404 tons. It does not think the policy is complete without this detailed description. If you have to pay ex. gr. extra on account of her trial trip you can do so without communicating with me, but it should not be much more.

On the 6th July 1859 the deft. subscribed the policy in the declaration mentioned, which was set out in the bill of exceptions.

By a memorandum in the margin on the face of the policy, which memorandum was made at the time of the making of the policy, and formed part of it, it was expressed that the length of the said vessel was 300 feet; her breadth, 28.25 feet; draught, about 2 feet; tonnage, 404 tons; and that she was warranted to sail for Odessa on or before the 1st Aug. 1859.

Further evidence was given, that she corresponded with the description contained in the policy and annex, and that she was intended, after accomplishing the voyage, to be employed in river navigation only, and was, as to the hull, built and adapted for such navigation exclusively, and could not by any strengthening appliances to the hull be rendered fit to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage insured.

The description and dimensions of the vessel contained in the policy were sufficient to convey to the knowledge of any competent person acquainted with shipping, that the vessel was not built for ocean navigation, and was not an ordinary sea-going vessel.

Before commencing the voyage, and whilst the vessel was in the Tyne, strengthening appliances were put into and upon the hull to assist the vessel in encountering the perils of the voyage, and such appliances were reasonably proper and sufficient according to the then knowledge and practice of naval architects, and by that means she was rendered as seaworthy as a vessel of such build, construction and capacity was capable of being made.

She commenced the voyage on the 29th July 1859, with her hull so strengthened, but nevertheless not being then in respect of her hull fit to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage. In the course of the voyage she suffered damage from perils of the sea, and on the 6th Aug. put into Falmouth, where she was repaired and further strengthened.

The deft. adduced evidence to prove that the strengthening appliances above referred to were not reasonably proper or sufficient, but that other and better might have been used, and that she was not by such appliances rendered as seaworthy for the said voyage as a vessel of such build and capacity was capable of being made.

The Lord Chief Justice directed to the jury as to the above issue, that if in their opinion the plt. had before the execution of the policy brought to the knowledge of the deft. the nature and description of the vessel intended to be insured, and the more than ordinary risk that such a vessel would necessarily encounter on the voyage insured, and if in their opinion the said vessel, at the time of commencing the said voyage, had been and was by the strengthening appliances put into and upon the hull of the said vessel as aforesaid, made as seaworthy for the said insured voyage as a vessel of such a nature and description as the said vessel could reasonably be made, they should find their verdict for the plt. on the said issue.

The deft.'s counsel excepted to that ruling, and contended that the Lord Chief Justice ought to have directed the jury that, inasmuch as it was proved that at the time of commencing the said voyage the vessel was not in respect of the hull thereof fit to encounter the perils of the voyage insured, they ought to find their verdict for the deft.

The jury returned the verdict for the plt.

Mellish, Q. C. (Vernon Lushington with him) in support of the bill of exceptions.—The bill of exceptions was tendered for the purpose of appealing against the decision of Burgess v. Wickham, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 47; 33 L. J. Q. B. 17, where it was held that the term seaworthiness is a relative term depending on the nature and description of the vessel and the voyage, and that when an insurer agrees, with full knowledge of the facts, to insure a vessel incapable from size or construction of being brought up to the ordinary standard of seaworthiness, the implied warranty is satisfied if the vessel is made as seaworthy as she is capable of being made. It is submitted that that decision was erroneous, and that under the circumstances the warranty of seaworthiness implied in every policy was not fulfilled. Unless the warranty is expressly excluded by the policy it ought to be applied in every case; it is more consistent with legal principles that the loss should fall upon the owner rather than upon the underwriter under such circumstances. The question ought not to be left to the opinion of a jury; and parol evidence ought not to be received for the purpose of excluding the implied warranty of seaworthiness. In Dixon v. Sadler, 5 M. & W. 413, Parke, B. said: "The question depends altogether upon the nature of the implied warranty as to seaworthiness or mode of navigation between the assured and the underwriter on a time policy. In the case of an insurance for a certain voyage it is clearly established that there is an implied warranty that the vessel shall be seaworthy, by which it is meant that she shall be in a fit state as to repairs, equipment and crew, and in all other respects, to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage insured at the time of sailing upon it. If the assurance attaches before the voyage commences, it is enough that the state of the ship be commensurate to the then risk, and if the voyage be such as to require a different complement of men or state of equipment in different parts of it—as if it were a voyage down a canal or river, and thence across to the open sea—it would be enough if the vessel were, at the commencement of each stage of the navigation, properly manned and equipped for it." An underwriter is not bound to know the principles of shipbuilding, or that from the dimensions stated the vessel was not seaworthy. Novelties in shipbuilding occur frequently; and if it was stated that the ship was to be built in the shape of a cigar, and that should turn out to be unseaworthy, would he be liable on an ordinary policy? If the parties mean that the warranty of seaworthiness shall be excluded, it should be so expressed in the policy:

WILLIAMS, J.—In this case the judgment will be affirmed for the reasons assented to by all the court in the case of Burgess v. Wickham, 3 B. & S. 669, as to the meaning of the term seaworthiness. We express no opinion upon the question controverted by Blackburn, J. in that case, as to the admissibility of parol evidence to qualify a warranty in a written policy either expressed or implied.

THE EGYPTIAN.

Collision—Extent of the wrong-doer's liability.

A successful plt. in a cause of damage is entitled to be reimbursed by the deft. to the extent, but only to the full extent, of the damage occasioned.

The burden of proving the damage done lies in the first instance upon the plt., but it is for the deft. to show that, notwithstanding prima facie evidence to the contrary, there was another and concurrent cause to which the damage may be attributed.

If a portion only of the damage is clearly attributable to the wrong-doer, and that portion cannot be distinguished from the rest, the wrong-doer is responsible for the whole damage.

Even though the injured vessel may have been at the time of collision in such a condition that the collision occasioned an unusual amount of damage, a wrong-doer is nevertheless responsible for all the consequences.

A schooner, having previously encountered severe weather, put into Gibraltar, and while at anchor there was injured by a steamer. The steamer being to blame for the collision, the registrar and merchants, considering it probable that the subsequent condition of the vessel was caused partly by the previous severe weather and partly by the collision, divided the damage. On appeal to the court, Held, that on behalf of the schooner there was prima facie proof that all the damage was caused by the collision, and that the owners of the steamer having failed to rebut by conclusive evidence such proof, they were responsible for all the damage. Report to be amended accordingly with costs.

This was a proceeding in objection to a report of the registrar and merchants in a cause of damage brought by the Dutch schooner Jonge Walrave, against the English screw steamer Egyptian. The High Court of Admiralty had by its decision found the Egyptian to blame for the collision, and that decision had been confirmed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the cause remitted accordingly, whereupon the usual reference took place as to the amount of injury done.

The damage claimed arose out of a collision in Gibraltar Bay on the 31st Dec. 1861. The schooner sailed from Amsterdam on the 4th Dec., bound for Patras and other ports in the Mediterranean, with a general cargo, and having during the whole of the voyage encountered severe weather, was compelled to anchor in Gibraltar Bay. It was, however, stated that the vessel made no water, and remained quite tight during the whole voyage. On the following morning, namely, the 31st Dec., the steamship Egyptian arrived, and having anchored on the port side of the schooner, proceeded to discharge some of the cargo. In the evening of that day, apparently about seven o'clock, the collision took place. It was pleaded on the part of the schooner that the Egyptian, when proceeding to sea, ran into the Jonge Walrave, her stem striking the schooner's port bow; but on the part of the steamer it appeared that just as she was preparing to moor for the night with a second anchor out, the chain of the port anchor suddenly broke, and she drifted towards the schooner, the starboard anchor was thereupon immediately let go, and the engines were reversed, but the steamer was unable to clear the Jonge Walrave before her starboard bow came in contact with the schooner's port bow. The pumps of the schooner were sounded as soon as the vessels were clear, and twenty inches of water were found in her. The first survey was held about ten o'clock on that morning, and the surveyors reported that the vessel was then making seven inches water per hour, and that the water from the pump was as if it had been mixed with molasses or sugar; they recommended, therefore, that the cargo should be discharged forthwith. It was then discovered that out of 696 barrels of which the cargo of sugar consisted, 145 were damaged, and 120 were quite empty. The cost of repairing the damage to the ship amounted to about 50*l.* only. After the complete discharge of the cargo, the second survey on the schooner was held on the 10th Jan. 1862 when the surveyors reported they could not discover the cause of the quantity of water the vessel had been making at the time of their first survey. An additional survey was made on the same day by surveyors appointed by the agents of the Egyptian and they reported to the same effect in rather stronger terms. The schooner was then caulked and when that was done she was hove down, first on her starboard and then on her port side, on the 16th and 17th Jan., and was again carefully surveyed and examined both inside and outside and was reported to be quite tight and fit to take in a cargo. That part of her cargo which was supposed to be sound was then reshipped, after which a final survey was held on the 28th Jan., and on the 3rd Feb. the schooner proceeded on her voyage and on reaching Patras it was found that the rest of the cargo of sugar was also slightly damaged. Under these circumstances the plts. claimed to be reimbursed by the defts. for the whole damage sustained by the vessel and her cargo. The claim alleged that, in addition to the cost of repairing the schooner and sundry other items, there was a loss of 1109*l.* 16*s.* 3*d.* on the barrels of sugar which were found empty, and on the damaged sugar which was sold at Gibraltar, and a loss of 333*l.* 18*s.* 2*d.* on the sugar reshipped at Gibraltar, and only found to be damaged on reaching Patras. The reference was attended by counsel on either side, and the principal point mooted was whether the damage to the cargo was occasioned by the collision or by the severity of the weather encountered at sea. From the course which the case took when heard on its merits in court, no witnesses were then examined for the plts., and the defts. had no opportunity of eliciting from the schooner's crew any account of her voyage: but it appeared from the printed proceedings that a clear intimation was given at that time that the defts. would dispute, at the reference, their liability for the whole of the damage sustained by the plts. Notwithstanding this intimation, however, no satisfactory evidence had been adduced to prove how far the damage to the cargo resulted from the collision, or to negative the supposition that it arose in part, at least, from the violence of the weather met with on the voyage to Gibraltar. The log seems to have been lost with the schooner in Sept. 1862, before the cause was heard in court, and no evidence was forthcoming from any of the crew except an affidavit from the master, couched in very general terms. The only witnesses examined were three persons of great experience as surveyors of shipping, who were produced to state in effect that, judging from the nature of the collision as described by the plts., the schooner would probably have received a great shock and been strained, and become leaky; and that when relieved of the weight of her cargo, and consequently higher out of the water, she would probably recover her form, and that the openings by which the water had entered would close up again to a great extent. On the part of the defts. it was contended that the collision was a slight one, and that the damage to so many barrels of sugar could not have been occasioned by it, that the claim in this respect was a fraudulent one, and that the cargo was in fact injured before the schooner entered Gibraltar Bay. On the other hand, the plts. relied on the statement in the protest that no water was made by the schooner before she arrived in Gibraltar Bay; and they contended that the blow was violent enough to have occasioned the damage to the cargo, and that the usual presumption must prevail that the damage is to be attributed to the accident immediately antecedent to its discovery. The registrar and merchants considered that the schooner had made some water, and that the cargo had been partially damaged before reaching Gibraltar, but that the leak was increased by the shock the schooner sustained in the collision, and that further injury to the cargo was occasioned by such increase of water. and being in their opinion impossible to determine what proportion of the damage to the cargo had been sustained before the schooner's arrival at Gibraltar, and what afterwards, they divided the damage equally between the two operating causes. Accordingly, one-half of the loss of cargo found damaged at Gibraltar was allowed against the defts., viz., the difference between what the damaged sugar realised at Gibraltar and what it would have sold for in its sound state at its port of destination; but, in ascertaining that difference, they reduced to two and a half per cent. the commission on the sale charged by the agents at Gibraltar, and consequently increased the proceeds by a corresponding amount, and also reduced the estimated net value of the cargo at Cephalonia on the ground that a sufficient allowance had not been made by the claimants for the charges that would have fallen on the vendors. Demurrage was claimed for thirty-one days at the rate of upwards of 6½d. per ton per day, but they considered the loss of time need not have exceeded twenty-seven days, and allowed demurrage for eighteen days only, namely, for nine days on account of the injury to the vessel, and for nine more as a moiety of the detention occasioned by the injury to the cargo, and at the usual rate of 4d. per ton per day. Five dollars per day were likewise allowed for the same period of eighteen days, as remuneration for the services of Messrs. Archbold and Co., the agents at Gibraltar. Following a similar calculation, two-thirds were allowed of certain other items which were common to vessel and cargo. The claim for the loss on the sugar conveyed to Patras was disallowed altogether, as no damage to that part of the cargo was discovered on survey at Gibraltar, and there was nothing to show it existed at the time, or that it was not occasioned by perils of the sea during the latter part of the voyage, after it was reshipped at Gibraltar.

Milward and Potter appeared for the Jonge Walrave; Brett, Q. C. and V. Lushington for the Egyptian.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The questions for the consideration of the court are, whether the whole amount claimed was properly due, or whether all the deductions made by the report are justified by the facts, and, if not all, to what extent the deductions ought to be supported. The registrar and merchants have allowed to the plts. a moiety of the loss upon the sugar sold at Gibraltar, subject to some deductions; but they have allowed nothing for the loss on cargo reshipped at Gibraltar; and the principle which has governed their decision with regard to allowing a moiety only appears to be the following, applied, indeed, more stringently to the cargo transhipped at Gibraltar:—The registrar and merchants were not satisfied by the evidence laid before them as to what was the cause of the damage done to the cargo. In their opinion there were two causes—first, the bad weather encountered on the voyage from Amsterdam to Gibraltar; and, secondly, the collision in Gibraltar Bay—but they were wholly unable to decide, from the evidence before them, as to the precise operation of these two causes, or, in other words, how much of the damage was to be attributed to each of the said causes. Then in this difficulty they adopted the expedient of assuming that each cause occasioned the same quantum of damage, and, therefore, as the defts. were not liable for any damage occasioned by shipping water on the voyage to Gibraltar, they reported that the plts. were entitled to a moiety only of the whole damage claimed for loss on the cargo sold at Gibraltar. Nothing was allowed for any loss arising to that part of the cargo which was reshipped at Gibraltar and sold at Patras, there being, in the opinion of the registrar and merchants, no satisfactory proof that the loss—the fact of which was admitted—had been occasioned by the collision. The court, after the consideration of all the evidence, well understands and appreciates the difficulty in which the registrar and merchants were placed, and it may be that the solution of this difficulty adopted by them is as near an approach to equity as the circumstances would allow, but the court entertains very considerable doubt whether it is competent to affirm such report—whether, on the contrary, it is not its duty, whatever may be the consequences, to decide the case according to more strict judicial principles, even though a decision founded upon those judicial principles may not be more satisfactory. This brings me to the consideration of what are the judicial principles which ought to govern the court in ascertaining the amount of damage to which the plt., successful in a cause arising from collision, is entitled. The general principle is easily stated. The deft. is a wrong-doer, and the plt. is entitled to be reimbursed for the damage done to the property; all the damage in consequence of the collision, neither more nor less. But upon whom does the onus probandi lie of showing what damage was occasioned by the collision? I apprehend, to a limited extent, on the plts.: first, because they are plts. in the cause, and must make out their case; and secondly, because, being owners of the ship and cargo, they have had the best and most ample means of proving the damage and the cause thereof. But if they show sufficient prima facie evidence which, uncontrdicted, would justify the court in coming to the conclusion that the damage was occasioned by the collision, they have fulfilled all that the law obliges them to do. Here, I apprehend, the onus probandi shifts, and it lies upon the deft. to show that, notwithstanding the prima facie evidence to the contrary, the damage was not occasioned by the collision, but that there was another or a concurrent cause, to which that damage is fairly to be attributed, and this onus probandi is greatly increased where the defts. have charged fraud. I think I must go further, and say that the deft. is bound to produce, in answer to the prima facie evidence of the plt., conclusive proof that the damage is not to be attributed to his own default, where the misconduct of the deft. has occasioned the difficulty. First, then, with regard to the prima facie proof that the damage to the cargo arose from the collision. The evidence shows that this Dutch vessel put into the bay of Gibraltar, not in consequence of any damage received at sea which made that measure necessary, but in consequence of contrary winds, which rendered it difficult, if not impossible, to prosecute the voyage to Malta and Patras. The putting into Gibraltar Bay was therefore a mere temporary measure to await a change of wind, such as any vessel might resort to without having experienced any damage at all. The collision then takes place between the Dutch vessel of 120 tons, and the steamer of 1689 tons—a disproportion of importance in this case. In the preliminary acts the plts. state that the collision took place by the stem of the Egyptian striking the port bow of the Jonge Walrave; the Egyptian states, by her starboard bow striking the port bow of the Jonge Walrave. The court, after having adverted to the evidence of the master of the Egyptian, said: "I am of opinion that the plts., in the absence of other evidence, have established a prima facie case that the damage done was done by the collision." Then, have the defts. established their case to the satisfaction of the court, either that the collision could not have occasioned the damage, or that there was another concurrent cause which either must have caused the damage or contributed thereto? Independent of any concurrent cause, I am not satisfied that the collision could not have caused the damage. I apprehend the principle to be that, if a part of the damage be clearly attributable to the wrong-doer, and it be impossible to draw the line with precision, and say how much, the wrong-doer must bear the loss. I am of opinion that, if the vessel had been strained upon the voyage to Gibraltar, and that, consequently, the collision occasioned greater damage than if she had been perfectly sound, in such case the Egyptian would be equally to blame and responsible for the whole damage. It never can, I think, be maintained that a wrong-doer is not responsible for the damage which actually accrues, though the vessel damaged might be in such a condition that the collision would occasion greater loss than if less susceptible of damage. It constantly happens, in cases of collision, that the vessels which suffer therefrom, though seaworthy, are not in their structure and condition of first-rate character, and therefore suffer more severely than others of less age and stronger build. What evidence is there to show that the damage which actually accrued to the cargo arose on the voyage to Gibraltar? There is nothing but the protest of the master, which, if I am to believe, there could have been no damage to the cargo during that voyage. And why should I disbelieve it, and hold it to be evidence for the defts., when it contradicts the case they set up? The argument has gone this length, that because the master asserts from day to day, or almost from day to day, that the vessel made no water, that therefore it must have made water. I can come to no such conclusion, and I see not the protest to justify the suspicion that taken by the master was not a proper care interest of the owners and their possible nothing inconsistent with the usual form of in similar cases and questions relating to vessels. So far as the case for the defts. upon the improbability of the collision occasioned so large a damage, I am not satisfied that any such improbability as would justify me posing, without, or indeed contrary to, the evidence that the damage had been occasioned before reached Gibraltar. [The learned Judge referred to the surveys, to the evidence of skilled witnesses, and to the testimony given subsequently to the registrar's report, which evidence he (the learned Judge) considered viewed with great vigilance, and proceeded taking a careful review of all the facts, and always reluctant to disturb a report of the ship and merchants, I am unable to concur in their conclusions. With respect to the damage at Gibraltar, I am of opinion that the report of the registrar and merchants, dividing the loss on legal principles be supported; that the court is bound to pronounce a judgment for or against a claim, or for a definite part, as proved by the evidence, and not from conjecture. I think the plts. have produced prima facie evidence to support their whole claim in this particular, and that the defence of fraud is not proved, nor sufficient evidence produced to invalidate the plts.' claim. I adhere firmly to the principle, that in all cases of doubt, ought to have the benefit of the doubt against a wrong-doer. My decree will have the following effect:—To refer back the loss with directions to allow the whole loss sustained at Gibraltar, and, on the same principle, to allow the proper charges incidental to such loss, and to disturb the report as to any of those items which have been in part disallowed on account of being extravagant charges, and the rest of the report will stand. The plts. must have the

In a cause of collision the plt. alleged, first, that the deft. improperly starboarded; and secondly, that the deft. did not starboard, at all events he neglected to do so, which he ought to have done:

Held, the court might, on the evidence, well find for the plt. without deciding whether the deft. had starboarded or not; for the first charge, if proved, was sufficient to sustain the judgment. The objection of want of certainty in pleading was not tenable.

THE AMALIA. THE MARIE DE BRABANT.

[Priv. Co.]

The case arose out of a collision which took place in the Mediterranean, between the Marie de Brabant and the Amalia, on the 12th May 1863. They were both screw-steamers, the former of 564 tons, and the latter of 1284 tons. The Amalia was coming from Malta on the voyage to Gibraltar and Liverpool. The Marie de Brabant had sailed from Antwerp bound to the East, and having called at Gibraltar, was proceeding to Malta. There were cross-actions in the Admiralty Court, where it was decided that the Amalia was solely to blame, from which judgment the present appeal was brought.

Brett, Q. C., Mibward and V. Lushington, for the app. the Amalia, contended that the resps. having expressly pleaded facts from which, as was held by the judge below, the necessary inference was that the Amalia's helm had been improperly starboarded, and having in their evidence endeavoured to prove that the collision was thereby occasioned, were not entitled to recover, the court having declined to find that the helm of the Amalia had been so starboarded, and that the collision had thereby been occasioned: (The Ann, 1 Lush. 55; The East Lothian, 1 Lush. 241.) The case of the Marie de Brabant was manifestly untrue; and the collision was occasioned by the want of due look-out on board the Marie de Brabant, and by her improperly porting her helm and endeavouring to run at full speed across the hawser of the Amalia.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. and Clarkson for the Marie de Brabant.

Sir R. Phillimore and Dr. Twiss for the owner of cargo on the Marie de Brabant.

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—Two points were urged by the app. counsel in these appeals. They contended—
1. That supposing the evidence to justify the finding that the Amalia was alone to blame, it did not make out the case alleged by the petitioner in her pleadings, and that she was not therefore entitled to recover. 2. That the evidence did not warrant a finding that the Amalia was at all to blame, or at all events that she was solely to blame. The first objection rested upon this—that the petition of the Marie de Brabant alleged an injury which it was said could have happened only by the Amalia starboarding, and that it alleged in point of fact that the helm of the Amalia was improperly put to starboard; and it was pointed out that the court below had refused to decide whether the Amalia had starboarded or not, and yet had given judgment against her. It is of great importance to the due administration of justice, that parties who seek relief in the Court of Admiralty should state the injury of which they complain with sufficient clearness and accuracy to enable their adversaries to know the case which they have to meet and to prepare their defence accordingly; and when the plt.'s allegation had been such as to mislead his opponent upon this essential matter, it has been held by this committee that the plt. was not entitled to recover. As to matters which have taken place on his own ship, he is enabled to speak, and is reasonably required to speak, with precision and certainty. With respect to what has been done on board his adversary's ship, he can in many cases, probably in most cases, speak of what was done only by inference. In this case the plt. has alleged that the Amalia starboarded her helm improperly; but he has also formally alleged that her helm was not duly and properly put to port as it ought to have been. The first charge, if proved, necessarily involves the second; but if the first be not proved, the second remains, and if established in fact, is quite sufficient to sustain the judgment. The deft. has distinct notice of the charges which he has to meet: first, that he starboarded; secondly, that if he did not starboard, at all events he neglected to port as he ought to have done. We are clearly of opinion that this objection cannot be maintained. It remains to consider the effects of the evidence. As to what was actually done by the Marie de Brabant when she sighted the Amalia, there is no dispute. Whether what she did was in the circumstances a right thing to do, is a different question. She alleges that she first saw the white light of the Amalia at a distance of four miles and two points on her port-bow; that after watching the light, as the bearing continued about the same, she ported her helm in order to give the Amalia a wider berth till the light was brought three points on her port-bow, when the helm was steadied; that afterwards the green light of the Amalia came in view, and she then put her helm hard a-port, but that the Amalia ran into her with her stem and starboard bow with such violence as to sink her. That the Marie de Brabant did put her helm to port, and afterwards hard a-port, as thus alleged, is not disputed by her opponent. The Amalia insists that it was this porting of the Marie de Brabant which occasioned the collision, for she alleged that the ships were on such courses that if each had continued without altering her helm they would have passed clear of each other starboard to starboard, but that the Marie de Brabant, by improperly porting, ran across the bows of the Amalia, and produced the accident. On her part it is positively denied that she had starboarded her helm, and it is contended that it never became her duty to port. The first question to be determined is, whether when the ships met each other the Amalia was on the starboard side or on the port side of the Marie. If she were on the port side, and only two points on the port side, there can be no doubt that she was justified in porting, and that the effect of it was to enable the two vessels to pass each other, port to port, as it was their duty to do, with greater security. If, on the other hand, they were in such a situation that they might have passed without danger, starboard to starboard, by merely continuing their courses, then by porting the Marie may have run into the danger which otherwise she would have avoided. Now, upon this point there is great contradiction in the evidence. The court below has seen and heard the witnesses, and no complaint is made of the manner in which the evidence was summed-up and the case submitted by the learned judge to the Trinity Masters. The whole court have come to the conclusion that in the circumstances proved it was the duty of the Amalia to port her helm; that she did not do so until the moment of the collision; and they have therefore in effect decided that the ships met in the positions described by the resp. and not in those alleged by the app. Adhering to the rules which we have so often had occasion to state, we cannot disturb this finding unless the app. can satisfy us that the true result of the evidence has been mistaken in the court below. With this view he relies mainly upon two facts. First, that if the ships had met stem on, or port side to port side, the Marie de Brabant must have seen the red lights of the Amalia, and that in point of fact she did not see them. Secondly, that according to the case alleged by the Marie de Brabant, no collision could possibly have taken place unless the Amalia then had starboarded, and that it was proved beyond all question that in fact she never did starboard. As to the first point, the statement and the evidence on the part of the Marie de Brabant show that no coloured lights were seen from her on board the Amalia until just before the collision, when her green light was seen after, as it is alleged, she had starboarded. Now it is proved that the Amalia actually carried lights of unusual size and brightness; whether the vessels met on the one side or the other the coloured lights, it should seem, must have been visible—on one hypothesis the red, and the other the green. That they were not seen is not easily explained. Their position with reference to the ship's bows and the bales of cotton does not afford a satisfactory explanation. This would be material if there were reason to suppose that the Marie had not kept a good look-out, but we think that this suggestion is displaced by the evidence. For the present purpose, that of deciding on which side the vessels met, it does not seem of so much importance. Secondly, we come then to the great question as to the starboard-ing. In support of the statement that the Amalia starboarded there is the evidence of Ferange, the mate of the Marie, who was the officer on deck in charge of the ship; of Goethals, the look-out man; of Lemans, the seaman, of Roggmans, the helmsman; and of Von Dippendael, the master. These witnesses, of course, can speak only to the fact that the helm of the Amalia was starboarded by describing the course of the Amalia, and the change which took place in it before she ran into the Marie. This change they say could have been occasioned only by the Amalia being placed under a starboard helm. Against this is to be set the evidence of the witnesses on board of the Amalia, Pollard the mate, Naglo the boatswain, and one or two others, who concur in stating in effect that the helm of the Amalia was not altered until the red light of the Marie was seen coming across their bows, when their helm was put hard a-port. With respect to Pollard, we must say that he appears to us to give his evidence in a very unsatisfactory manner, and to have fenced with the questions put to him, or to have been incapable of understanding them. The master of the ship did not come on deck just before the collision, and this person, the third mate, was the officer in charge of the ship at the time of the collision. Now, in this competition of witnesses, there are two circumstances which it appears to us must determine our judgment as to the side on which the truth lies. O'Neill, the man at the wheel on board the Amalia, was not called. He must have known with certainty whether the helm of the Amalia had ever been starboarded or not. He was in court when the other witnesses were examined, but the apprs. declined to call him. Davison, who is said to have been assisting him, was called, and it was urged that this is the same thing, but it is really a very different thing. Davison had gone to assist O'Neill, in case assistance was required, but he was not with him at the wheel. He says that he went on the poop, he did not go to the wheel, but to the starboard side of the poop; that while there he first saw a white light, and about eight minutes afterwards a red light, that the boatswain then gave an order to hard a-port; that he hurried to the wheel in order to assist in putting the helm hard a-port, but that the boatswain was there before him, and that the helm was put hard a-port. That this was done may be very true; but the question is, what had been done previously. Now, to this fact the witness cannot speak, and O'Neill could have spoken with perfect knowledge. No excuse is laid by any evidence for not examining him on the part of the apprs. Their suggestion that he was a corrupt and adverse witness, without any affidavit or other evidence to support the charge, can be of no avail. If he appeared to be an adverse or unfair witness, the court would have allowed the apprs.' counsel to treat him as such, and would have given to his testimony such weight, and no more, as it might seem to deserve. All that we can infer from the refusal or neglect to call him is this, that if he had been examined, his evidence would have been prejudicial, if not to the apprs.' case, and that for this reason not examined. The other fact, which seems very instructive, is this: a collision might have been produced between the two vessels in either of the two ways suggested by the parties—Marie suddenly porting and running across bows of the Amalia, or by the Amalia starboarded and running into the Marie. We think that the direction of the blow have been different, according to the manner by which the collision was occasioned. If been occasioned by the porting of the Marie, we think the blow would have led aft, by the starboarded of the Amalia, that it have led forward. Now, upon this point the contradiction in the evidence. Von Dippendael master of the Marie, says that the blow was oblique direction below the mast and the foremast a little oblique direction from the mast. Lemans says that the Amalia came from the side of the Marie towards her stern, and her bows came across the Marie from the stern towards fore part of the ship. Ferange, the mate, says the blow slanted forwards; that the Amalia not have come perpendicularly upon the Marie then she could not have hit her that sliding and Willman, the look-out man on board Amalia, confirms this, and says that she struck Marie a slanting blow, slanting from the towards the fore part of the vessel. This statement is not inconsistent with—the contrary rather favoured by—the actual marks on the bows of the Amalia, according to the certificate of the surveyor, and the Marie having seen have all the evidence on the point which circumstances admit of. If it were necessary to the question, therefore, we must hold, on balance of the evidence before us, that the starboarded her helm, and thereby occasioned accident; but it is sufficient for disposing of the case to say that the apprs. have failed to convince that the judgment below is erroneous, either the rules of the law which were applied, the effect of the evidence. We must humbly to Her Majesty our opinion that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

THE CONSTITUTION.

the owners of the George Dean against the owner of the Constitution.

The cause arose out of a collision which occurred between the George Dean and the Constitution, at about six o'clock on the evening of the 11th Feb. 1864, in the neighbourhood of the Skerries, off the coast of Anglesea.

The George Dean was a brig of 182 tons register, and the Constitution was a ship of 1282 tons register.

It was alleged in the court below on the part of the present apps. that the George Dean was sailing with the wind a fresh gale from the south-west, close hauled to the wind on the port tack, heading about west north-west, and making about a knot and a half an hour, and that whilst she was so sailing the Constitution with the wind free ran into her starboard waist and caused her to founder.

The case set up in the court below by the owners of the Constitution, the present resps., was, that the Constitution, with the wind about S. W. by S., unsteady and freshening, was close hauled to the wind on the starboard tack, when a green light was seen about a point and a half to two points on her port bow. That the Constitution was kept close to the wind on the starboard tack. That the green light was watched for a short time, when it disappeared, and that shortly afterwards a green light, and then the brig George Dean, were seen at a short distance from the Constitution, and about a point and a half on her port bow, and approaching the Constitution, and rendering a collision inevitable. That the helm of the Constitution was put hard a-port; but that the George Dean with her starboard side came into collision with the stem of the Constitution.

The learned judge of the court below was assisted by Captain Drew and Admiral Collinson, two of the elder brethren of the Trinity Corporation. The evidence on both sides was taken orally in open court.

A cross-action had been instituted by the owners of the Constitution, the present resps., against the owners of the George Dean.

In his address to the Trinity Masters, the following observations were made by

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Gentlemen.—You are well aware that we are under the government of a recent Act of Parliament, and new steering and sailing rules, which we must apply to the circumstances of this case. Now of these two vessels, the one was proceeding from Liverpool and the other was proceeding to Liverpool; and the first question which I wish to address to your consideration is, whether the facts of the case show that the 11th article of the new rules applies, or the 12th. These two vessels see each other at a considerable distance, looking at all the facts of the case, not less than a mile; and I think it inevitably follows that if what was right had been done there could have been no collision. What they did do seems rather to resolve itself into this, they neither of them did anything. The vessel on the port tack kept her course, and the vessel on the starboard tack, according to her own statement, made no alteration in her helm until the actual collision was taking place. With a view to drawing your attention to the question under which of the two rules the case falls, I will advert to the 7th article of the two preliminary Acts. It is alleged that the George Dean was close hauled on the port tack heading W.N.W., and on the other side it is stated that the Constitution was close hauled on the starboard tack, and heading S.E. by S. Now the 11th rule is this: "If two sailing ships are meeting end-on, or nearly end-on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both should be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other." Now, subject to your better opinion, I should say this is not the rule that applies, and that these two vessels were not meeting end-on, or nearly end-on, so as to involve risk of a collision. According to my view, the case falls under the 12th rule: "When two sailing ships are crossing"—there is a distinction in these rules between meeting and crossing—"so as to involve risk of collision then, if they have the wind on different sides," which is the case here, "the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side," and then follow certain exceptions. Now, assuming these two vessels were crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then the passage I have read directs that the ship with the wind on the port side—that is the port-tack ship—shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side. If it stood there it would be a very simple matter: the George Dean being on the port tack would have been bound to give way to the Constitution, which was on the starboard tack. But the rule goes on: "except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close hauled, and the other ship free, in which case the latter ship shall keep out of the way." Now, to apply the rule so qualified to the present case. Assuming the George Dean was close hauled upon the port tack. If you are of opinion that the Constitution was on the starboard tack close hauled, then, in that case, the George Dean was bound to keep out of the way; but if the Constitution, though on the starboard tack, had the wind free, she would be bound to get out of the way; and by the term "get out of the way," we mean, take her own choice, to go on one side or the other. Another rule then follows, which I will presently notice, as to the duty of the other ship. It is thus of the greatest importance in this case that you should determine whether the George Dean was close hauled on the port tack; and, secondly, whether the Constitution was close hauled on the starboard tack. I repeat it again; if the George Dean was close hauled on the port tack and the Constitution was free, then it was the duty of the Constitution to have kept out of the way, which she did not do; and then, moreover, it was the duty of the George Dean to do nothing; because here is a very important rule: "Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article." Therefore, supposing the starboard-tack vessel had the wind free, it was the duty of the port-tack vessel to keep her course, which she did. Now as to the question, purely one of fact, whether the starboard-tack vessel had the wind free, which is the only question in the case, I think it would be vain to go through the evidence. If you should be of opinion that the starboard-tack vessel was not sailing free, then the George Dean was to blame; and if you come to the conclusion she was sailing free, it is clear as daylight that the port-tack ship should have kept her course, and the starboard-tack ship given way. Now we have had great discussion as to the wind and the proximity to the Skerries; but these matters really do not appear to me to be of importance to discuss. I conceive it all depends upon what I have stated, and therefore we will go into the next room.

AFTER CONSULTATION.

Dr. Lushington.—We are of opinion that the George Dean is to blame for this collision, and that no blame attaches to the Constitution.

The Queen's Advocate.—Perhaps it would be convenient to your Lordship to state the grounds and the reasons upon which that decision is founded.

The Court.—I never undertake to give you the argument of the Trinity Masters, for if I did so I should in all probability make a mistake; but our judgment is founded upon this, we think that both vessels were close hauled, and that under the terms of the rule the port-tack vessel is to give way and the starboard-tack vessel to keep her course: we consider the case falls under the 12th rule.

The Queen's Advocate and V. Lushington, for the apps., the owners of the George Dean, contended that the evidence showed that the Constitution was in fact sailing free, and was solely to blame.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Clarkson for the resps.

Lord KINGSDOWN.—The first point to be considered in this is, whether the questions of law which arose in it were properly decided by the learned judge, and the questions of fact upon which the decision depends were accurately stated in his summing-up to the Trinity Masters. Upon this subject we entertain no doubt whatever. We agree with the learned judge that in the courses in which these vessels met, the 11th of the New Navigation Rules has no application, and that the 12th rule must determine the rights of the parties. The vessels were not meeting end-on, or nearly end-on, and the only question is, which was bound to get out of the way. Now the rule prescribes that when two sailing vessels are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, then if they have the wind on opposite sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close hauled and the other ship free, in which case the latter ship shall keep out of the way. In this case there is no doubt that the ships were crossing; that they had the wind on opposite sides, the Constitution on the starboard side and the George Dean on the port side. It was, therefore, the duty of the George Dean to get out of the way unless the Constitution had the wind free. This is stated by the learned judge to the Trinity Masters to be the only question in the case, and we entirely agree with him. In dealing with the effect of the evidence on this question, we are involved in the greatest difficulty. It depends partly upon the credit due to the witnesses, of which we have but imperfect means of judging, and partly on the inferences which persons of nautical skill, of which we are necessarily destitute, may draw from facts which are established. The court below saw the witnesses, the Trinity Masters, of whom one was Admiral Collinson, a seaman of the greatest distinction, personally examined the witnesses, and would be far better able to understand them, and to judge of the probability or improbability of their story, than it is possible for us to do even with the assistance which we receive from the able naval officers who are ordered to attend the committee in these cases. It was argued by Mr. Brett, that an appeal to the Judicial Committee is not like an application to a court of law for a new trial, where, if there be evidence to warrant the verdict, the court will often not disturb the finding of the jury (to whom the decision of the fact belongs), though it may not entirely approve of it; that here we are sitting, not only as judges, but as a jury, from which it was inferred that in order to affirm, we ought to be satisfied that the finding is that at which we should have arrived if the matter were res integra. We do not agree to that principle. We laid down in the case of the Julia, 14 Moo. P. C. 235, in the year 1861, the rules by which we must be guided. The practice of the Court of Admiralty does not allow of new trials; and, considering that from the pursuits and habits of life of seamen, on whose testimony the questions of fact usually depend, it would generally be impossible in such cases to collect them again for a second trial as for other reasons, we think the rule a w We must either affirm or alter a sentence or and those who call upon us to alter it must us with a reasonable conviction that it is We certainly are unable to arrive at that co in the present case. The evidence is entire contradictory upon many points; but in some the contradiction is the strongest, there is us to be reason for thinking that the rather on the side of the apps. than of the For instance, one important question is, whether the Constitution was steering more or less in a e direction. Abernethy, the master of the Dean, says that the Constitution was steering and had the wind free. On cross-examination appears that his reason for saying that is, it was the course to Liverpool from the point she was at the time of the collision; but that for Point Lynas, he says, would be S.E. and we think it clearly proved that she was to Point Lynas, in order to take a pilot to pool, and not direct to Liverpool. The observations on board the George Dean who speak of the course of the Constitution, do not seem to us as we are capable of judging, to assign very reasons for their statements. MacNay, the master of the Constitution, says distinctly that she was steering from S.E. to S.E. by S., the wind not being steady; that she was standing to the wind with her yards sharp up; that he was such (which necessarily means so much) that he did not know whether he should go to Point Lynas. It was strongly urged that in the log which the Constitution was carrying proved that she could not be close hauled; but that at a point which excited the attention of the Trinity masters in the court below, and which Collinson put questions on the subject to the witnesses on behalf of the Constitution, and as it occurred in the judgment, must have been satisfied at the point. That the yards were braced-up close was sworn positively by McNay, the master, and the mate, who, on cross-examination, said the yards were sharp up as close as ever we could get them. I had two pulls at the braces to get them as close as I could." Some observations were made by the app.'s counsel on the state of the log of the Constitution, in which an erasure appeared to have been made, and an alteration introduced of the course which the ship was steering at the time of the collision. It was pointed out at the trial that the mate by whom the log had been kept, and who gave his explanation of the circumstance. At first it appeared to be suspicious, but all suspicion was removed by the fact that the entry was in no means favourable to the case of the respondents; that, if an entry were to be fabricated, it would have been quite as easy to make it "south-east by east as south-east by east." Upon the whole, though we think the case one of much doubt, we are satisfied that the decision below is erroneous, and must humbly report to Her Majesty our opinion that it ought to be affirmed, but without costs.

HARVEY v. BECKWITH.

[CHAN.]

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKBANK and JAMES B. DAVIDSON,
Esqrs., Barristers-at-Law.

Monday, June 6, 1864.

(Before the LORDS JUSTICES.)

HARVEY v. BECKWITH.

Insurance on vessel—Coasting trade—Construction.

The rules of a Mutual Marine Insurance Association provided that vessels crossing the North Sea to any port north of the Texel, the Atlantic, or Bay of Biscay, or to any port south of Brest, should not, if the cargo consisted of iron, carry more than a certain percentage above the registered tonnage; that "ships employed in the coasting trade and ports between the Texel and Brest" should not carry more than a specified weight of cargo. "And in all cases of loss while so laden," the owner should be subject to a stated percentage of deduction:

Held by Knight Bruce, L. J. (agreeing with Wood, V. C., but dissentiente Turner, L. J.), that a vessel which was lost on the coast of Norfolk whilst on a voyage from Sunderland to Bordeaux, was not "employed in the coasting trade," and that the words "whilst so laden" applied to both classes of ships mentioned in the above rule. The plt. was therefore entitled to the sum insured, less the specified percentage of deduction.

This was an appeal from a decree of Wood, V. C.

The bill was filed by the plt., a shipowner, in order to recover from a Mutual Marine Insurance Society, called The Colchester and Wivenhoe Total Loss Mutual Marine Association, the whole of a sum of money, for which his brig called The Faith had been insured with the society.

On the 21st Feb. 1863, the plt. executed the deed of settlement of the society in respect of the ship, and he thereby became one of its members. Each person who executed the said deed thereby covenanted with the other and others of them to insure from the hour of the day on which the owner of each ship executed the deed until the 3rd Feb. 1864, the respective sums set opposite to the names of the ships, the respective names of which were set opposite to the seals of the persons who executed the deed, in case such ship should suffer total loss; and it was agreed that, in the event of such loss, each of the persons executing the deed should be liable to pay so much of the sum for which the ship lost was insured as should become payable by reason of the insurance, rateably and proportionately, and not jointly or in partnership, according to the rate and proportion which the sum insured upon each vessel at the time of such loss bore to the whole sum insured by the association, subject to the rules thereafter contained.

By these rules the deft. Mr. Beckwith was appointed secretary, and several other persons, who were made defts. to the suit, were appointed its committee of management, with power to grant policies of insurance and to settle and adjust all claims, losses and charges. The rules further required that there should be a meeting in each half-year for these purposes, and it was provided that all losses ordered to be raised by the committee should be drawn for by the secretary, and in case any person should neglect to pay his proportion of the losses within fourteen days after notice of the amount thereof in writing should have been directed to him by the secretary, the proportion of the person so making default should become a debt in law due from him to the owner of the ship lost, and all proceedings for the recovery thereof should be taken in the County Courts. And it was provided that all disputes as to the amount of liability and as to the construction of the rules should be settled by arbitration.

The 25th of the rules was as follows:

That ships crossing the North Sea to any port north of the Texel, to the Atlantic or the Bay of Biscay, or to any port south of Brest, if the cargo consist of iron or other metal, metallic ore, slates, bricks, stone, or sulphur, shall not carry more weight than 35 per cent. above the registered tonnage N. M., or 50 per cent. N. N. M.; that ships employed in the coasting trade between the Texel and Brest, with cargoes consisting of any of the above-named articles, shall not carry more weight than they make out upon an average with coals; and in all cases of damage whilst so laden, the claim of the owner or owners shall be subject to deduction as follows: that is to say, vessels in class A 1, 10 per cent.; in class A 2, 15 per cent.; and in class A 3, the owner shall forfeit all claim whatever. But, notwithstanding as aforesaid, no vessel shall be considered to be loaded with the excepted articles where the cargo does not consist of more than 10 per cent. of the burden of the vessel."

The Faith was of the registered tonnage of 261 tons N. N. M., and she was entered in the class A 2 upon the books of the association. No policy in respect of her was ever granted to the plt.

On the 21st May 1863 the brig was totally lost. She was then on a voyage from Sunderland to Bordeaux, and her cargo consisted of 355 tons of coals, and 100 tons of pig iron. The iron was entered as part of the cargo, and freight was paid upon it; but it was alleged in the bill that it was taken as ballast only. The loss took place upon Blakeney Bar, between Wells and Cromer on the coast of Norfolk.

The plt. then claimed from the association the whole of the sum (600*l.*) for which the vessel was insured as aforesaid; but the claim was resisted on the ground that he had violated the 25th rule by loading the vessel beyond the 50 per cent. in excess of the registered tonnages mentioned in that rule.

The matter was referred in the first instance to arbitration; but, arbitration failing, the bill was filed by the owner against the secretary and the members of the association to procure payment as upon a total loss of the whole sum insured, without any deduction in respect of the iron on board; or of the whole sum less 15 per cent., according to the 25th rule. The bill also prayed that the defts. might be decreed to execute to the plt. a proper policy of insurance.

The evidence established that the Faith, when she was lost, was not carrying more weight than she could make out upon an average with coals.

At the hearing before Wood, V. C., it was admitted on the part of the plt. that the pig iron on board must be taken to have been part of the cargo. It was contended for the plt. that the ship, though bound to a port south of Brest, was not crossing the North Sea, the Atlantic, or the Bay of Biscay, but that she was employed "in the coasting trade" at the time of the loss, and that, if such were the fact, as the cargo she carried did not exceed the weight fixed for a coasting vessel, no deduction from the sum assured ought to be made.

On the part of the defts. it was argued that the plt. ought to have proceeded at law, and could not maintain a bill in this court; that the iron was part of the cargo; that the vessel was not on a coasting voyage, but was bound to Bordeaux, and it made no difference that the loss took place upon the English coast, and that the deduction of 15 per cent. on vessels in class A 2, applied only to ships employed on a voyage to ports between the Texel on the north and Brest on the south, or employed in the coasting trade. The iron carried exceeded the prescribed proportion, and nothing was payable under the insurance.

The learned V. C. held, that the bill was maintainable, and that the vessel was not at the time of her loss "employed in the coasting trade." The plt. was entitled to recover the sum assured, less 15 per cent., and he decreed accordingly, ordering the defts. the committee to pay the costs of the suit.

NELSON v. BARTER.

[CHAN.]

The defts., the committee of the association, appealed.

A. E. Miller (with him Sir Hugh Cairns, Q. C.) supported the decree.

Willcock, Q. C. and Walford appeared for the apps.

Lord Justice KNIGHT BRUCE said, that these rules were so worded, with such remarkable ambiguity and obscurity, that if they had not been already discussed before one of the learned V. C.'s, and adjudicated upon by him as being intelligible, he should have been almost disposed to hold them good for nothing as being quite unintelligible—to do which would, as he supposed, have had the effect of giving to the plt. the whole amount for which the insurance upon the ship was effected, without making any deduction. But, as so eminent a judge had come to the conclusion that the rules were so far intelligible that they would be construed, he himself deferred to that view. That being so, the question for the court was, whether his Honour had arrived at that interpretation with which his learned brother and himself ought to agree. He himself was of opinion that, if any interpretation could be adopted at all, it would be impossible to suggest a better one than that which the V. C. had suggested; and indeed that interpretation appeared to him more likely to be right than any other. The question was, whether the words "whilst so laden," in the 25th rule, referred to both classes of vessels mentioned in the rule, or to one of them only; and upon the whole, in his opinion, the better and sounder interpretation was that these words applied to both classes, and not to the latter only. Either the clause was unintelligible and impracticable, in which case the plt. would be entitled to the whole of the amount insured, or it must in his (the L. J.'s) opinion be interpreted as his Honour had interpreted it. Upon all considerations the latter conclusion seemed to him the better one, and it would be the better course to let the decree stand as it then stood.

Lord Justice TURNER, after considering the words of the rule, said that he was unable to agree with his learned brother's conclusion; as the L. J., however, agreed with the V. C., the appeal would be dismissed, but without costs.

A. E. Miller objected to this order that the plt. being himself a member of the insuring association, would have to bear his share of the costs of the defts. if the order were made in that form. He submitted that the order ought to exonerate him from paying any contribution towards those costs.

After some discussion the defts. gave an undertaking that such portion of their costs as would be paid by the plt. as a member of the club should be returned to him.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Westbury.)

NELSON v. BARTER.

Demurrer—Interpleader—Judgment-debt—Foreign attachment.

Plts. were sued by A., who recovered judgment against them, but on the same day plts. received notice that A. had made an equitable assignment of his debt to B., and the judgment remained unsatisfied. A few days afterwards the plts. were served with attachment papers issuing out of the Lord Mayor's Court, attaching all moneys of A. in their hand at the suit of C. The plts. wrote to B. asking whether he wished them to adopt any and what proceedings in respect of the attachment; to which B.'s reply was that he did not consider himself concerned with the attachment. The action in the Lord Mayor's Court accordingly went on, the plts. taking no part, and finally judgment was recovered against the plts. as garnishees.

To an interpleader bill filed by the plts. against C., B., and A., B. and A. demurred, on the ground (1) that the judgment-debt was not attachable, as being in custodia legis, and as having become beneficially transferred to B., who was not the party sued in the Lord Mayor's Court; and (2) that the plts. ought to have defended the action in the Lord Mayor's Court.

Demurrer overruled.

This was an appeal from a decree of Wood, V.C.

The plts. were assurers, who had underwritten a policy of marine assurance, effected by the deft. John Wilson. The ship was lost, and Wilson brought six actions against the plts. for 100% each, which were afterwards consolidated; and on the 16th Feb. 1864 Wilson recovered for the full amount of 600% and costs.

On the same day the plts. received notice that the sums recovered in the actions had been assigned by Wilson to the defts. T. Early and T. E. Smith.

On the 20th Feb. the plts. were served with attachment papers issuing out of the Lord Mayor's Court, in an action in which the defts. W. Barter and E. R. Cummins were plts. and Wilson was deft., whereby all such moneys, goods and effects of Wilson, as the plts. in equity, then had or as should thereafter come into their hands or custody, were attached to answer the claim of the said W. Barter and E. R. Cummins.

On the 25th Feb. the plts. were served with summonses on attachment requiring them to show cause on the 24th March following.

On the 27th Feb. all proceedings in the actions (at the suit of Wilson) were stayed to enable the plts. in equity to move for a new trial.

On the 2nd March the solicitors of the plts. wrote to the solicitors of Messrs. Early and Smith the letter, the material parts of which will be found in his Honour's judgment below; and on the 4th March the solicitors of Messrs. Early and Smith replied in the terms also mentioned below.

The bill alleged (par. 11) as follows: "On the 24th March 1864 the defts. W. Barter and E. R. Cummins duly recovered judgment against the plts. (in equity) in the said action against them as such garnishees as aforesaid."

On the 11th May 1864, the plts. having obtained a rule to show cause in Wilson's actions, the rule was argued and discharged.

The plts. thereupon, on the 23rd May, filed this bill against Messrs. Barter and Cummins, Messrs. Early and Smith and John Wilson, praying that the defts. might be decreed to interplead.

The defts., Early and Smith and John Wilson, jointly and severally demurred to the bill for want of equity.

The V. C. on the 28th June last overruled the demurrer. His Honour's judgment was as follows:

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—This case comes on upon demurrer to a bill of interpleader, under these circumstances. The plts. are underwriters, and they insured the deft. John Wilson against loss, but disputed the loss when it arose. The case was decided against them, and a judgment was recovered against them by Wilson, in respect of the money for which they had underwritten; but in the meantime they received notice, before Wilson was paid, from the solicitors of one set of debts, namely, the demurring debts. Thomas Early Smith and Thomas Early, that Wilson had assigned to them the moneys due to him under the judgment. Of course, therefore, they could not safely pay that money to Wilson or to any person claiming through Wilson. On the other hand the other debts. Barter and Cummins, by the process of foreign attachment in the Lord Mayor's Court, attached the debt due to Wilson from the plts. in this suit for this sum so found due on the judgment. In that state of things they were, of course, doubly harassed; and, being so harassed, they wrote a letter to the solicitors of the two debts. Early and Smith, who had taken this assignment of Wilson's debt, saying, that as solicitors for the plts. in this interpleader suit, they beg to inform them that they have been served with attachments at the suit of Barter and Cummins against John Wilson: "Will you be good enough to inform us if you wish the above-named gentlemen to adopt any and what proceedings in respect of the above attachments, and, if so, if you are ready and willing to guarantee them against all loss, costs, and damages in respect of any proceedings they may take in reference thereto?" The answer to that letter is: "It does not appear to us that our clients need concern themselves with the attachments mentioned in your letter of the 2nd inst. Should the verdict for the plts. stand, they will look for payment as a matter of course." Therefore, that answer plainly told these gentlemen, "We pay no regard to your being sued, and being subject to a debt which you acknowledge to be a debt, we are anxious and ready to pay to either party entitled; we do not care about your being sued on foreign attachment, take your own course, and we shall rely undoubtedly on our assignment of the debt." It appeared to me, I confess, on the first aspect of the case, that it was a clear case for interpleader. But the defence on this demurrer is this: Smith and Wilson demur on this ground. They say the foreign attachment was utterly absurd and unavailable, because no foreign attachment lies in such a case when there is a suit in respect of a judgment which has been recovered by a proceeding in a court of superior jurisdiction, a court of common law; that no foreign attachment will lie on that judgment whilst it remains unsatisfied, and that the plts. in this interpleader suit might have simply pleaded nil habet, and that that would be an answer to the demand. But the question which arose to my mind is, are they obliged to do that? Are parties, who are sued at law in a case in which they have not the slightest interest, to be put to the expense of defending a suit in which they do not care which of the two parties are entitled? Are they obliged, however ridiculous or absurd the one suit may be, (unless it is so preposterous that you must necessarily infer collusion in the non-resistance of the debts.), to put themselves to the expense of defending that suit? I think not. I think they took the right course in writing to these debts. to say, "This matter is your matter, not ours. Are we to take any steps or not?" and that it is not the proper course for these persons who claim the debt by assignment to say, "You must take your own course, we shall stand on our rights, hold you liable, and you may set up what defence you like," in a suit in which they have not the slightest interest. I have no doubt whatever on the authorities. I have looked back to the old authorities, and I find Lord Eldon puts the case very shortly in Angell v. Hadden, 15 Ves. 244. He there, in going through the Duke of Bolton's case, mentions a case in which there was a trustee for a number of persons of a certain fund. The case came before Lord Thurlow. The stakeholder of that fund was willing to pay the trustee, and that would have been a good discharge as against all the several persons who claimed interests. But the several persons who claimed an interest in the fund had made assignments, and had mixed up the question with a great many difficulties, and the trustee was threatened with suits from one assignee and another assignee the different persons who were cestuis que trust of the fund, and he declined to take the fund. The question was, whether he had a right to have the fund. Lord Eldon states the ground of the decision to be "that the duke held the money for the trustee, if he chose to assert his legal title on behalf of others; but, if he would not assert that title, there was a principle of jurisprudence in this court, entitling the duke to say he had the money ready to be handed over to any person who had the right to receive it, and, all these persons making claims, to desire the court to tell him to whom he ought to pay it." Then he puts, in one sentence, the ground thus: "The ground, therefore, was not that he might not be able by great attention and caution to make himself secure; but that he might secure himself by one suit, instead of perhaps forty, as one payment ought to discharge him." Perhaps this gentleman, by great caution, might make himself secure by pleading nil habet and going into the question. I am inclined to think with Mr. Jolliffe (and I am rather with him on the authorities) that the foreign attachment would not apply, and that these gentlemen might have defended that suit; but why was he to take any trouble about that which was not at all his concern? He writes to those, whose concern it was, "I am sued in respect of a debt that you say is yours; another person says it is his, and that other person will not recognise your assignment; I do not know whether you have got an assignment or not. He has notice that it is a good assignment, it is not a matter that he knows about, and he says, you must settle that with the person claiming by way of foreign attachment. I do not think it is an answer to him to say that the foreign attachment would not lie. There is a case something like it before Lord Eldon, of Stevenson v. Anderson, 2 Ves. & B. 407. There one Anderson obtained goods from Messrs. Goodall, his correspondents in Scotland; and, to indemnify them, he remitted four bills of exchange accepted by different persons, and indorsed by him Anderson. The Goodalls sent them to Stevenson as their agent. Therefore they were in the hands of Stevenson in that way, they had been remitted to the hands of the Goodalls to obtain payment. Then one Dick, who was also a debt. in the interpleader suits, "of Dundee, in Scotland, claiming as a creditor of Anderson, having instituted proceedings against him for that debt before the Lords of Session in Scotland, served the Goodalls with letters of arrestment" (just like the foreign attachment) "upon any property of Anderson in their hands." Then Anderson wrote to the Goodalls, desiring to have the bills returned to him. He also demanded them back from the plt., and on his refusing brought trover against the plt. Then he files an interpleader bill, the Goodalls are out of the jurisdiction but he makes them parties, and Anderson puts in a general demurrer for want of equity. They argue, amongst other things, this: they say, "This bill of interpleader is of the first impression, by a person having no money in his hands, but holding these bills as an agent to procure payment, instead of which he files this bill;" hazarding by the delay the loss of their amount. Then another novelty, they say, is, that they are called upon to interplead with people who are out of the jurisdiction, which had been held to be a fatal objection in a late case, and that this bill, under the pretence of interpleader, is really a bill against Anderson alone to compel him

NELSON v. BARTER.

to involve himself in Scotch litigation. On the other side this is said: the plt. admitted that there was this difficulty in their case, "It is true that Mr. Erskine, in his Institutes, says, that bills of exchange are not attachable by the laws of Scotland" (which raises the same sort of argument which is raised here) "but Mr. Bell shows" (this is Bell's Commentaries) "that this is not to be received absolutely; that bills may be attached in the hands of a person intrusted as the Goodalls were. Admitting, however, that to be questionable, the plt. should not be put to the difficulty of agitating that question." He is not the person to agitate it. Then, on the other side, they rely a good deal upon the parties being abroad; they rely a good deal on Stevenson being a mere agent and wanting to involve Anderson in litigation, and indicating a disposition, on the part of Stevenson, to collude with the Scotch persons for whom he acted as agent. Lord Eldon says: "I have looked at this record with great care, and every case I can find of interpleader; and, though I doubt whether there is perfect bona fides on the part of the plt., I find it decided that the court is, in the first instance, concluded by his affidavit, that there is no collusion, and will not admit an affidavit to the contrary. Upon the next consideration, whether the plt. has stated a right to come here as to these bills—for which it is said he would be answerable to his principals, residing in Scotland—it is very difficult to maintain that he would not be answerable to them in an action if they revoked the purpose for which he was employed; but there is enough to make them parties to a bill of interpleader. Next, if Anderson could maintain his action of trover for these bills—and there is great semblance that he might—that makes a double claim, which, according to some authorities, is sufficient. There is also an attachment in Scotland, which from Bell's last publication is a circumstance raising considerable doubt, whether bills, under such circumstances, are not attachable, notwithstanding what is said in Erskine's Institutes." That is just the case raised here, that it is a question of some degree of doubt. I cannot say there is not a degree of doubt, though the inclination of my opinion is that this debt would not be attachable; but still there is some degree of doubt upon the authorities on the point, and it appears to me that the plt. is not the person who ought to be subjected to litigation or put to any inconvenience on that doubt. It is said that he has suffered the judgment to go by default. But it was not until he had given this notice to Early and Smith; and I apprehend it does not lie in Early and Smith's mouth to say that he has put himself in a worse position. What Barter and Cummins, who are not demurring parties, may say I do not know. They may perhaps say, "You have let the judgment go by default, and you are too late in coming here." But that does not lie in the mouth of Early and Smith at all. They had full notice, they did not choose to interfere, they said, "We stand upon our own rights." That is the position that the plts. are in. If Early and Smith are right—they say, "We allow you, our trustees, to be harassed by another suit, and all we say is, when you give us notice, you must take your own course, we shall look to you." It appears to me that it is a clear case of interpleader, and therefore the demurrer must be overruled.

Rolt, Q. C. and Jolliffe, on behalf of Messrs. Early and Smith and John Wilson, supported the appeal.—The defts. Messrs. Barter and Cummins had attached this debt after verdict, but before judgment. The plts. might then have pleaded nil habet; but if, on the other hand, they chose to consent to the foreign attachment, it was impossible they could be allowed to call upon the defts. to interplead. First, this money was not attachable. It was in custodia legis: (Humphrey v. Barns, Cro. Eliz. 691.) Secondly, the custom of foreign attachment in the Lord Mayor's Court does not apply to debts the beneficial interest of which is vested in a person other than the deft. sued in such court, whereof the garnishee has notice:

Westoby v. Day, 2 EL. & BL. 611.

A. E. Miller (Sir H. Cairns, Q. C.) with him, for the plts., were not called upon.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—I have no doubt that if all the facts of this case had been brought before me, it would have turned out to be not a case for interpleader. But I am bound to take the case upon the allegations of the bill. The substance of the argument was this, that if the plts. had done their duty they would not have had judgment recovered against them as garnishees, and that, having regard to the other allegations in the bill, it must be held that that judgment was unduly recovered. But the bill unfortunately states that that judgment was duly recovered, and the demurrer admits that allegation to be true. It may be true as a proposition of law, that at the time when the attachment was lodged there was no admitted debt due from the plts. to Wilson. It may also be perfectly true that, at the time when the attachment was lodged, the beneficial interest of any debt that might be due from the plts. to Wilson had been bonâ fide transferred for valuable consideration to Messrs. Early and Smith. But there may have been some ground of law, or some ground of conduct upon which the attachment creditor was entitled to recover judgment against the garnishee, notwithstanding this objection; and I am bound to assume that this judgment was recovered duly, as it is alleged to have been so recovered. That being so, the attachment creditor is placed in the same situation towards the garnishee as if he were assignee of the debt. Then, notwithstanding the title which the attachment creditor gets and perfects by means of that judgment, the original creditor is still at liberty to dispute the title of the attachment creditor, and the liability of the garnishees in respect of the judgment which has been recovered against them by the attachment creditor. That is a clear revival of a disputed claim, which had its origin in the acts and conduct of the original creditor to whom, but for those acts, the debtor might have been liable. Therefore I think the V. C.'s conclusion was a perfectly right one. The letter is of importance only as showing what were the facts of the question. The plts. give notice of this attachment, and request to know whether there shall or shall not be any proceedings. The result, therefore is, that the plts. did everything that was required of them, and it is impossible not to say that they did not act impartially and equally between the parties. If I had, what I have not, and what I am bound to exclude, facts brought before me to show that this action in the Lord Mayor's Court was not defended as it ought to have been, but that the plts. (in equity) neglected their duty and submitted to the jurisdiction; these facts might have established such a case of collusion as would have disentitled the plts. (in this bill) to have been treated as bonâ fide creditors of Messrs. Early and Smith. I cannot assent to the ingenious arguments that have been employed in support of this demurrer, because, admitting the truth of the bill, and the legal argument founded thereon, there may yet be circumstances to justify the verdict in the Lord Mayor's Court. I must take the case as I find it, and refuse this appeal with costs.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. MAYN and LORLEY SMITH, Esqrs.
Barristers-at-Law.

May 3 and June 13, 1864.

DE LA ROSA V. PRIETO.

Medical Act—21 & 23 Vict. c. 90, s. 32—Registration —Contract made on board a foreign vessel of war—
Lex fori.

Sec. 32 of the Medical Act, requiring a person who is sued to recover any charge for medical or surgical attendants, or for the performance of any operation, or for any medicine prescribed and supplied, to prove that he is registered under that Act, applies to an action brought by one of two medical men against the other to recover remuneration for attending to his patients during his absence, according to an agreement made between them.

Although a foreign vessel of war is for some purposes considered as part of the territory of the state to which it belongs, a contract made on board between one of the officers and a person domiciled in England, is affected by the municipal law of England requiring written proof to be given by a plt. suing upon such a contract.

An agreement was made on board a Peruvian man-of-war lying in the Thames between the plt., a foreigner, domiciled and practising as a medical man in England, and the deft., who was the medical officer of the vessel, by which the plt. agreed for a stipulated remuneration to act as medical officer to the vessel, while she lay in the Thames, as the plt.'s substitute. The plt. having brought an action to recover this remuneration for his services, and not proving that he was registered under the Medical Act, it was Held that he could not maintain the action.

The declaration contained counts for work and labour and on accounts stated. Pleas, never indebted and payment.

The plt. was a medical man, not a native of England, but domiciled in England, where he had practised since 1836. He had no English diploma, and was not registered under 21 & 23 Vict. c. 90.
The deft. was a Peruvian and medical officer on board a Peruvian vessel of war lying in the Thames.
Being desirous of absenting himself from the ship for some time, he arranged with the plt. that the latter should act as medical officer for the vessel during his absence, for a remuneration agreed upon between them. The arrangement was made on board the vessel. The plt. did act as medical officer for the vessel, and not having been paid by the deft. brought this action. It was objected at the trial that the plt. was prevented from recovering by sec. 32 of the Medical Act (21 & 23 Vict. c. 90), which is as follows:

After the 1st Jan. 1860 no person shall be entitled to recover any charge in any court of law for any medical or surgical attendants, or for the performance of any operation, or for any medicine which he shall have both prescribed and supplied, unless he shall prove upon the trial that he is registered under this Act.

On behalf of the plt. it was contended that the section did not apply to such a contract as that between the plt. and the deft., and that the statute law of England did not govern a contract made upon a Peruvian man-of-war, which must be considered as a Peruvian territory.

A verdict was entered for the plt. for 85l., the def. having leave to move to enter a verdict for him, or a nonsuit. A rule having been obtained accordingly,

Beauchamp (Gates with him) showed cause.

Giffels supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

June 13.—BYLES, J. delivered the judgment of the court.—We are of opinion that the plt., being an unregistered medical practitioner, cannot recover for medical attendance afforded to the patients of the deft. on the deft.'s credit. It was contended at the trial that the Act of Parliament, 21 & 23 Vict. c. 90, ss. 31 and 32, did not apply to contracts between medical men themselves, but was confined to cases in which the patients are sued for medicines or medical attendance. We agree that the Act has no application in the case of an unregistered assistant suing a registered practitioner for his salary. But where the action is brought either against the patients themselves or against any one who is to pay for medical attendance or medicines prescribed and supplied to them, we think the statute applies.
Suppose medicines administered by an unregistered practitioner to a patient under a guarantee for payment given by a third person, the statute would, we conceive, be a defence either to the principal debtor or to the surety. Suppose medicines administered to the poor of a parish or union on the credit of overseers of the parish or guardians of the union, the statute would in like manner be a defence, for the case would fall both within the words and spirit of the enactment. The patient does not the less require protection because the paymaster is a third person. In the case now under consideration the def. when he went abroad, and engaged the plt.
to act in his place, agreeing to pay for medical attendance afforded by the plt. during his absence, was in the situation of an ordinary paymaster and not the less so because he happened to be a medical man, for the patients during his absence had no benefit from his skill or attendance. It was further contended that the ship on board of which the contract was made, being a Peruvian ship of war, lying in the Thames, the contract was not governed by the municipal law of this country, but by the law of Peru. For many purposes a foreign vessel of war, not only on the high seas, but even in the waters or ports of a friendly state, is undoubtedly considered as foreign territory, and in some cases the local jurisdiction may be excluded:
(see Wheaton's Elements of International Law, 189, and 1 Kent's Com. 164. n.) It is easy to perceive that questions of great complexity and difficulty may arise; and if this contract had been made, not only on board the vessel, but between parties who were on both sides part of the crew, if it had been a contract to be entirely performed on board the vessel, and if the question had arisen otherwise than in the form of an action in an English court, requiring certain proof to be given at the trial, there might have been much weight in the suggestion. But, first, the contract was not made between Peruvians only, but between a plt. domiciled in England and a Peruvian; the plt. being by the law of this country subject to a personal disqualification. Secondly, it was not to be performed entirely on board the vessel, but partly on shore; and, generally speaking, a contract is to be governed by the law of the country where it is to be performed, so that it is impossible that the Peruvian law should entirely govern this case. Thirdly, the disqualification to sue in England for medical attendance afforded by him within the ambit of the English territory arises from the necessity of proving his registration at the trial. It is part of the lex fori of the country where the remedy is sought, and even in cases where the law of another country is to interpret the contract, yet the lex fori is to govern the remedy: (see Huber v. Steiner, 2 Bing. N. C. 308; Don v. Lippman, 6 Cl. & F. 1; Story's Conflict of Laws, 840, 2nd edit.)

KOBEL v. SAUNDERS—PEARSON v. GOSCHEN AND OTHERS.

KOBEL v. SAUNDERS.

Maritime insurance—Implied warranty—Seaworthiness.Where goods are insured for a voyage there is no implied warranty on the part of the insurers that the goods are seaworthy.Action upon a policy of insurance upon a ship's cargo of cocoa-nut oil in casks from Cochín to Marseilles.Fourth plea:That the premises so insured were not seaworthy for the said voyage at the time the said ship departed and set sail thereon.Demurrer.The grounds of demurrer were stated to be, that there was no implied warranty of seaworthiness of goods insured by a policy, and that the plea did not allege that the loss was attributable to the condition of the goods.Sir G. Honyman appeared to support the demurrer, butWatkin Williams was called on to support the plea.—It is an implied condition of every contract of insurance that the subject of insurance is in a proper state to encounter the risk insured against. Goods insured ought to be in a condition to encounter the ordinary incidents of a sea voyage without incurring damage, supposing no accident to happen. It is no argument against this plea that it is new in form:Boyd v. Dubois, 3 Camp. 183;1 Park on Insurance, 458;3 Kent's Commentaries, 360;Gibson v. Small, 4 H. of L. Cas. 353.

WILLES, J.—I am of opinion that the deft.'s fourth plea is not a sufficient answer to the plt.'s claim. It might be sufficient to dispose of the case by saying that the plea is novel in character and principle, and that in actions on policies of insurance, in which questions of a similar kind are so often raised, and in which the ingenuity of counsel suggests all kinds of claims and answers, we should have had instances of attempts to plead such a plea as this, if it had been a good plea. But, besides being novel, the plea is inadmissible as seeking to create a new implied warranty in a contract of insurance. An insurer is not liable to make good damage resulting from any peculiar vice in the thing insured itself, and unseaworthiness is expressly provided for in the law of some countries. But it is necessary to trace the damage for which an indemnity is sought to the unseaworthiness which is proved to have existed. With respect to goods this is familiar law, and is stated in Smith's Merc. Law, 359, where, on the authority of Boyd v. Dubois, it is said: "If goods be put on board in a damaged condition and are in consequence liable to effacement and generate the fire by which they are consumed, the underwriters are not liable." In our law seaworthiness is made to depend upon a warranty, so that, if a vessel is unseaworthy, as, for example, from not having a sufficient crew on board, and she is lost by reason of some cause not connected with that unseaworthiness, it will be sufficient for the underwriter, in repudiating his liability, to prove that she was unseaworthy. Unless you are to invent a new implied warranty with respect to goods, and say that, where goods are insured and the premium paid, and the goods destroyed by the perils insured against, the insurers are not liable by reason of some unseaworthiness in the goods, this plea is bad. I never can consent to introduce a novelty likely so seriously to affect the mercantile law of the country.

BYLES, J.—I concur in saying that where perish by their own vice they are not dead perils of the sea insured against. The project of taking advantage of such a ground of defence by pleading in the ordinary way, that it were not lost by the perils insured against, said by Mr. Watkin Williams that there was warranty that the goods were seaworthy, but not so. This very case is provided for in the de Commerce, and unseaworthiness is said to be within the perils insured against; but said that freedom from such a defect is a precedent to the liability of the underwriter attaching.

Charter-party—Bill of lading—Lien for freight—Right of charterers' agents, on sea charterers had stopped payment, to take be shipped on their account—Effect of new party entered into by the master with respect goods—Lien on goods subsequently shipped.A ship was chartered to go from Glasgow to Rio de Janeiro and back to the United Kingdom, the voyage to be at the rate of 4l. 10s. upon the homeward cargo. The charter-party contained a provision that the owners should have on the cargo for freight, dead freight, demurrage and other charges. The vessel proceeded to Rio de Janeiro and the charterers' agents loaded a part of the cargo for which the captain, in pursuance of a clause in the charter-party, enabling him to sign bills of lading for any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party, signed a bill of lading at 40s. per ton. Intelligence was then received that the charterers had stopped payment, and their agents insisted that the captain must either return the goods shipped under the charter-party or charter another vessel. The captain, under protest, chartered a new vessel for the voyage to Rio de Janeiro and back to the United Kingdom at a rate of freight for cargo of 30s. per ton. A further quantity of goods was then shipped by the same persons, but the vessel was not paid for the freight. A bill of lading for the whole amount was signed by the captain at 30s. per ton. On the arrival of the vessel in England, the owner claimed a lien upon the goods loaded for the freight at the rate of 4l. 10s. per ton.Held, that the goods shipped before the vessel was received of the failure of the charterers to pay the freight had no power to vary the contract carriage by entering into a fresh charter-party with them at a different rate of freight, and shipowner had a lien upon them for freight at 40s. per ton; and that the goods subsequently shipped were not shipped under the charter-party, the owner was bound by the bill of lading for them, and had a lien upon them for freight at 30s. per ton only; that the owner had no lien upon a goods for the difference between the freight at 40s. per ton and the freight at 30s. per ton; and that the owner was entitled to receive according to the above bill of lading the freight which he would have received for full cargo at 4l. 10s., as being dead freight; meaning of the lien clause in the charter-party.Special case stated by consent for the opinion of the Court.

PEARSON v. GOSCHEN AND OTHERS.

[C. P.]

under the style or firm of Messrs. Fruhling and Goschen.

On the 17th Oct. 1862, the plt. chartered the ship the Hoogland to Messrs. Charles Thorburn and Co., of Glasgow, for a voyage for the round from Glasgow to any safe port at Porto Rico, and then back to a port in the United Kingdom. According to the terms of the charter-party, the freight for the voyage was to be at the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton upon the homeward cargo, delivered and to be paid as follows, namely, 350*l.*, by approved bills at four months' date, payable in London on sailing of the vessel from Glasgow, and the balance, one-half in cash on right delivery of the homeward cargo at port of discharge, and one-half by approved bills on London at four months' date at same time. The disbursements of the vessel at Porto Rico were to be paid by the charterers' agents in full, of which 100*l.* was to be deducted from the freight. Forty-five working days were to be allowed for discharging and loading at Porto Rico, and waiting orders at Queenstown or Falmouth, and twenty-five working days for loading at Glasgow, to commence on the 27th Oct. then current, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days, at 6*l.* per day, to be paid day by day as the same should become due. And it was agreed that for security and payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage, and other charges, the master and owners were to have an absolute lien and charge on the said cargo or goods laden on board, bills of lading to be signed by the master as presented to him, and at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party. A copy of this charter-party to form part of the case.

The charter-party was made by Messrs. Thorburn and Co., as agents for Messrs. McCormick, Ball and Co., of Porto Rico. The Hoogland received her cargo at Glasgow, and on the 1st Dec. 1862 sailed for the port of Arrecibo in Porto Rico, having been kept on demurrage at Glasgow five days, which, at 6*l.* per day, would amount to 30*l.*

The Hoogland arrived at Arrecibo on Saturday the 10th Jan. 1863, and after some delay in unloading, owing to bad weather, the discharge of the cargo was completed at another port, called San Juan, on the 12th March.

At San Juan the captain of the Hoogland was directed by the charterers to proceed to the port of Ponce, another port in Porto Rico, for his homeward cargo, and to address himself there to the charterers' agents, Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., who would ship the homeward cargo.

The captain accordingly proceeded to Ponce, at which place he arrived on the 23rd March, and at once reported himself to Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., according to his instructions from the charterers, and he put into their hands a copy of his charter, which they read. He also inquired of them how soon the homeward cargo would be ready, and they replied that the cargo was then ready.

As soon as the discharge of the ballast then in the vessel was completed the shipment of the homeward cargo was commenced. 498 hogsheads and forty-nine barrels of sugar marked "M. B. C." were loaded on board, and a bill of lading for the same signed and delivered by the captain to Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., at a freight of 40*s.* per cwt., payable on delivery in the United Kingdom. The further shipment of cargo then ceased, and after a delay of some days, during which the captain was applying for the remainder of the cargo, Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co. informed him that Messrs. McCormick, Ball and Co. had suspended payment, and that they could not ship any more cargo on account of their failure, and they also required him to discharge and return to themselves the cargo already shipped, and for which he had signed a bill of lading as above stated.

The captain refused to discharge or return any portion of the cargo which he had received on board. Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co. thereupon told him that he would be compelled to discharge the cargo, or sign another charter. They then again required him either to sign a new charter with them, or to discharge the cargo, and threatened, in the event of his refusal, to compel him to do so.

At this stage of the proceedings the captain attended with one of the firm of Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co. before the British vice-consul, in order to obtain his opinion, who told him that by the Spanish law he would be obliged to sign a new charter, or to discharge his cargo, and advised him to sign a fresh charter.

The captain had in the meantime written, at the request of Lohse, Cortada and Co., to Messrs. McCormick, Ball and Co., stating what had taken place, and received from them the following reply:

Arrecibo, P. R., 16th April 1863.

Sir,—We regret to be compelled to inform you that we have declared our suspension of payments, and are in consequence unable to provide you with your return cargo of produce, or assume any responsibility in the matter. You are therefore at liberty to act as you please, and consider most to the benefit of your owner's interests. We hope, however, you will be able to effect some arrangement in Ponce which may diminish as much as possible the very heavy loss which will unfortunately fall upon our friends concerned in this affair. In doing this we feel assured that you will meet with the best advice and every assistance from Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co.—We are, Sir, your obedient servants.

MCCORMICK, BALL AND CO.

Capt. John McAlley, British barque Hoogland, Ponce.

Thereupon the captain, after protesting against the proceedings of Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., entered into a new charter-party with them, by which the Hoogland was chartered for a voyage from Ponce to Queenstown or Falmouth for orders to a port of discharge in the United Kingdom, at the freight of 30*s.* per ton. A copy of this charter is to form part of the case.

All the parts of the bill of lading signed under the first charter were destroyed by Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co. Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co. then proceeded with the lading, and shipped a further quantity of sugar, viz., 108 hogsheads and 8 barrels, making the whole amount 606 hogsheads and 57 barrels. The lading was finally completed on the 21st April 1863, and a bill of lading signed for the whole quantity at 30*s.* per ton, payable on delivery in London. A copy of this bill of lading is to form part of the case.

On the 22nd April 1863, the captain addressed the following letter to the plt.:

Barque Hoogland, Ponce, Porto Rico.
22nd April 1863.

Sir,—I am sorry to inform you that after all the delay and trouble we have had in this island, that McCormick, Ball and Co. have stopped payment. I got notice from the agents here that they were unable to provide a homeward cargo for the Hoogland, I having on board at the time 498 hogsheads and 49 barrels of sugar, shipped by Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., of this port. As soon as they got notice of McCormick, Ball and Co.'s failure, they claimed the cargo, and wanted me to discharge it or sign a fresh charter. I refused to do either. I went to the British consul, and he told me I would be obliged to discharge the cargo or comply with their request. I would do nothing until I heard from McCormick. An express was sent to Arrecibo, which took six days to go there and back. The letter I inclose, so what could I do? Rather than discharge the cargo I noted a protest against the charterers for non-performance of the agreement, and had to accept charter at 1*l.* 10*s.* per ton to call at Falmouth for orders. We are now loaded, and will sail to-morrow morning. We have on board 606 hogsheads and 57 barrels. We could stow about 100 more barrels, but they have no more to give me. We have to pay all our expenses here, druggage of this cargo, and port charges. I had to buy some beef and bread here. I was afraid of being short on the passage.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant,
JOHN McALLEY.

Adam Pearson, Esq.

With the above cargo the ship was not full;

loaded, there being space for no less than 100 barrels of sugar in addition, and there was a deficiency of 93 barrels upon the quantity guaranteed to be shipped by the original charter-party, the freight of which, at the rate of 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton, would have been 35*l.* 13*s.* 8*d.* The ship was detained at Porto Rico in discharging her outward cargo and loading her homeward cargo, eight days beyond the time allowed by the original charter-party, which at 6*l.* per day, makes a claim of 48*l.* for demurrage there.

Previously to the suspension of McCormick, Ball and Co. as above mentioned, they had expended 140*l.* according to the following accounts :

Port charges and ordinary disbursements of the ship at Aquedilla, San Juan and Arecibo, up to the 24th March 1863	Dols.	£
	492.50	=100
Cash to captain, about.....	105
Provisions	64
Fine on account of error in manifest ...	26
Up to 24th of March	195	= 40

The above sums were paid by M'Cormick, Ball and Co., who signed at the foot of the accounts an order of transfer to Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co. in the following terms :

Arecibo, March 24, 1863.

Pay to Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., value in account.
McCORMICK, BALL and Co.

The captain subsequently at Ponce, on the 15th April 1863, certified these accounts as correct, and to be deducted from his homeward freight.

Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., after the ship arrived at Ponce, paid the following sums :

For lighterage and loading the whole of the sugar	£	50
For ship's disbursements	26	£	s.	d.
Cash to captain and provisions.....	35	=	119	19 0

To this they added the two first-mentioned accounts transferred to them as above stated, and took the captain's receipt for the whole 251*l.* 19*s.* referred to in the next paragraph of the case.

On the back of the bill of lading finally signed by the captain as above mentioned, he was required to sign, and did sign, the following receipt :

Ponce, 22nd April 1863.

Received from Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., the sum of 251*l.* 19*s.* sterling, and furthermore declare that my vessel is dispatched within the time agreed, and that I have no claim whatever for demurrage, dead freight, &c.
251*l.* 19*s.* (Signed) JOHN McALLEY.

The ship sailed on her homeward voyage on the 22nd April 1863, and called in due course for orders at Falmouth, where she was detained one day on demurrage waiting for orders. The captain then having received orders from the defts., proceeded to London as his port of discharge, where he arrived on the 6th May 1863.

At this time the plt. had received the sum of 360*l.* payable on the sailing of the vessel from Glasgow, according to the provisions of the original charter-party.

The freight upon the 498 hogsheads and forty-nine barrels shipped in the first instance at Ponce, and for which the bill of lading afterwards destroyed was given, would amount at the rate of freight in that bill of lading to the sum of 520*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, and the freight for the residue of the cargo, afterwards shipped at the rate of the original charter-party, namely at 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton, would amount to the sum of 112*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, and at the rate inserted in the bill of lading for the same, namely 30*s.*, to the sum of 84*l.* 8*s.* 9*d.*

The freight of the whole cargo shipped, namely the 606 hogsheads and fifty-seven barrels, at the rate of freight mentioned in the first charter, would amount to 1423*l.* 18*s.* 7*d.*, and at the rate of freight mentioned in the second charter, and in the bills of lading held by the defts., would amount to the sum of 474*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.*

The above cargo was consigned by Lohse, Cortada and Co., to the defts. as their for the sale of the same on their account, and forwarded the bills of lading to the defts. for purpose.

The defts. were holders of the bills of lading agents for Messrs. Lohse, Cortada and Co., the above purpose, when the plt. having intelligence of the above circumstances, and the arrival of the cargo, caused the following to be sent to the defts. :

London, 16th May

Gentlemen,—Being advised that the cargo of the Hooyland, from Porto Rico, is consigned to you, we hereby give you notice that we hold a lien upon the same for a freight, dead freight and demurrage in terms of party, made in Glasgow on the 22nd Oct. 1862, between the owners of the said vessel and Messrs. M'Cormick, Co., of Porto Rico; and further give you notice not to deliver the said cargo until same is released from the claim made by us above.—We are, gentlemen, your obedient servants,
SPYER and HAYWOOD,

Agents for the owner of the barque Hooyland.
Messrs. Fruhling and Goschen.

The cargo was afterwards landed in the dock, and a stop put upon the same by the plt. claim on account of freight and demurrage.

The defts. were willing to pay the amount of freight according to the bill of lading held by them, less the above-mentioned sum of 251*l.* 19*s.*, appeared by the indorsement at the back of the bill of lading to have been paid on account of freight, amounting with such deductions to the sum of 112*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, and they have since paid this amount into court. No question arises upon it. The plt. refused, however, to give up the cargo upon the payment of such sum.

The defts. afterwards wrote to the plt. the following proposition :

London, 4th Nov.

Sir,—If you will be good enough to withdraw your claim against the cargo per Hooyland, we undertake to hold the cargo responsible to you for your claim, in the event of your being unable to establish your lien on the cargo for the freight and demurrage due under the original charter-party; proceedings at law or equity, which would be commenced by you while the sugars were on shipboard, or under such circumstances as may be equally competent against us. We are of course ready to pay the 30*s.* freight under the new charter-party.—Sir, yours obediently, (Signed) FRUHLING and GOSCHEN.

Adam Pearson, Esq., Glasgow.

The plt. acceded to this proposition, the sum of 251*l.* 19*s.* accordingly withdrawn and the cargo delivered to the defts.

It is agreed that the court may draw such inference of fact as a jury might draw. The questions for the opinion of the court are:—First, whether the plt. is entitled to recover against the defts. a further sum of money than the said sum of 251*l.* 19*s.* paid into court. Secondly, if so, which of the mentioned sums of money the plt. is entitled to recover beyond the said sum of 251*l.*

If the court should answer the first question in the negative, judgment is to be entered against the defts.; but if in the affirmative, then judgment is to be entered for the plt., for such sum of money as the court find, in answer to the second question, is entitled to over and above the said sum of 251*l.*

Watkin Williams (Lush, Q. C. with him) appeared for the plt.

Sir G. Honyman (F. M. White with him) appeared for the defts.

The arguments are sufficiently noticed for judgment.

WILLIAMS, J.—We are of opinion that the plt. is entitled to recover in this action. The first question submitted to our consideration is, whether the plt. is entitled to recover more than the 225*l.* paid into court? We are of opinion that he is. At present it is unnecessary to fix the exact amount in figures: it will be sufficient if we fix the principles on which we think that it ought to be calculated. With respect to the 498 hogsheads loaded before the intelligence was received of the failure of M'Cormick, Ball and Co., the original charterers, we think that the plt. is entitled to freight at the original price stated in the charter-party, namely, 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton. The ground of our conclusion is, that upon the facts laid before us, from which we are to draw inferences of fact, we have concluded that the 498 hogsheads were not only shipped under the original charter-party, but were shipped by Lohse, Cortada and Co., as agents for the original charterers, and therefore the case is on the same footing as if they had been shipped by the original charterers themselves, and the law admits of no doubt that charterers having shipped the goods, have no right to desire them to be unshipped; and it was the captain's duty to hold them for the benefit of the owners, and their lien for freight. Then comes the question, what was the effect of the new bill of lading which the captain thought himself compelled to sign at a reduced rate of freight? It seems to me that it had no effect at all. The captain had no authority from the owners under the circumstances to substitute a new bargain for the bargain which existed and which his principals had a right to insist upon as binding upon the charterers. Therefore, as far as the 498 hogsheads are concerned, the amount must be taken upon the basis of the charter-party at the price of 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton. With respect to the 108 hogsheads afterwards put on board, we deduce that the charterers and their agents having declined to ship any more goods on board on the terms of the original charter-party, the captain was acting as a prudent captain would act for the benefit of his owners in contracting to take goods upon the terms of the bills of lading which he signed. They were carried independently of the charter-party on a new contract, and the price mentioned in the bill of lading is the price to be paid for them. This disposes of the whole case except the claim for expenses. Besides the 100*l.* for disbursements, some extra expenses were incurred by the captain for the benefit of the owners, which it is admitted must fall on the plt., and for which there ought to be an allowance. Having thus disposed of the case originally argued, we have the point insisted upon by Mr. Watkins Williams, namely, that by reason of the particular terms of the charter-party, which provides for a lien for dead freight, the owner is entitled to a lien for what would have been the amount of freight payable under the charter-party if a full cargo had been put on board. But there is no special stipulation for dead freight, and the charter-party only contains the ordinary printed general words used in mercantile documents. It is said that the damages which the owner would be entitled to claim for the breach of the charterers' agreement to load a full cargo come within the words "dead freight;" but it seems to me that those words are quite inapplicable to such a claim. The

plt. is entitled to damages, to be estimated according to the principles which I have stated.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. As to the 498 hogsheads, it appears that they were put on board by the agents of the charterers, with the intention of performing the contract of the charterers to fill the vessel. The charter-party provided that those goods should be charged 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton for freight. The bill of lading provided for freight at 40*s.* per ton. If this bill had got into the hands of a bonâ fide holder for value, no doubt, as between such holder and the shipowner, payment of 40*s.* only could be enforced, but as against the charterers and all persons representing them, the bill of lading did not supersede the charter-party. If there had been no provision in the charter-party for the giving of bills of lading at a less rate of freight, it might have been contended that a new contract had been made, it might have been necessary to consider if the alteration of the freight was a fraud on the shipowner, as in the case of Faith v. The East India Company, 4 B. & A. 630. But the charter-party expressly provides that bills of lading might be given at any rate of freight without prejudice to the charter-party. This might be for the convenience of the charterers in putting the ship up as a general ship, or in disposing of the cargo afloat. But the charter-party stipulated that, if this right should be exercised, it should be done without prejudice to the charter-party. It is quite obvious that, unless what took place between Lohse and Co. and the master resulted in substituting a second price for that agreed on at first, the debts must pay 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton. It is clear, also, that the master could not be justified in relinquishing the right acquired by the owners of the ship upon the shipment of the goods, or in substituting a new contract for that contained in the charter-party. As to the alleged right of a shipper to take back goods according to the law of Spain, it is sufficient to say that no such right is stated in the case. With respect to the 180 tons afterwards shipped, it is clear that they were not shipped under the charter-party, but under a bill of lading, by which freight at only 30*s.* per ton was payable. A master finds himself at a foreign port with only part of a cargo, the charterers being insolvent and refusing to supply any more, is he entitled to enter into fresh contracts to fill up his ship, and is a person who puts goods on board knowing the terms of the charter-party, bound by them? I think that it is one of the cases in which a master doing so is acting strictly within the limits of his authority, and that the owners are bound by the bills of lading. But it is said that the difference between freight at 4*l.* 10*s.* and freight at 30*s.* is "dead freight," and Mr. Williams relies on the provision in the charter-party, "for the security and payment of all freight, dead freight, demurrage and other charges, the master and owners to have an absolute lien and charge on the cargo and goods laden on board." He said that it was necessary to interpret dead freight so as to include this difference. But when these words are found to be only the ordinary printed words of course of the charter-party, it is not necessary to be so particular to find an application for them. The true meaning of dead freight in that context is dead freight liquidated between the parties, and it applies only to cases where it is liquidated by the contract. I am quite aware that the expression has been occasionally applied to damages in respect of room lost by a failure on the part of the charterers to load; but this arises from a poverty of language, and no lien could be claimed in respect of such damages. Except for damages warranted by the contract, the captain is not to be his own judge in the matter. This is shown in the cases, and it will be sufficient to refer to Phillips v. Rodie, and Birley v. Gladstone, already mentioned. The deductions in respect of advances made at Porto Rico are, first, the 100*l.*, and then 40*l.* for extra disbursements, so much as are not ordinary expenses, and not provided for by the charter-party. The payments made by Lohse, although not agreed to be deducted from the freight, were taken by the master as payments to be deducted from what he was entitled to charge. It is not necessary for me to say more.

RUSSELL v. NIEMANN.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is a mere question of lien, and nothing which is decided here will prejudice the damages to which the plt. is entitled for losing the profit to be derived from carrying a full cargo at 4*l.* 10*s.* per ton. Now, as to goods already shipped under the charter-party, the captain had no power to vary the contract, and therefore 4*l.* 10*s.* is to be paid for them. Then, was he to return with a half-empty ship, trusting to the credit of the charterer? He was right to do the best for his ship. It is said that the plt. had a lien for damages as being "dead freight." Whatever those damages may be they are to be reduced by the sum received by the plt. under the new contract entered into by the captain, so that the dead freight would come to be the difference between the freight at the old price and the freight at the new; but this is an extension of the meaning of "dead freight." This is in reality a case not of dead freight, but of substituted freight.

KEATING, J. concurred.

WILLIAMS, J.—I forebore to observe on the cases of Shand v. Sanderson and Kirchner v. Venus and Deslandes v. Gregory, because no question as to the law relating to bills of lading signed without prejudice to the charter-party arises, the goods having, according to our view of the subject, been shipped by the charterers themselves.

RUSSELL v. NIEMANN.

Ship and shipping—Bill of lading—"King's enemies."

"King's enemies" within the meaning of the exception usually contained in a bill of lading, are the enemies of the sovereign whose subject the owner of the ship is, whatever his title may be.

A bill of lading given in a Russian port for the conveyance of a cargo from that port to England on board a vessel which belonged to a subject of the Duke of Mecklenburg, and carried the flag of Mecklenburg, contained the usual exception of "the King's enemies."

Held, that the exception applied to the acts of enemies of the Duke of Mecklenburg.

Action by the indorsee of a bill of lading of a cargo of wheat against the owners of the ship on which it was loaded.

The declaration stated that

After the 14th day of August, A.D. 1853, certain persons, in parts beyond the seas, to wit, Messrs. Kellner and Co., at Odessa, delivered to the deft. certain goods, to wit, &c., to be by the deft. carried and conveyed in a certain ship of the deft.'s from Odessa to Cork or Falmouth for orders, and thence to one of certain ports as ordered under a certain bill of lading signed for the same by the deft., whereby the deft. agreed to carry the said goods and deliver the same at the port of destination (the act of God, the King's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation of what nature and kind soever excepted) to the order of the said persons, or to their assigns, paying freight for the said goods and all other conditions as per charter-party. Dated Odessa, the 8th. And the plt. says she afterwards and after the said 14th Aug. A.D. 1853, the said persons indorsed the said bill of lading to the plt. in order to pass the property in such goods to the plt. and that thereupon and by reason of such indorsement the property in the said goods passed to the plt. And the plt. says that the said ship proceeded with the said goods on board to Falmouth for orders, and was then duly ordered by the plt. to proceed with the cargo to Limerick, and there deliver the said cargo the same being a port to which the said ship was bound proceed agreeably to the terms of the said bill of lading and charter-party.

It further contained a general covenant of performance of conditions by the plt., entitling him to have the terms of the bill of lading observed, and to sue for breach thereof, and alleged the breach to be that "the deft., although not prevented by any of the excepted perils, made default in obeying the said orders and proceeding with the said cargo to Limerick in pursuance of the said bill of lading and charter-party," and claimed damages for loss of profits, &c.

The fifth plea set out the charter-party. It was made at Odessa, and described the master as being of the good ship, &c., "under Mecklenburg colours now in this port," and the charterers as "Messrs. G. Kellner and Co., merchants and charterers." The voyage was to be "to a safe port in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, north-west coast of Ireland excepted, or on the continent between Havre and Hamburg both inclusive, Belgium excepted . . . calling at Cork or Falmouth at the master's option for orders." The exception was as follows: "The act of God, enemies, fire, restraint of princes, and all and every dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers and navigation, of whatever nature or kind soever, during the said voyage always mutually excepted." The plea then set out the bill of lading, and proceeded as follows:

And the deft. further says, that the owners of the said ship and the deft. were respectively subjects of the Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, and the said ship was a Mecklenburg ship sailing under Mecklenburg colours, and that the default complained of was caused by the act of the enemies of the said Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, being the King's enemies within the true intent and meaning of the said bill of lading.

Sixth plea:

The deft. says, that the said charter-party and bill of lading were respectively as in the fifth plea set out, and that the default complained of was caused by the act of enemies during the voyage within the true meaning of the said charter-party.

Seventh plea:

The deft. says, that the said charter-party and bill of lading were respectively as in the fifth plea set out, and that the default complained of was caused by the restraint of princes during the voyage, within the true meaning of the said charter-party.

The deft. demurred also to the declaration. The plt. demurred to the above pleas, and to the fifth plea pleaded a further replication.

That the said charter-party and bill of lading were respectively made and signed at Odessa, in the empire of Russia, and that the said Messrs. George Kellner and Co. were not, nor were nor was any or either of them a subject or subjects of the said Duke of Mecklenburg-Schwerin.

To which the deft. demurred.

Sir G. Honyman (Jush, Q. C. with him), appeared for the plt.—The declaration is good, for the plt. as the holder of the bill of lading, was the proper person to give the orders as to the port of discharge. The fifth plea is bad, for the enemies of the Duke of Mecklenburg were not the "King's enemies" within the meaning of the bill of lading merely because the ship sailed under Mecklenburg colours. The cargo was loaded in a Russian port, and the bill of lading was signed by a subject of the Duke of Mecklenburg, but that will not give to the word "King's enemies" a meaning other to that which prima facie belongs to them, or bring within the exception default caused by the acts of the King of Denmark, who was one of the Duke of Mecklenburg's enemies. As to the sixth and seventh pleas, the words contained in the bill of lading, "other conditions as per charter-party," only apply to matters not expressly provided for by the bill of lading, and the excepted perils mentioned in the latter cannot be extended by incorporating with them those mentioned in the former.

Mellish, Q. C. and Hansen for the deft.—The declaration is bad for not alleging that the orders were given by the plt., being duly authorised by the charterers. [WILLES, J.—The plt. must have leave to amend the declaration if necessary.] The pleas are good; any hostile Government will come within the description of "king's enemies," as distinguished from pirates. The word king must include duke. [WILLES, J.—If the word king referred to the sovereign of the shipper, there would be considerable difficulty in the case of a general ship, where there may be goods of many nationalities, in saying which king is meant.] Besides, the reference in the bill of lading to the charter-party incorporates the latter, and there the word "enemies" is used, and not the words "King's enemies."

Sir G. Hoareman replied.

WILLES, J.—This is an action brought upon a bill of lading of a cargo to be carried from Odessa to the United Kingdom, calling at Falmouth for order. The declaration states that such orders were properly given and were disobeyed. The deft. relies on two points: first, that he was prevented from obeying by enemies of his Sovereign, and that the bill of lading contains an exception which includes the acts of such enemies; secondly, that the charter-party is incorporated with the bill of lading, and that the deft. is therefore entitled to rely on the larger exception in the charter-party. If judgment be given for the deft. on the first point, Mr. Mellish probably will not require us to give judgment on the second. Now, on the first, I agree with the argument for the deft. In order to arrive at the true construction of the words King's enemies in the bill of lading, it is necessary to consider the circumstances under which it was signed. It was signed at Odessa, in the empire of Russia. The shippers were Messrs. Kellner, who appear to be merchants there, but there is no means of ascertaining their nationality. The ship was of Mecklenburg, and its owner was of Mecklenburg. The plt. is English, and the destination of the cargo was English. We have to choose between three persons who may equally come within the description of king, namely, the Emperor of Russia, the Queen of England, and the Duke of Mecklenburg, no one of the three being strictly a "king." But in truth the word "king" in this document simply refers to a sovereign capable of making war, and on whom war can be made. The only reason for saying that the Emperor of Russia is referred to is, that the locality where the bill of lading was signed was Russia, but that is no reason at all. The destination was English, but none of the parties to the contract were English. The person who signed the document and made the stipulation for himself was a subject of the Duke of Mecklenburg. There seems to be abundant reason for his so stipulating in respect of injuries which he might receive from his own enemies, and he describes them as king's enemies. The plea says that the orders given to the deft. were disobeyed in consequence of the acts of such enemies, and I think that judgment upon the demurrer to the fifth plea must be given for the deft.

BYLES, J.—I think that the words "King's enemies" at least include enemies of the carrier if they were specially directed to them, and that they apply to enemies of the carrier's Sovereign, whatever his title may be. The exceptions of King's enemies and restraint of princes, include all cases of lawful interruption by lawful authority, leaving the case of pirates to be dealt with by the other exception of dangers of the seas within which, according to the highest authority, they come: (2 Roll. Abr. 248, pl. 10; Barton v. Wallisford, Comber. 56.) The three exceptions of King's enemies, restraint of princes, and perils of the seas, include all the species of vis major against which it is necessary to guard.

KEATING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The exception is introduced for the benefit of the carrier, who says, "I will undertake to carry the goods in my ship, if I am not prevented by the enemies of my Sovereign."

June 25.—WILLES, J.—For the purpose of completing the record so as to enable it to be taken to a court of error, if it be desired, we think that judgment had better be entered for the plt. on the demurrers to the sixth and seventh pleas.

Re THE STEPHEN HART (in Prize).

Prize—Blockade—Evidence—Principles of the law of capture.

Circumstances under which a vessel of a neutral country is held to be guilty of an attempt to introduce contraband goods into the enemy's territory by a breach of blockade.

Depositions given on the re-examination of persons found on board of a captured vessel are admissible in evidence:

Held, first, that the vessel and her cargo were enemy's property when the voyage was undertaken and the capture made;

Secondly, that she was laden with articles contraband of war, declared for the aid and use of the enemy, and on transportation by sea to the enemy's country at the time of capture;

Thirdly, that with full knowledge on the part of the owner of the vessel and the owners of the cargo that the ports of the enemy were under blockade, the vessel and her cargo were dispatched from a neutral port with an intention, on the part of the owners of each, that, in violation of the blockade, both the vessel and her cargo should enter a port of the enemy.

That these circumstances constitute, according to the law of nations, a breach of blockade, for which the ship and her cargo are liable to capture.

The facts of this case are fully set forth in the following:

Florida, about twenty-five miles from Key West, and about eighty-two miles from Point de Yeacos in Cuba, and was sent to the port of New York for adjudication, under convoy of her captor. A libel was filed against her in this court on the 18th Feb. 1862. On the 1st May 1862 a claim to the vessel was interposed by John Myer Harris, of Liverpool, England, as her sole owner. The test oath to that claim was made by Charles N. Dyett, the master of the schooner. On the same day, a claim was put in to the whole of the cargo of the schooner, by Samuel Isaac, on behalf of himself and Saul Isaac, as copartners and subjects of Great Britain, doing business in England under the firm name of S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., and claiming to be the sole owners of the cargo. The test oath to that claim was made by Samuel Isaac. On the 25th Oct. 1862 another claim to the schooner on behalf of Harris was interposed. In this second claim, Harris is described as late of Liverpool, England, and now of Sherbro', on the western coast of Africa, at present residing in England, merchant. This second claim sets up that he is the sole owner of the schooner, and is a subject of the Crown of Great Britain. In the test oath to the second claim of Harris, and which test oath is made by him, it is alleged that, on the 28th Sept. 1861, he agreed to become the purchaser of the schooner for 1750/., to be paid 28th Oct. 1861; that it was afterwards arranged that the money should be paid on the 14th Oct.; that an abatement of 5/ 10s. 3d. was thereupon made from the purchase-money; that the balance of 1744/ 9s. 9d. was paid; that the vessel was at Bristol, England, at the time of her sale; that, after such purchase, she took a cargo from Bristol to London, and was then loaded, partly at London and partly at Erith, with a cargo of arms, ammunition and military clothing; and that such cargo was the sole property of S. Isaac, Campbell and Co. It is to be noted that this test oath does not state from whom he purchased the schooner, or to whom he paid the money, or whether he received any bill of sale. It is also silent as to any hiring or charter of the vessel to S. Isaac, Campbell and Co. It stated that the vessel "cleared for the port of Cardenas;" that it was not intended that she should "enter, or attempt to enter, any port of the United States;" that "her true and only destination with said cargo was Cardenas, where the same was to be delivered;" that the vessel was thence to sail to the claimant in Africa, if she obtained a suitable cargo for that country; and that the vessel and her cargo are British property. The test oath of Samuel Isaac to the claim on behalf of S. Isaac, Campbell and Co. to the whole of the cargo, alleges that the cargo was shipped by that firm, consisting of himself and Saul Isaac, on or about Dec. 2, 1861, partly at London and partly at Erith; that the vessel was bound for Cardenas in the island of Cuba; that the cargo consisted of arms, ammunition and military clothing, and is wholly the property of that firm; that its members are British subjects; that the vessel cleared for Cardenas; that the cargo was destined for Cardenas; that it was not intended that the vessel should "enter, or attempt to enter, any port of the United States, or that the cargo should be delivered at any port in the United States;" and that "the true and only destination was Cardenas, where the same was to be delivered, and the vessel was thence to sail to Africa, if she obtained a suitable cargo for that country." It does not set up any charter of the vessel. The testimony in preparatorio, consisting of the depositions of Charles N. Dyett, the master, Benjamin H. Chadwick, the first mate, John Leisk, the cook and steward, Charles Nellman, the second mate, and Robert Allen, an able seaman, was taken in Feb. 1862. The case was not submitted to the judgment of the court until the term of July 1862. It was suggested at the hearing, in excuse of what seemed to be the great delay in the case, that such delay was owing to the pendency before the Supreme Court of the United States, on appeal until March last, of various prize suits, which it was supposed might dispose of material questions involved in this case. But, from such report of the decisions in those cases as this court has been furnished with, it does not appear that the main questions involved in the present case have been determined by the Supreme Court in any of the cases alluded to. Various interlocutory proceedings took place in the present case, a reference to some of which is necessary. Before the filing of the libel, and on the 14th Feb. 1862, this court ordered that so much of the cargo of the schooner as consisted of arms, powder and munitions of war, should be placed in the custody of the commandant of the Navy-yard at New York, and that the Prize Commissioners should make a full inventory of all the articles delivered to the commandant, and that they should be appraised, and the appraisement be filed with the inventory. In pursuance of this order, the appraiser appointed by the court, Mr. Orison Blunt, discharged the cargo of the schooner, and stored it in the ordnance stores at the Navy-yard. In his report, which was filed on the 25th of March 1862, he states that, in unloading the vessel, he did not have the benefit of any invoice; that he took an accurate account of every case, box and bale, and of their numbers and marks; that the vessel was stowed with great care, and the bales and cases pressed in with jack-screws, which made great precaution necessary in taking them out, for fear of an explosion of some of the ammunition loaded shell; that, upon opening the after hatch and taking out some of the cases, he discovered some four tons of powder, and also 1008 loaded shell with percussion primers affixed, and some 600,000 ball cartridges, or fixed ammunition for small arms which were all removed and placed in the magazine of the Navy-yard; that, after all the cargo had been placed in the ordnance stores without any loss or damage, he opened every entire case and bale and inspected and counted accurately every article and found them all to be in good condition, and that every article was of value for use in the army and navy of the United States, except a large quantity of "rebel buttons," manufactured in Great Britain and stamped with a "rebel device." The appraiser annexed to his report a catalogue of the cargo and his appraisement of each article. The following articles appear to have constituted the cargo of the vessel: 5740 long Enfield rifles, with triangular bayonets; 1260 short Enfield rifles, with sabre bayonets; 660 rifled Enfield carbines, with sabre bayonets; 2640 British rifled muskets, with triangular bayonets; 200 British smooth bore muskets, with triangular bayonets; 320 Brunswick rifles, with sabre bayonets; 375 cavalry sabres; 6800 gray blankets; 1750 white blankets; 4 of Blakeley's 2 $\frac{3}{4}$ inch bore rifled cannon (six pounders) with 2000 cartridge bags and 1008 shell for the same, loaded and capped; 120,000 cartridges, fixed ammunition for Enfield rifles; 100,000 percussion caps; 2160 cartridge boxes; 4095 knapsacks; 400 ball bags and belts; 100,000 Brunswick rifle cartridges; 420,000 Minie rifle cartridges; 500 cartridges for smooth bore English muskets, each cartridge consisting of a round ball and two buck shot; 1540 yards of gray army cloth; 11,453 yards of steel mixed gray army cloth for uniforms; 62 gross of brass buttons "for infantry, artillery and cavalry, for the rebel army, marked "C. S. A.;" 15,432 pairs of stockings; 2000 pairs of brogue shoes; 592 pairs of russet shoes, Blucher pattern; 762 pairs of black leather shoes, Blucher pattern

20 water-proof covers for mess tins; 17 cases and sales of trimmings for army clothes and uniforms, consisting of linings, cord, braid, lace, thread, buckram, &c.; 109 yards of scarlet cloth for army uniforms; 7500 yards of white twilled flannel for lining army overcoats; 2250 yards of brown holland for same purpose; 1040 gross of buttons for army uniforms and clothing; 7800 pounds of cannon powder, and a considerable quantity of cartridge paper, cones, and other appurtenances for small arms, gun slings, medicine, lint, bayonet scabbards, surgeons' equipments, scissors, thimbles, hooks and eyes, shears, canvas lining, alpacca and tarpaulings. The appraisement of the entire cargo was 238,945 lbs. 37 cents. Under orders of this court of the 1st March and 16th April 1862, the Enfield rifles and certain other articles found on board of the schooner were delivered to the Navy Department for the use of the United States, at the appraised value of 169,467 dols. 50 cents. By another order of the court, made March 4, 1862, another portion of the cargo, amounting to the appraised value of 1,196 dols. 11 cents., was delivered to the War Department, the Ordnance Department and the Anatomy Department, for the use of the United States. Under an order of this court, made on the 14th May 1862, the schooner and the remainder of her cargo, which remainder amounted, at its appraised value, to 55,281 dols. 76 cents., were sold at public auction. The vessel was sold for 10,000 dols. The proceeds of the vessel and of her cargo, including the amounts paid by the Navy and War Departments for the articles taken by them, were paid into the registry of the court. After the cook and steward, John Leisk, had been examined on the 13th Feb. 1862, an affidavit made by him on the 26th Feb. 1862 was presented to the court, in which he stated that, in giving his testimony before the Prize Commissioners, he did not fully answer the 32nd interrogatory in relation to certain papers on board, and their description, and what was said on their being discovered, although he had testified to those facts on an examination made of him on board of the capturing vessel. An order was thereupon made by the court on the same day, on the motion of the district attorney, that the 32nd standing interrogatory be propounded anew to the witness Leisk, and that his additional answer thereto be received and added to his deposition, with the like force and effect as if the same had been taken at the time of his original examination. On the same day that interrogatory was again propounded to him, and his further answer thereto forms part of the depositions in preparatorio. On the 24th Oct. 1862 the court, on the motion of the district attorney, made an order that Benjamin H. Chadwick, the first mate, who had been examined in preparatorio, on the standing interrogatories, on the 13th Feb. 1862, should be again examined by the Prize Commissioners on the standing interrogatories, and that the question of the admissibility of his evidence so to be given should stand over for future determination. This order was founded on an affidavit made by Chadwick on the 21st Feb. 1862, in which he stated that he was one of the persons captured on the Stephen Hart, and was entrusted upon her shipping articles as her first mate, although in fact he was entrusted with the virtual control of the vessel and cargo; that he had examined a copy of his testimony given by him on his examination on the 13th Feb. 1862, and found that his answers to the 11th, 36th and 39th interrogatories, well as to any others which asked for the destination of the vessel and her cargo, on her voyage on which she was captured, were incorrect, and did not disclose the entire truth in relation to the subject-matter inquired of, and that he desired the privilege of correcting the same on a re-examination, by stating that he well knew that the real destination of the cargo of the vessel, if not of the vessel herself, was one of the blockaded "Confederate ports of the Southern States," and that the port of Cardenas in Cuba was to be used simply as an intermediate port of call and of transshipment of the cargo, if it was there determined by Charles J. Helm, an agent there of the "Confederate States," whose instructions the witness was directed to follow, that the cargo should be transhipped into a steamer, which could, with greater facility, be used in running the blockade; that the witness was employed for that purpose by reason of his knowledge of the southern coast, and of the navigation of the blockaded ports and harbours, and was so employed after his examination specially on that point at the counting-house of S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., the owners of the cargo, in London, where, at the time, were William L. Yancey and other persons interested in the "Southern insurrection;" that he, the witness, had been in no manner influenced to make such disclosure by the libellants or the captors, or any one in any manner connected with either of them, but had been induced to do so solely by the persuasions of his wife, who was a loyal woman then residing in Boston, and whose just reproaches had caused him to regret that he had ever lent his aid to such a cause, and to determine, as far as he could, to atone for whatever mischief he might have done. Upon the hearing of the motion for the further examination of Chadwick, the application was opposed by the claimants of the cargo, upon an affidavit made by Chadwick on the 6th May 1862, in which he stated that certain letters and papers belonging to him were seized by the captors, and retained by them until the 28th April 1862, when, without any application to the court, a portion of them were taken from the rest of the papers seized on board of the schooner, and handed over to him by Mr. Elliott, one of the Prize Commissioners; that the letters so handed to him were a part of the letters mentioned in the examination in preparatorio of John Leisk, and stated by Leisk to have been placed by him in a tea-pot at the request of Chadwick, and to have been afterwards discovered by the crew of the capturing vessel. The court was subsequently furnished with an affidavit made by Mr. Elliott, in which he stated that, after the arrival of the schooner at New York, one of the officers in charge of her placed in his hands some letters which he represented to be private papers belonging to Chadwick; that those letters were not presented by the prize master as a part of the papers seized with the schooner as her papers, but as private letters belonging to Chadwick; that, under the advice of the assistant district attorney, and at the request and with the consent of Chadwick, the deponent carefully read the letters, and found them to be only private letters to Chadwick from his wife, and that there was not in them one word relating to the schooner, or her cargo, or her voyage, or her destination; and that thereupon, on the further advice of the assistant district attorney, the letters were handed to Chadwick as his private property, several months before his re-examination, and with no reference thereto, and with no knowledge or suspicion that any such re-examination would ever occur. There were found on board of the schooner, at the time of her capture, her register and sundry bills, certificates, telegraphs and letters, a clearance, two log-books, a copy of the United States Coast Survey for 1856, and sundry other papers, but no invoices, no bills of lading and no manifest. The register of the schooner is dated at Liverpool, England, Oct. 15, 1861. It represents her as having been built at Greenport, in the state of New York, in the United States, in the year 1859, and her foreign name as having been Tamulipas. Her tonnage is stated at 21,985 tons. Her owner is stated to be John Myer Harris, of Liverpool, merchant. The register contains the following printed memorandum at its foot: "Notice. A certificate of registry granted under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 is not a document of title." On the back of the register is indorsed a certificate, made at the Custom-house in London on the 15th Nov. 1861, stating that Charles N. Dyett had that day been appointed master of the schooner. There were also found on board of the schooner a letter, signed "R. H. Leonard, ship Alexander, Confederate States," dated at Bristol, England, Oct. 29th, 1861, and addressed to Chadwick; and a letter from Leonard addressed "To Mr. B. H. Chadwick, alias Tommy, first officer Stephen Hart," purporting to be written at Bristol, England, but without date; and a letter signed "John Johnson, ship Noami, care J. P. Snell and Co., Bristol, England," and addressed "Mr. Benjamin H. Chadwick, schooner Stephen Hart, Surrey Canal, London," and dated at Bristol, England, Oct. 29th, 1861. The contents of these three letters will hereafter be specially referred to. By sundry certificates found on board of the schooner, it appears that she cleared from London on the 19th of Nov. 1861, for Cuba generally, neither the port of Cardenas nor any other port in Cuba being mentioned as her destination in any of her regular papers. There was also found on board of the schooner a letter in the following words:—"71, Jermyn-street, London, S.W., Nov. 19, 1861. J. Crawford, Esq., H. M. Consul-General, Havannah. Dear Sir: In confirmation of my last, permit me to ask your assistance and advice for Capt. Dyett, of the schooner Stephen Hart, should he need it during his stay at Havannah. Permit me to be yours, most faithfully, Saul Isaac." There was also found on board of the schooner a telegraphic despatch from S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., 71, Jermyn-street, London, to Lloyd's agent at Deal, received at Deal Nov. 23rd, 1861, in the following words: "Please detain schooner Stephen Hart, bound for Cardenas, for orders. We pay all expenses. Reply per telegraph. Letter per post." There was also found a letter dated "London, Nov. 22, 1861," in the following words:—"Captain Dyett, schooner Stephen Hart. Dear Sir: We require some matters arranged before the schooner leaves. You will receive this per Lloyd's agent. Attend to the orders, and wait until you hear from yours truly, S. Isaac, Campbell and Co." There was also found another telegraphic despatch from S. Isaac, Jermyn-street, London, to Lloyd's agent at Deal, received at Deal Nov. 24th, 1861, in the following words:—"Captain Dyett will proceed on his voyage at once, and make up for lost time. Wish him a successful trip." The shipping articles of the crew of the schooner, found on board, are dated Nov. 16th, 1861, and specify that the voyage is to be "from London to Cuba and Sierra Leone, and any port and [or] ports on coast of Africa, and [or] North and [or] South America and [or] West Indies, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom. Voyage not to exceed twelve months." On these shipping articles the name of Benjamin H. Chadwick is entered as chief officer, his signature appearing upon them, and he is stated to be an American, aged twenty-nine years, and to have last served on board the vessel called the Tamaulipas, and to have been discharged therefrom at London on the 2nd Nov. 1861. The date of his joining the Stephen Hart is stated as Nov. 1st, 1861, although he is placed in a list under the head of "substitutes," with two others who are severally stated as joining the vessel Nov. 22nd and Nov. 29th, and no place is inserted as the place of his joining the vessel, although the place is inserted in the case of the other two substitutes. The wages of Chadwick are put down as 9l. per calendar month, the wages of the mate, whose place he took, being stated at 6l. per month. In one of the two log-books found on board of the vessel, namely, the official log-book, the name of Benjamin H. Chadwick appears as mate of the vessel, and no other person is named as mate; and the date of the commencement of the voyage is stated in that log-book as Nov. 19, 1861. In the other log-book, which is an ordinary sea log-book, there appears, under date of Nov. 21, 1861, an entry in the handwriting of Chadwick, by whom that log-book purports on its face to have been kept, to the effect that the mate had not come to perform his duty, and the log-book then proceeds as follows: "Wherefore I, Benj. H. Chadwick, have this day engaged with Capt. Charles N. Dyett to proceed on the voyage, having been engaged as ship-keeper on board since the 2nd of the present month, the crew consisting of six seamen, cook and steward, captain, mate and boatswain—in all numbering ten persons." The shipping articles show eleven persons, there being seven seamen, one of the seamen, as appears by the official log-book, having been shipped at Gravesend on the 22nd Nov., and discharged because of illness, at Deal, on the 29th Nov., and another seaman having been shipped at Deal in his place on the last-named day. The name of one seaman which appears on the shipping articles does not appear on the official log-book, and there is a memorandum on the shipping articles that he deserted. This reduces the number of persons composing the crew to ten, including Chadwick. The entry on the title-page of the sea log-book is, that the schooner was on a voyage from London to Cardenas, Cuba, commencing Nov. 19, 1861, and that the log-book is kept by Benjamin H. Chadwick. It appears, from entries in that log-book, that the pilot took charge of the schooner "on a voyage to Cuba," on the 19th Nov., and that she was on that day "towed by steam from the Grand Surrey Dock to Erith, to take in the remainder of cargo," and that she arrived at Erith the same day; that, on the 20th Nov. she took in from lighters some sixty cases of cargo, and that, on the evening of the same day, she was towed to Gravesend; that she remained at Gravesend until the 22nd Nov., when she proceeded down the river, coming to anchor, in the afternoon, off the North Foreland Light; that, on the 23rd Nov. she proceeded to the Downs, where she came to anchor, and where the "captain received instructions from parties in London" to wait until further orders; that, on the 24th Nov. she received orders to proceed on her voyage; that she did not start until the 2nd Dec., her sea log commencing at noon on the 3rd Dec.; that she pursued her voyage through December and January, no particular occurrence being noted until the 15th Jan., when she passed eighteen miles to the north-east of Desirada Island, one of the Leeward Islands in the West Indies, and also between the Island of Gaudaloupe and the Island of Montserrat, in the latitude of about 16 deg. 30 min. N.; that, from this point she proceeded to the southward of Hayti and to the northward of the Island of Jamaica, passing the latter on the 21st Jan., and thence to the southward of the Grand Cayman Island on the 23rd Jan., and thence around the western end of the Island of Cuba, making Cape St. Antonio, the extreme western point of that island, at 3.30 p.m. on the 26th Jan., and seeing the last of Cape Antonio light, twenty miles distant, bearing south half east, at 10 p.m. of that day, her latitude, by observation at noon on the 27th Jan., being 23 deg. 24 min. north. There are no entries in the log-book after the latter hour. The "Coast Survey" found on board of the schooner, as before mentioned, is a report from Professor Bache, Superintendent of the United States Coast Survey, for the year ending

Nov. 1, 1856, and contains, among other things, the following charts: A comparative chart of the entrance into Charleston Harbour by Maffit's Channel; a preliminary chart of the entrance into North Edisto river; a preliminary chart of the coast of South Carolina, from Charleston to Ybee, Georgia, with sailing directions; a preliminary chart of St. Simon's Bar and Brunswick Harbour; a preliminary chart of St. Mary's Bar and Fernandina Harbour; a comparative chart of the same; two charts of St. John's River; and a preliminary chart of the Florida Reefs. These charts, as folded in the book, have each of them written in pencil on the outside the nature of its contents, thus: "Maffit's Channel;" "North Edisto;" "Sailing directions for several So. Ca. and Ga. ports;" "St. Simon's;" "Fernandina;" "St. John's River;" "Florida Reefs." Capt. Dyett, on his examination in preparatorio, produced two letters, which are annexed to his deposition. One of them is a letter of instructions to himself from S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., and is dated "71, Jermyn-street, Military Warehouse, late 21, St. James-street, London, S.W., Nov. 19, 1861;" and the other is a letter from Saul Isaac to "Charles J. Helm, Esq., care of J. Crawford, Esq., Havannah," and is dated "71, Jermyn-street, London, Nov. 19, 1861." The contents of these two letters, and the circumstances under which they were produced by Captain Dyett, will be referred to hereafter. Before proceeding to a consideration of the merits of the case, it is proper to advert to the objections made to the second examinations of the witnesses Leisk and Chadwick. The question of the admissibility of the second deposition of Chadwick was ordered by the court to stand over to be determined at the hearing of the main case. The question of the admissibility of depositions given on the re-examination of persons found on board of a captured vessel, is one resting in the sound discretion of the court, and no authority has been cited which decides that the practice is one that is not to be permitted under circumstances such as existed in the present case. The case of the Pizarro, 2 Wheat. 227, is not regarded as an authority against the course pursued in this case. While the court ought to guard the practice with care, lest it may be the means of introducing abuse and of leading to fraud and imposition, the present case seems, on the fullest consideration, to be one in which the propriety of admitting the re-examination of the witnesses Leisk and Chadwick cannot be questioned. If the case, upon the depositions as originally taken, without the re-examinations of the two witnesses, were a clear one in favour of the claimants, and free from all doubt, the court would hesitate, perhaps, to admit the re-examinations. But, upon the testimony without the re-examinations, the case is not only not one free from doubt, but one clearly calling for the condemnation of both the schooner and her cargo; and the matters testified to by those witnesses upon their re-examinations are not only entirely consistent in themselves, but are corroborated by the other testimony in the case, and by the documents and papers found on board of the schooner. The cases which were cited by the counsel for the claimants upon the point of the admissibility of depositions taken on re-examination (The Haabet, 6 Ch. Rob. 54; The Ostsee, Spinks, part 1, 189; The Leucade, Ib. 227; The Aline and Emily, Spinks, part 2, 327) do not bear at all upon the question as to the admissibility of these re-examinations. They merely affirm the well-known principles of prize law, that affidavits of the captors are not to be admitted where, on the evidence of the persons on board of the captured vessel, there are no circumstances of suspicion in the case; that the case is, in the first instance, to be tried on evidence coming from the captured; that if, upon such evidence, no doubt arises, the property is to be restored; and that the privilege on the part of the captors of giving further proof is, in such cases, rarely granted. Within these principles, this court has endeavoured, in all proper cases, to exhaust the knowledge of the persons found on board of captured vessels. Thus, in the case of the Peterhoff, pending in this court at the same time with the present case, the deposition of Captain Jarman, the master of the captured vessel, had been taken on the 1st April 1863, he having intervened as claimant for the interest of his principals, the owners of the Peterhoff and her cargo, and having made the test oath to such claim on the 21st April 1863. Some of the other witnesses having deposed to the spoliation of papers in the case, the court, upon an affidavit made by Captain Jarman, and upon the application of the claimants, and notwithstanding the objections of the counsel for the libellants and the captors, permitted Captain Jarman to be re-examined upon one of the standing interrogatories, and to add to his answer thereto the explanatory statement contained in his affidavit. This explanation, and the matters deposed to by him on his further examination, were intended to relieve the owners of the Peterhoff and her cargo from the injurious effects of his concealment, on his first examination, of matters which ought to have been testified to by him in answer to the standing interrogatories, and of matters which were testified to by other witnesses. The court is entirely satisfied that it exercised its sound discretion in permitting the re-examination in the case of the Peterhoff, and the exercise of a like discretion calls for the admission in evidence of the depositions of Leisk and Chadwick, taken on re-examination in the present case. They are accordingly admitted in evidence. Very important questions of public law have been discussed before the court in the present case, and in the kindred cases of the Springbok and the Peterhoff, all of which, with the case of the Gertrude, have been pending before the court at the same time. In the latter case no claimant appeared for either the vessel or the cargo, she having been captured while on a voyage from Nassau, in endeavouring to run the blockade into a port of the enemy. Many of the principal questions involved in the present case, and in the cases of the Springbok and the Peterhoff, are alike; and, as the conclusion at which the court has arrived in all of those cases is to condemn the vessels and their cargoes, I shall announce, in this case, the leading principles of public law which lead to a condemnation in all the cases. On behalf of the libellants, it is urged in this case, first, that the Stephen Hart and her cargo were enemy's property when the voyage in question was undertaken, and when the capture was made; secondly, that the schooner was laden with articles contraband of war, destined for the aid and use of the enemy, and on transportation by sea to the enemy's country at the time of the capture; thirdly, that, with a full knowledge, on the part of the owner of the vessel and of the owners of her cargo, that the ports of the enemy were under blockade, the vessel and her cargo were dispatched from a neutral port with an intention, on the part of the owners of each, that, in violation of the blockade, both the vessel and her cargo should enter a port of the enemy. On the part of the claimants, it is maintained, first, that the transportation of all articles, including arms and munitions of war, between neutral ports in a neutral vessel, is lawful in time of war; secondly, that if a neutral vessel, with a cargo belonging to neutrals, be in fact on a voyage from one neutral port to another, she cannot be seized and condemned as lawful prize, although she be laden

Re THE STEPHEN HART.

with contraband of war, unless it be determined that she was actually destined to a port of the enemy upon the voyage on which she was seized, or unless she is taken in the act of violating a blockade. It is insisted, on the part of the claimants, that the Stephen Hart was, at the time of her capture, a neutral vessel, carrying a neutral cargo from London to Cardenas—both of them being neutral ports—in the regular course of trade and commerce. On the other side, it is contended that the cargo was composed exclusively of articles contraband of war, destined, when they left London, to be delivered to the enemy either directly, by being carried into a port of the enemy in the Stephen Hart, or by being transhipped at Cardenas to another vessel; that Cardenas was to be used merely as a port of call for the Stephen Hart, or as a port of transshipment for her cargo; that the vessel and her cargo are equally involved in the forbidden transaction; and that the papers of the vessel were simulated and fraudulent, in respect to her destination and that of her cargo. A condemnation is not asked, if the cargo was in fact neutral property, to be delivered at Cardenas for discharge and general consumption or sale there, but is only claimed, if the cargo was really intended to be delivered to the enemy at some other place than Cardenas, after using that port as a port of call or of transshipment, so as to thus render the representations contained in the papers of the vessel false and fraudulent as to the real destination of the vessel and her cargo. It would scarcely seem possible that there could be any serious debate as to the true principles of public law applicable to the solution of the questions thus presented; and, indeed, the law is so well settled as to make it only necessary to see whether the facts in this case bring the vessel and her cargo within the rules which have been laid down by the most eminent authorities in England and in this country. The principles upon which the Government of the United States, and the public vessels acting under its commission, have proceeded during the present war, in arresting vessels and cargoes as lawful prize upon the high seas, are very succinctly embodied in the instructions issued by the Navy Department, on the 18th Aug. 1862, to the naval commanders of the United States, and which instructions are therein declared to be a recapitulation of those theretofore from time to time given. The substance of those instructions, so far as they are applicable to the present case is, that a vessel is not to be seized “without a search carefully made, so far as to render it reasonable to believe that she is engaged in carrying contraband of war for or to the insurgents, and to their ports directly, or indirectly by transshipment, or otherwise violating the blockade.” The main feature of these instructions, so far as they bear upon the questions involved in this case, is but an application of the doctrine in regard to captures, laid down by the Government of the United States at a very early day. In an ordinance of the Congress of the Confederation, which went into effect on the 1st Feb. 1782 (5 Wheaton, Appendix, 120), it was declared to be lawful to capture and to obtain condemnation of “all contraband goods, wares and merchandise, to whatever nations belonging, although found in a neutral bottom, if destined for the use of an enemy.” The soundness of these principles, and the fact that the law of nations, as applicable to cases of prize, has been observed and applied by the Government of the United States and its courts during the present war, was fully recognised by Earl Russell, Her Britannic Majesty’s principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in his remarks made in the H. of L. on the 18th of May last. Earl Russell there stated that the judgments of the United States Prize Courts, which had been reported to Her Majesty’s Government during the present war, did not evince any disregard of the established principles of international law; that the law officers of the Crown, after an attentive consideration of the decisions which have been laid before them, were of opinion that there was no rational ground of complaint as to the judgment of the American Prize Courts; and that the law of nations in regard to the search and seizure of neutral vessels had been fully and completely acknowledged by the Government of the United States. On the same occasion Earl Russell remarked: “It has been a most profitable business to send swift vessels to break or run the blockade of the Southern ports, and carry their cargoes into those ports. There is no municipal law in this or any country to punish such an act as an offence. I understand that every cargo which runs the blockade and enters Charleston is worth a million of dollars, and that the profit on these transactions is immense. It is well known that the trade has attracted a great deal of attention in this country from those that have a keen eye to such gains, and that vessels have been sent to Nassau in order to break the blockade at Charleston, Wilmington and other places, and carry contraband of war into some of the ports of the Southern States.” He added: “I certainly am not prepared to declare, nor is there any ground for declaring, that the courts of the United States do not faithfully administer the law; that they will not allow evidence making against the captors, or that they are likely to give decisions founded, not upon the law, but upon their own passions and national partialities.” He also said, that in a case of simulated destination, that is, a vessel pretending that she is going to Nassau, when she is in reality bound to a port of the enemy, the right of seizure exists. The then Solicitor-General of England (Sir Roundell Palmer) stated, in the House of Commons, on the 29th June last, referring to the cases of the Dolphin and the Pearl, decided by the judge of the District Court for the southern district of Florida (those vessels having been captured while ostensibly on voyages from Liverpool to Nassau, and it having been held by the court that the intention of the owners of the vessels was that they should only touch at Nassau, and then go on and break the blockade at Charleston), that “if the owners imagined that the mere fact of the vessel touching at Nassau, when on such an expedition, exonerated her, they were very much mistaken;” that the principles of the judgment in the case of the Dolphin were to be found in every volume of Lord Stowell’s decisions;” that it was well known to everybody that there was a large contraband trade between England and America by way of Nassau; that it was absurd to pretend to shut their eyes to it; and that the trade with Nassau and Matamoros had become what it was in consequence of the war. The Foreign-office of Great Britain, in a letter to the owner of the Peterhoff, on the 3rd April last, announced as its conclusion, after having communicated with the law officers of the Crown, that the Government of the United States has no right to seize a British vessel bonâ fide bound from a British port to another neutral port, unless such vessel attempts to touch at, or has an intermediate or contingent destination to, some blockaded port or place, or is a carrier of contraband of war destined for the enemy of the United States; that Her Majesty’s Government, however, cannot, without violating the rules of international law, claim for British vessels navigating between Great Britain and such neutral ports, any general exemption from the belligerent right of visitation by the cruisers of the United States, or proceed upon any general assumption that such vessels may not so act as to render their capture lawful and justifiable; that nothing is more common than for those who contemplate a breach of blockade or the carriage of contraband, to disguise their purpose by a simulated destination and by deceptive papers; and that it has already happened, in many cases, that British vessels have been seized while engaged in voyages apparently lawful, and have been afterwards proved in the prize courts to have been really guilty of endeavouring to break the blockade, or of carrying contraband to the enemy of the United States. The cases of the Stephen Hart, the Springbok, the Peterhoff, and the Gertrude, illustrate a course of trade which has sprung up during the present war, and of which this court will take judicial cognisance, as it appears from its own records and those of other courts of the United States, as well as from public reputation. Those neutral ports have suddenly been raised from ports of comparatively insignificant trade to marts of the first magnitude. Nassau and Cardenas are in the vicinity of the blockaded ports of the enemy, while Matamoros is in Mexico upon the right bank of the Rio Grande, directly opposite the town of Brownsville, in Texas. The course of trade, in respect to Nassau and Cardenas, has been generally to clear neutral vessels, almost always under the British flag, from English ports for those places, and, using them merely as ports either of call or of transshipment, to either resume new voyages from them in the same vessels, or to tranship their cargoes to fleet steamers, with which to run the blockade, the cargoes being composed, in almost all cases, more or less, of articles contraband of war. The character and course of this trade, and its sudden rise, are very properly commented upon in a dispatch from the Secretary of State of the United States to Lord Lyons, of the 12th May 1863. The broad issue upon the merits in this case is, whether the adventure of the Stephen Hart was the honest voyage of a neutral vessel from one neutral port to another neutral port, carrying neutral goods between those two ports only, or was a simulated voyage, the cargo being contraband of war, and being really destined for the use of the enemy, and to be introduced into the enemy's country by a breach of blockade by the Stephen Hart, or by transshipment from her to another vessel at Cardenas. It is conceded in the argument of the leading counsel for the claimants, that if the property was owned by the enemy, and was fraudulently on its way to the enemy as neutral property, it was enemy's property, and was liable to capture, no matter whence it came or whither it was bound; and that, if the vessel were really intending and endeavouring to run the blockade, the property was liable to capture, no matter to whom it belonged or what was its character; but that if it was neutral property, in lawful commerce, it was safe from seizure. The question whether or not the property laden on board of the Stephen Hart was being transported in the business of lawful commerce is not to be decided by merely deciding the question as to whether the vessel was documented for and sailing upon a voyage from London to Cardenas. The commerce is in the destination and intended use of the property laden on board of the vessel, and not in the incidental, ancillary and temporary voyage of a vessel, which may be but one of many carriers through which the property is to reach its true and original destination. If this were not the rule of the prize law, a very wide door would be opened for fraud and evasion. A cargo of contraband goods, really intended for the enemy, might be carried to Cardenas in a neutral vessel sailing from England with papers which, upon their face, import merely a voyage of the vessel to Cardenas, while, in fact, her cargo, when it left England, was destined by its owners to be delivered to the enemy, by being transhipped at Cardenas into a swifter vessel. And such, indeed, has been the course of proceeding in many cases during the present war. Nor is the unlawfulness of the transportation of contraband goods determined by deciding the question as to whether their immediate destination was to a port of the enemy. Thus it is held that, in order to constitute the unlawfulness of the transportation of contraband goods, it is not necessary that the immediate destination of the vessel and cargo should be to an enemy's country or port; for, if the goods are contraband, and destined to the direct use of the enemy's army or navy, the transportation is illegal. If an enemy's fleet be lying, in time of war, in a neutral port, and a neutral vessel should carry contraband goods to that port, not intended for sale in the neutral market, but destined to the exclusive supply of the hostile forces, such conduct would be a direct interposition in the war, by furnishing essential aid in its prosecution, and would be a departure from the duties of neutrality: (Halleck on International Law, chap. 24, sect. 11, p. 576.) The proper test to be applied is, whether the contraband goods are intended for sale or consumption in the neutral market, or whether the direct and intended object of their transportation is to supply the enemy with them. To justify the capture, it is enough that the immediate object of the voyage is to supply the enemy, and that the contraband property is certainly destined to his immediate use. While it is true that goods destined for the use of a neutral country can never be deemed contraband, whatever be their character, and however well adapted they may be to the purposes of war, yet, if they are destined for the direct use of the enemy's army or navy, they are not exempt from forfeiture on the mere ground that they are neutral property, and that the port of delivery is also neutral: (1 Duer on Insurance, 630; The Commercen, 1 Wheaton, 388, 389.) If the contraband cargo of the Stephen Hart had been destined for the use of the fleet of the enemy, lying in the harbour of Cardenas, there could be no doubt that it might lawfully have been captured as prize of war on its way to Cardenas. And, if the contraband cargo was really destined, when it left its port of departure in England, for the use of the enemy in the country of the enemy, and not for sale or consumption in the neutral port, no principle of the law of nations, and no consideration of the rights and interests of lawful neutral commerce, can require that the mere touching at the neutral port, either for the purpose of making it a new point of departure for the vessel to a port of the enemy, or for the purpose of transshipping the contraband cargo into another vessel, which may carry it to the destination which was intended for it when it left its port of departure, should exempt the vessel or the contraband cargo from capture as prize of war. If it was the intention of the owner of the Stephen Hart, or of the owners of her cargo, having control of the movements of the vessel, that she should simply touch at Cardenas, and should proceed thence to Charleston, or some other port of the enemy, her voyage was not a voyage prosecuted by a neutral vessel from one neutral port to another neutral port, but a voyage which was, at the time of her seizure, in course of prosecution to a port of the enemy, although she had not as yet reached Cardenas, and although her regular papers documented her for a voyage from London to Cuba. Such a voyage was one begun and carried on in violation of the belligerent rights of the United States to blockade the ports of the enemy, and to prevent the introduction into those ports of arms and munitions of war. The division of a continuous transportation of contraband goods into several intermediate transportations, by means of intermediate voyages by different vessels carrying such goods, cannot make a transportation which is, in fact, a unit, to become several transportations, although, to effect the entire transportation of the goods, requires several voyages by different vessels, each of which may, in a certain sense and for certain purposes, be said to have its own voyage, and although each of such voyages, except the last one in the circuit, may be between neutral ports. Nor can such a transaction make any of the parts of the entire transportation of the contraband cargo a lawful transportation, when the transportation would not have been lawful if it had not been thus divided. The law seeks out the truth, and never, in any of its branches, tolerates any such fiction as that under which it is sought to shield the vessel and her cargo in the present case. If the guilty intention, that the contraband goods should reach a port of the enemy, existed when such goods left their English port, that guilty intention cannot be obliterated by the innocent intention of stopping at a neutral port on the way. If there be, in stopping at such port, no intention of transshipping the cargo, and if it is to proceed to the enemy's country in the same vessel in which it came from England, of course there can be no purpose of lawful neutral commerce at the neutral port, by the sale or use of the cargo in the market there; and the sole purpose of stopping at the neutral port must merely be to have upon the papers of the vessel an ostensible neutral terminus for the voyage. If, on the other hand, the object of stopping at the neutral port be to tranship the cargo to another vessel, to be transported to a port of the enemy, while the vessel in which it was brought from England does not proceed to the port of the enemy, there is equally an absence of all lawful neutral commerce at the neutral port; and the only commerce carried on in the case is that of the transportation of the contraband cargo from the English port to the port of the enemy, as was intended when it left the English port. This court holds that, in all such cases, the transportation or voyage of the contraband goods is to be considered as a unit, from the port of lading to the port of delivery in the enemy's country; that, if any part of such voyage or transportation be unlawful, it is unlawful throughout; and that the vessel and her cargo are subject to capture, as well before arriving at the first neutral port at which she touches after her departure from England, as on the voyage or transportation by sea from such neutral port to the port of the enemy. These principles were laid down and applied by the District Court for the Southern District of Florida, in the cases of the Dolphin and the Pearl, and the views of that court are fully adopted by this court, and are to be regarded as a part of the settled law governing prize tribunals. It is laid down in Halleck on International Law (c. 21, s. 11, p. 504), that the ulterior destination of the goods determines the character of the trade, no matter how circuitous the route by which they are to reach that destination; that even where the ship in which the goods are embarked is destined to a neutral port, and the goods are there to be unladen, yet if they are to be transported thence, whatever may be the mode of conveyance, to an enemy's port or territory, they fall within the interdiction and penalty of the law; that the trade from an enemy's country through a neutral port is likewise unlawful, and that the goods so shipped through a neutral territory, even though they may be unladen and transhipped, are liable to condemnation; that it is an attempt to carry on trade with the enemy by the circuitous route of a neutral port, and thus evade the penalty of the law; that the law will not countenance any such attempt to violate its principles by a resort to the shelter of neutral territory; that any such voyage is illegal at its inception; and that the goods shipped are liable to seizure at the instant it commences. The same doctrines are asserted in 1 Kent's Commentaries, 85, note "a," 8th edit.; in 1 Duer on Insurance, 568, sect. 13; and in Jecker v. Montgomery, 18 Howard, 110, 115. The same principles are maintained by the English authorities. In 1 Wildman's International Law, 20, it is asserted, that no exemption from the consequences of sending goods to the enemy will be gained by sending them through a neutral country; that the interposition of a prior port makes no difference; that all trade with the enemy is illegal; that the circumstance that the goods are to go first to a neutral port will not make the trade lawful; and that it is not competent, during a war, for a British subject to send goods to a neutral port, with a view of sending them forward on his own account, to an enemy's port, consigned by him to persons there, as in the ordinary course of commerce. These principles were laid down by Sir William Scott, in the Jonge Pieter, 4 Ch. Rob. 79. The particular doctrine thus asserted had reference to the trading of British subjects with the enemy of Great Britain. But the reason of the doctrine makes it equally applicable to the case of a neutral attempting to send contraband goods to an enemy of the United States through the interposition of a neutral prior port. In the case of the Richmond, 5 Ch. Rob. 290, an American vessel was seized in the port of St. Helena, and proceeded against as a prize, on the ground that she was going, under a false destination, to the Isle of France, an enemy's port, with contraband articles concealed on board, and with a view of selling the vessel there, as a vessel well adapted for a ship of war, and for the service of privateering. Sir William Scott, in his judgment in the case, says: "It is difficult not to consider the Isle of France as the possible port of destination of this vessel, according to the original intention. I say, as the possible port, at least, if not the principal and absolute port of destination of the original voyage. It cannot be denied that an American ship might go to St. Helena, and from thence to the Isle of France, or any other port of the enemy, provided the cargo was of an innocent nature. If, on the contrary, it was of a noxious character, the circumstance of merely touching at an English port would not alter the nature of a voyage in itself illegal." He then comes to the conclusion, that the vessel had on board articles contraband of war—pitch and tar—and holds that there are strong grounds to presume that the original destination of those articles was absolutely to the Isle of France. "But," he adds, "supposing that it was only of a shifting nature, and that it was merely eventual, that, in law, would be quite sufficient, and that, at least, must be taken to have been the design of the parties." "If the intention was no more than this, 'I will go and sell pitch and tar at St. Helena, if I can; and if I cannot, I will go with them to the Isle of France, and sell them there,' that is an unlawful purpose, and every step taken in the prosecution of such a design is an unlawful act. The interposition of an English port would not make it innocent." "The pitch and tar were going with an original destination, either positive or eventual, to the Isle of France." In the case of the Maria, 5 Ch. Rob. 325, Sir William Scott says: "It is an inherent and settled principle, that the mere touching at any port, without importing the cargo into the common stock of the country, will not alter the nature of the voyage, which continues the same in all respects, and must be considered as a voyage to the country to which the vessel is actually going, for the purpose of delivering her cargo at the ultimate port." The doctrine here laid down is equally applicable to the cargo, where it is carried to the ultimate port in a different vessel from the one in which it is carried to the intermediate port. In the case of The William, 5 Ch. Rob.

Re THE STEPHEN HART.

49, on appeal before the Lords Commissioners of Appeal in Prize Cases, Sir William Grant, in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "Neither will it be contended that the point from which the commencement of a voyage is to be reckoned changes as often as the ship stops in the course of it; nor will it the more change because a party may move arbitrarily, by the ship's papers or otherwise, to give the name of a distinct voyage to each stage of a ship's progress. The act of shifting the cargo from the ship to the shore, and from the shore back again into the ship, does not necessarily amount to the termination of one voyage and the commencement of another. It may be wholly unconnected with any purpose of importation into the place where it is done. Supposing the landing to be merely for the purpose of airing or drying the goods, or of repairing the ship, would any man think of describing the voyage as beginning at the place where it happened to become necessary to go through such a process? Again, let it be supposed that the party has a motive for desiring to make the voyage appear to begin at some other place than that of the original lading, and that he therefore sends the cargo purely and solely for the purpose of enabling himself to affirm that it was at such other place that the goods were taken on board, would this contrivance at all alter the truth of the fact? Would not the real voyage still be from the place of the original shipment, notwithstanding the attempt to give it the appearance of having begun from a different place? The truth may not always be discernible; but, when it is discovered, it is according to the truth, and not according to the fiction, that we are to give to the transaction its character and denomination. If the voyage from the place of lading be not really ended, it matters not by what acts the party may have evinced his desire of making it appear to have been ended. That those acts have been attended with trouble and expense, cannot alter their quality or their effect. The trouble and expense may weigh as circumstances of evidence to show the purpose for which the acts were done; but, if the evasive purpose be admitted and proved, we can never be bound to accept, as a substitute for the observance of the law, the means, however operose, which have been employed to cover a breach of it. Between the actual importation by which a voyage is really ended, and the colourable importation which is to give it the appearance of being ended, there must necessarily be a great resemblance." The cases of The Nancy, 3 Ch. Rob. 22, and The United States, Stewart's Adm. Rep. 116, were cases in which a voyage, consisting of different parts, was held to be not two voyages, but one entire transaction, formed upon one original plan, conducted by the same persons, and under one set of instructions; and it was held that, in cases of contraband, especially when there is anything of fraud or concealment, a return voyage is to be deemed connected with an outward voyage. It is equally well settled, that the inception of the voyage completes the offence; that from the moment that the vessel, with the contraband articles on board, quits her port on the hostile destination, she may be lawfully captured; that it is not necessary to wait until the ship and goods are actually endeavouring to enter the enemy's port; and that, the voyage being illegal at its commencement, the penalty immediately attaches, and continues to the end of the voyage, at least so long as the illegality exists: Halleck on International Law, chap. 24, sect. 7, p. 3; 2 Wildman's International Law, 218; 1 Duer Insurance, 626, sect. 7.) The same doctrine is laid down by Sir William Scott, in The Imina, 3 Ch. Rob. 167; and in The Trende Sostre, 6 Ch. Rob. 1, note. In The Columbia, 1 Ch. Rob. 154, Sir William Scott says that the sailing, with an intention of evading a blockade, is beginning to execute that intention, and is an overt act constituting the offence, and that from that moment the blockade is fraudulently invaded. The same view is maintained by him in The Neptunus, 2 Ch. Rob. 110. Such being the well-settled principles of public law in reference to the carriage of contraband goods to the enemy, it only remains to be seen whether the Stephen Hart and her cargo are liable to condemnation according to those principles. If she was, in fact, a neutral vessel, and if her cargo, although contraband of war, was being carried from an English port to Cardenas, for the general purposes of trade and commerce at Cardenas, and for use or sale at Cardenas, without any actual destination of the cargo, prior to the time of the capture, to the use and aid of the enemy, then most certainly both the vessel and her cargo were free from liability to capture. The Stephen Hart was laden with a cargo composed exclusively of arms, munitions of war and military equipments. It is urged, on the part of the claimants, that the vessel was a neutral carrier of the products of her own country, and of the property of neutral merchants, from one neutral port to another. A strong appeal has been made to the court not to permit the United States, as a belligerent, to stop the manufactures and commerce of all other nations, or to dictate the mode in which their trade shall be carried on. It is said that a peaceful neutral may quicken his industry and his commerce, and multiply his gains, by the high prices caused by the demands of those belligerents who have exchanged the character of producers for that of consumers and destroyers; that British merchants may lawfully seek to supply the quickened demand at the new price, or become the carriers for those whose ships are exposed to capture; that if, for any reason, they may not sell to the enemy of the United States directly, then they may sell to others who may sell to him; that if they are unwilling to run the blockade, they may sell to those who are willing to take the risk; that if they may not sell to Charleston, they may sell to Cardenas, without troubling themselves with the question, whether Cardenas will sell freely to those who may come from Charleston to buy; and that the national wealth of the United States has been largely increased, during the warfare of other nations, by the employment of its citizens as neutral carriers in just such lawful commerce. But a neutral merchant ought not to forget that the duties which the law of nations imposes on him flow from the same principle which ought to control the action of his Government as a neutral Government; that where he supplies to the enemy of a belligerent munitions or other articles contraband of war, or relieves, with provisions or otherwise, a blockaded port, he makes himself personally a party to a war, in which, as a neutral, he has no right to engage; that, under such circumstances, his property is justly treated as the property of an enemy; and that the observance of those rules which the law of nations prescribes for his conduct, is a high moral duty: (1 Duer on Insurance, 754, 755, sect. 24.) It is contended, on the part of the libellants, that the voyage of the Stephen Hart was originated and prosecuted with the illicit purpose of conveying to the enemy articles contraband of war, and of violating the blockade of a port of the enemy. It will conduce to a better understanding of the case to trace the previous history of the vessel, so far as we learn it from the evidence. She was built in the United States, and had been previously called the Tamaulipas. At the time the war broke out, she was owned in New Orleans, which place she left in June 1861, while that port was under blockade, although she was allowed to proceed on her voyage after her papers had been

Re THE STEPHEN HART.

examined by a blockading vessel. Before she left New Orleans, and while that port was a port of the enemy, and was under blockade, she was sold there, about May 1861, to an English owner residing there. Chadwick testifies to this. He also says, that he understood that this English owner, a person named Allen, gave a power of attorney to Captain Ackley, the then master of the vessel, who was in the employ of Allen, and who took the vessel to Cuba and thence to England, authorising him to sell her; and that she was sold in England to the claimant, Harris. All this appears upon the first examination of Chadwick. But no bill of sale of the vessel is produced either to Allen or to Harris; and there is no mention anywhere of the existence of any, not even in the test oath of Harris. Nor is there any proof of the payment of any consideration on either sale, other than hearsay evidence and the test oath of Harris. All the knowledge that Chadwick has on the subject of the sale to Harris is (Ints. 14, 37) that Captain Ackley, the former master of the vessel, told him that he had sold the vessel to Harris for 2000*l.*, and had got his money, or the drafts for it. Captain Dyett says (Int. 14) that the only way he knows that Harris is the owner is by seeing his name in the register as owner. Neither Captain Dyett nor Chadwick (Int. 15) know anything about any bill of sale of the vessel. Although, in the certificate of registry, which is dated at Liverpool, Oct. 15, 1861, Harris is named as the owner, yet it is expressly stated in the certificate that that paper is not a document of title. Captain Dyett says (Int. 7) that he was appointed to the command of the vessel on the 15th Nov. 1861, he thinks, which was four days before she was cleared at the Custom-house in London; that he was appointed to such command by Messrs. Isaac, Campbell and Co., of London; and that Mr. Saul Isaac, of that firm, delivered the vessel to him. No charter-party, chartering the vessel to the owners of the cargo, was found on board. Captain Dyett says (Int. 19), that there was no charter-party for the voyage, and Chadwick says (Int. 19) that he does not know of any charter-party. The only evidence of any payment by Harris for the vessel is his test oath to his claim. But, in that test oath, he does not state to whom he paid the purchase-money, nor does he state that any bill of sale of the vessel was delivered to him, nor is the power of attorney from Allen, under which the sale is alleged to have been made by Captain Ackley, produced, or its absence accounted for. In the case of The Christine, 1 Spinks, 82, during the recent war between England and Russia, where a vessel was claimed by one Schwartz, her master, as a citizen of Lubeck, and a neutral owner, he alleged that he had purchased her, just before the commencement of the war, from her Russian owners. Dr. Lushington says, in delivering the judgment of the court, after noting the fact that the master had been master of the vessel, under Russian colours, for eight months before the time of the alleged purchase: "This contract is a very suspicious one, not only on the ground that it was immediately antecedent to the war, but also on the ground that it was a purchase by the master." "A party coming forward under such circumstances, and claiming the ship in a neutral character, is bound not only to produce, but to have on board, sufficient documents to satisfy the court that he possesses a bonâ fide title. I do not say that the court would bind him down to the production, in the first instance, of all the papers which it might ultimately deem necessary to induce it to pronounce for a restitution; but I do say that it ought to be a contract of that nature in itself, supported by such documents found on board as would give the court good reasons to suppose that, if the opportunity of producing further proof were allowed, it would give him a title to restitution; otherwise further proof is a mockery." "There must be proof of payment in all cases where any suspicion arises as to the validity of the contract at the time of sale. It is quite vain to say, 'Mine is a bonâ fide valid contract.' The money must have been paid before the master assumes the command, or ventures out on the high seas during war; otherwise the ship would be liable to be condemned." "The title on which the master claims—the bill of sale—is not here. Now, this may be a bonâ fide claim. I do not decide whether it is or not, but I decide that it is not legal, according to the usage and practice of the court, and the laws which regulate the court in matters of prize. If this important paper, which is the sole title-deed, is not produced, what satisfaction can the court have? The title-deed to the ship should be on board of the ship. If further proof were allowed in this particular case, could the court feel satisfied that it would receive a genuine document? The case is teeming with suspicion throughout. Is there any one document whatever produced, that can satisfy the court that the transaction was bonâ fide, independently of all the circumstances I have mentioned? Certainly there is one document." That document was a certificate, showing that a ship's clearer appeared at Lubeck, and swore that he was lawfully authorised by the claimant, by power of attorney, and that the vessel commanded by the claimant solely and bonâ fide belonged to him. Dr. Lushington proceeds: "So that this gentleman makes oath, by virtue of, a power of attorney from Captain Schwartz, which power of attorney is not produced. I have simply this document, which in no degree corroborates the claim." He then adds, that in a case where the question in dispute is the bona fides of the sale, it has always been held that proof of actual payment was essential, and decides that he cannot allow further proof in the case, and that the vessel must be condemned. In the case of The Sisters, 5 Ch. Rob. 138, Sir William Scott says: "A bill of sale is the proper title to which the maritime courts of all countries would look. It is the universal instrument of transfer of ships in the usage of all maritime countries, and it is no degree a peculiar title-deed or conveyance known only to the law of England. It is what the maritime law expects, and what the Court of Admiralty would, in its ordinary practice, always require." As the Stephen Hart was built in the United States, she must on the evidence be held to have belonged, at the commencement of the war, to a citizen of New Orleans, and her transfer, after the blockade was established, to a British subject, a resident of New Orleans, not being in any manner proved by competent evidence, she was still, in judgment of law, enemy's property, and liable to capture as such. But, in addition to this, even if it were shown that she had, in fact, been legally transferred to Allen, a British subject, residing in New Orleans, yet, as the domicil of Allen was in the country of the enemy at the time of the transfer, his status follows the character of that country in war, and the law of nations pronounces him an enemy: (The Pizarro, 2 Wheaton, 227; Opinion of the Supreme Court U. S., in the Prize Cases, b. Grier, J., December Term, 1862, 11 Am. Law Rep. 334.) Moreover, the transfer by Allen to Harris even if that were sufficiently proved, having been made under a power of attorney, must, in judgment of law, be regarded as having been made at New Orleans by Allen, a resident of New Orleans, at as of the time when the power of attorney was given and thus, as having been made in a blockaded port of the enemy, in time of war, by a British resident there, and as leaving the vessel equally liable to capture as enemy's property: (The General Hamilton, 6 Ch. Rob. 61; The Two Brothers, 1 Ch. Rob. 13.

There is, therefore, abundant ground for condemning the vessel, irrespective of any of the reasons connected with the traffic in which she was engaged at the time of her capture, and the proofs justify the same conclusion in respect to the cargo. The cargo of the vessel, composed of arms, munitions of war and military equipments, is claimed as the sole property of S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., of London, who appear to be dealers in military goods. It is alleged by the claimants of the vessel and cargo, that the real destination of the vessel and cargo was Cardenas, in the island of Cuba. But it is to be noted, that the shipping articles specify the voyage as a voyage from London to Cuba (Cuba generally, not Cardenna, or any other port in Cuba), and Sierra Leone, and any port and [or] ports on coast of Africa and [or] North and [or] South America and [or] West Indies, and back to a final port of discharge in the United Kingdom." All the other official papers found on board of the vessel, such as the receipt for the Dover harbour duties, the certificate of the shipping-master for the clearance, the receipt for light duties at London, the receipt for harbour duties at Ramsgate, the certificate from the searcher's office of the London Custom-house, and the victualling bill, speak of the voyage as one from London to Cuba. The telegraphic dispatch of the 23rd Nov. 1861, from S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., to Lkyd's agent at Deal, speaks of the schooner as bound for Cardenas. The title-page of the ordinary log-book speaks of the voyage as one from London to Cardenas, Cuba. The label on the outside of that log-book has the blank for the place at which the voyage commenced filled up with the words, "London, England," but the blank for the place of destination is not filled up at all. The blanks at the tops of the pages of that log-book are only filled up on one page, although sixty-two pages of that log-book are occupied with entries of the progress of the voyage from the 19th Nov. 1861, to and including noon of the 27th Jan. 1862. The page referred to has, at the top, the voyage entered, as "from London towards Cuba." On the first page of that log-book under date of Nov. 19, 1861, there is an entry that the pilot took charge of the schooner Stephen Hart, on a voyage to Cuba." The title-page of the official log-book speaks of the voyage as being one to "Cuba and Sierra Leone." None of the letters found on board are addressed to any person at Cardenas. But there was found on board a letter from Saul Isaac to Mr. Crawford, the British Consul-General at Havannah, asking his "assistance and advice for Captain Dyett, of the schooner Stephen Hart, should he need it during his stay at Havannah." The letter of instructions to Captain Dyett from S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., produced by Captain Dyett on his examination, directs him to proceed "to Cardenas, Cuba," and to report, on his arrival there, "to Charles J. Helm, Esq., to whom you will consign yourself and vessel, and from whom you will receive all orders for your future actions with reference to the schooner and cargo, and you will be pleased to implicitly obey all orders given by Charles J. Helm, Esq. . . . Mr. Helm may require the schooner for use at Havannah. Should he do so, you will at once make the best arrangements for the immediate return to England of yourself and crew. Should, however, any one wish to remain in the employ of Mr. Helm, we have no objection to his doing so. In case Mr. Helm has no use for the vessel, after discharging the cargo, you will receive full instructions from Messrs. Isaac, Campbell and Co., by mail leaving this on the 2nd proximo, for proceeding to the West Coast of Africa." The letter then directs Captain Dyett to deliver, without delay, on his arrival the letters which he has for Mr. Helm and Mr. Crawford, and also, immediately on his arrival at Cardenas, to telegraph "to Cahuzac Brothers, Havannah, who will, on receipt of message, communicate with you." The letter to Mr. Helm, thus referred to, was also produced by Captain Dyett on his examination, and is from Saul Isaac, and is addressed "Charles J. Helm, Esq., care of J. Crawford, Esq., Havannah." It says: "The bearer of this is Captain Dyett, of the schooner Stephen Hart, for whom I ask the favour of your good offices. Should he require assistance or advice during his stay at Havannah, he will hand you his instructions from my house to read, and I feel assured that you will in all matters find him a good man." It is very manifest from these documents, that Mr. Helm, Mr. Crawford and Cahuzac Brothers, the only parties named as having any concern in Cuba with the vessel or her cargo, were all of them to be found at Havannah, and none of them at Cardenas, and that no person in Cardenas was consignee either of the vessel or the cargo; that it was contemplated that the vessel should go to Havannah, if Mr. Helm required it, and be given up for use to Mr. Helm, at Havannah, if he required it; that Captain Dyett was to obey the orders of Helm in all his actions with reference to the vessel and her cargo; that Captain Dyett and his crew were authorised to remain in the employ of Mr. Helm, if any of them desired to do so; and that Mr. Helm was to have the control of the discharging of the cargo of the vessel, and the right to use the vessel after the cargo was discharged. It is also to be noted that these instructions to Captain Dyett were not from Harris, the alleged owner of the vessel, but were from S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., who claim to be the owners of the whole of her cargo. No instructions whatever from Harris to Captain Dyett were found on board, nor is it pretended that he had any from Harris. Harris appears to have given up the entire control of the vessel and of her movements to S. Isaac, Campbell and Co.; and, for these reasons, independently of all other considerations, the owner of the vessel must be held to have involved her in any illegality of which S. Isaac, Campbell and Co. or Captain Dyett have been guilty in respect to the cargo of the vessel, especially in view of the facts which Captain Dyett states, that he was put in command of the vessel by that firm, and that there was no charter-party for the voyage: (Jackson v. Montgomery, 18 Howard, 110, 119.) The conclusion is irresistible, from the contents of the three letters referred to, that there was no intention whatever of discharging the cargo of the vessel at Cardenas; and that, if discharged at all in Cuba, it was to be discharged at Havannah. As no manifest, bills of lading or invoices, or any other papers (except the letter of instructions to Captain Dyett), giving any information as to the character of the cargo, or its owners, or its consignees, were found on board of the vessel, the conviction is forced on the mind that the cargo had a single ownership and a single destination; that that ownership was one represented by Mr. Helm as its agent; and that that destination was to the place where his principals resided, and where they would derive the most benefit from the cargo. Who was Charles J. Helm? Captain Dyett (Int. 16) calls him "Major Helm," and says that he resides in Havannah. Chadwick, on his second examination, says (Int. 11) that Helm was the agent for the "Confederate States," in Cuba. This being so, it may very well be inferred that this cargo of arms and munitions of war was destined to be carried into the enemy's country, as we find the vessel and her cargo placed, by the orders of S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., within the entire control and subject to the orders of Helm. But, independently of this, the evidence is irresistible, that the cargo was destined for the enemy's country. The test oaths, both of Harris and of Samuel Isaac, when examined carefully, fall far short of a frank and clear statement of an innocent destination for the vessel and cargo. The test oath of Harris says, that the true and only destination of the vessel, with the cargo, was Cardenas, "where the same was to be delivered." This oath would be satisfied by a delivery of the cargo in bulk at Cardenas to Helm, and its transshipment there to another vessel, to be carried to a port of the enemy, in pursuance of such an original destination. It does not state that the destination of the cargo was not to a port of the enemy. And it states, in very suspicious language, that it was not intended that the vessel should enter, or attempt to enter, any port of the United States, but it does not state that it was not intended that the vessel or her cargo should enter, or attempt to enter, any port of the enemy of the United States, or any port blockaded by the naval forces of the United States. In all these particulars, the test oath of Samuel Isaac to the claim for the cargo holds the same suspicious language, and is wanting in the same averments. The court searches in vain through these test oaths to find those full and honest allegations which should characterise the test oath to a claim made by a neutral really engaged in lawful and innocent commerce. I shall now review the evidence in the case, in order to see to what conclusion it leads. Captain Dyett says (Int. 4), that he does not remember seeing any "Southern flag" on board of his vessel, although he says, that if the "Southern flag" were put before him, he should not know it. He admits, however, that besides the English colours, under which the vessel sailed, and the American flag, "that is, the stars and stripes," there were other flags in the vessel's bag. Chadwick says (Int. 4), that they had the "Confederate" flag on board, and cut up the American flag to make a burgee of it. A "burgee" is defined by lexicographers to be "a distinguishing flag or pennant." Leisk says (Int. 4), that the vessel had an American flag on board, and another flag that looked similar to the American flag. Nellman says (Int. 4), that she had the American ensign, which was cut up on the voyage to make a burgee of, and also "a flag of the Confederate States of America;" that he saw that flag a few days before the capture, in the sail cabin, in a bag with the burgee; and that, on the day of the capture, he found the burgee on the floor in the main cabin, and made thorough search for "the Confederate flag" but could not find it. Allan says (Int. 4), that they had the American colours on board, and another flag with stars and stripes, "but not as many stars as the old American flag;" and that he does not know whether that was the "Confederate flag" or not, as he never saw one to know it, unless that was one. Chadwick, on his re-examination (Int. 39), says, that after the capture of the vessel, and while the captors were in charge, he took this "Confederate flag" from where it was hid in his clothes bag, and threw it overboard; and that this flag was intended to be displayed in connection with a peculiar one called the "Isle of Man's flag," or signal, "which was adopted by the Southern States as a signal for a friendly vessel wishing to enter, and which should be protected, as far as possible, by them." This signal flag was probably the burgee of which the witnesses speak. Captain Dyett says (Int. 3), that the schooner was captured about eighty-two miles from Point de Yeacos, in Cuba. Chadwick says (Int. 3), that the capture took place between Cuba and Key West, near the coast of Florida. Nellman and Allan say (Int. 3), that the capture took place about thirty miles from Key West. Capt. Dyett says (Int. 19), that the capture took place about twenty-five miles from Key West, and (Int. 36) about eighty-two miles from Cardenas. Captain Dyett says (Int. 11), that the vessel was bound for Cardenas; that the contents of her cargo were unknown to him, except that he saw some cases marked "long Enfield," which he supposed contained "long Enfield guns," and he thinks he saw a few bales, marked "socks," and that at Erith, below London, on the Thames, some packages were taken in stamped "ball cartridges;" but, he says, "she had no goods on board which were contraband of war, or otherwise prohibited by law." He also says (Int. 39), that he cannot state anything further in regard to the real and true property and destination of the vessel and cargo, except that, after he had discharged his cargo, he was to proceed to Sierra Leone, as stated in his letter of instructions. Chadwick, on his first examination (Int. 11), says that they were bound to Cardenas: that the cargo consisted of powder and munitions of war; that (Int. 39) he understood from the captain and the shipping articles that they were bound to Cardenas, and from there to Sierra Leone; and that he knows nothing beyond that. Leisk says (Int. 11), that the vessel was bound to Cardenas and Sierra Leone; that he knew that her cargo, consisting of arms, powder and soldiers' equipments, was contraband of war; and (Int. 39) that he knows nothing about the destination of the vessel and cargo, except that they were bound to Cardenas. Nellman says (Int. 11), that the vessel was bound to Cuba, Sierra Leone, or the West Indies, or some port in North or South America; and that he does not know to which of those several ports or places they were bound first. In this particular, he confirms the very ambiguous and alternative language in the shipping articles. He also says (Int. 11), that the cargo consisted of Enfield rifles, powder, cartridges, shot, shells, soldiers' accoutrements, such as knapsacks, belts and pouches, and some heavy boxes, which he thinks contained small cannon; and that the lading consisted entirely of warlike stores and articles. He thus manifests a knowledge of the cargo, which is in striking contrast with Captain Dyett's ignorance. Nellman says (Int. 11), that he thinks that these goods are contraband of war. Captain Dyett, however (Int. 11), says, that Enfield rifles and ball cartridges are not contraband of war. Allan says (Int. 11), that the vessel was bound to Cuba; and that the captain said he was going to Cardenas, and from there to the coast of Africa. As to the cargo, Allan says (Int. 11), that he had seen boxes marked "long Enfields," which he took to be guns, and had heard there was powder, and had seen bales of blankets and other military equipments, and believes that she had a general cargo of arms and munitions of war. Captain Dyett says (Int. 14), that he does not know who owns the cargo, but his impression is that it belongs to Isaac, Campbell and Co.; that (Int. 16) he does not know who were the laders of the cargo, or for whose risk and account the goods were, or what interest Major Helm had in them; and that he does not know to whom they would belong, if restored and delivered at their destined port. Chadwick says (Int. 14), that he heard in London that Isaac, Campbell and Co. owned the cargo. Nellman says (Int. 14), that he believes the cargo is owned "in the Confederate States of America;" that he heard Chadwick say so; that he never heard anything further concerning the cargo and its owners, except that Mr. Chadwick told him that the cargo was going to some place in "the Confederate States," and professed to know all about it. He also says (Int. 16), that Mr. Hughes, who he believes is an agent for "the Confederate States," put the cargo on board, and was the lader thereof, and seemed to be the principal man, and had the most to say about the vessel and cargo; that the goods were to be delivered in the southern States, at some port therein, and he links for the account or benefit of some person in those States; and that he believes, from what he heard on board the vessel, that the cargo was destined for some port in the Southern States, either to be carried there in that vessel, or to be transhipped and put in another vessel for the same purpose. He also says (Int. 24), that he thinks that the vessel was in reality bound to Cuba, and that, after arriving there, she would have received instructions as to what particular port or place she should go to in the Southern States, or as to whether the cargo should be transhipped and put on board another vessel; and that Chadwick told him that a steamer would receive the cargo at Cuba very probably, and would carry it thence to some Southern port. Captain Dyett says (Int. 17), that he signed four bills of lading for the cargo, which were prepared by the broker and laid before him to sign; that he signed them without reading them, and does not know their contents; and that he had no bill of lading on board when he sailed, or at any time before his capture. He also says (Int. 31), that he signed a manifest before the Collector of London, and left it at the office of the brokers, Speyer and Haywood, in London, and has not seen it since; that the manifest was in the usual form, and made from the bills of lading; and (Int. 17) that the bills of lading and manifest were to be forwarded to him at Cardenas. He also says (Int. 18), that there were no invoices on board of the vessel. Captain Dyett, on the capture of the vessel, did not give up to the prize-master the letter of instructions from S. Isaac, Campbell and Co. to him, or the letter from Saul Isaac to Charles J. Helm, of Nov. 19, 1861. He only produced them on his examination in preparatorio, after his arrival at New York, in answer to the searching inquiries of the standing interrogatories. He says (Int. 20), that he did not give up those letters to the prize-master, because he did not know that he was bound to give them up. Yet he says (Int. 18), that he gave to the prize-master his ship's log-book, his official log-book, and his desk, with all the papers therein, being his private papers and in no way relating to the vessel; and, among the papers which he so gave up, is found the comparatively unimportant letter from Saul Isaac to the British Consul at Havannah, and the telegraphic dispatches and official papers of the vessel, which were calculated, on their face, to show a fair and honest voyage from London to Cuba. The two letters which he did withhold, namely, the instructions to himself and the letter to Helm, were the only documents on board which in any way connect Mr. Helm with this vessel and her cargo. This withholding or temporary suppression of those two letters, whose character and contents I have already commented upon, is one of those circumstances which is always regarded with suspicion, particularly where the suppression is made by a master. I shall have occasion to refer to this point hereafter, in connection with the attempted suppression of important papers by Chadwick. That the suppression of these letters by Captain Dyett was premeditated, is shown by the testimony of Nellman, who says (Int. 18), that Captain Dyett had a letter with him directed to some one, and that he heard him and Chadwick talk about it an hour or so before the capture, just when the capturing vessel was firing her first shot. Chadwick says (Int. 18), that he had some private letters from his wife and friends, which he gave to Leisk, the cook, to take care of, and that Leisk gave them up to some of the capturing officers. Leisk says (Int. 32), that he had some papers belonging to Chadwick which he, Leisk, put into a teapot, where they were found by the searching officer; and that they were put there by the orders of Chadwick, to keep them out of sight. Nellman says (Int. 20), that Chadwick, a few minutes before the capture, gave some papers to Leisk, with directions to put them into a teapot in the galley, for the purpose of concealing them, but that they were found by the United States officers. Allan says (Int. 12), that he saw a bunch of papers taken out of the teapot by the boarding officer, and that, when they were found, the officer asked Leisk what they were, and Leisk said he thought it was tea. On his re-examination (Int. 32), Leisk says, that some papers were given to him by Captain Dyett on the evening of the day they were captured, which Captain Dyett had put at the foot of his berth. Leisk says: "He told me, if he sent for these papers, I should know where to find them. He then went on board the Supply. When he returned, I asked him if he wanted those papers. He said he had already got them. This conversation was between us, there being no other person within hearing. We were in his stateroom at the time, with the door closed." We have no explanation from any witness as to what those papers were. As to the papers which Leisk received from Chadwick and put into the teapot, where they were found by the boarding officer, Leisk says, on his re-examination: "When the first officer handed me those papers, he seemed anxious and uneasy, and, when he returned to the schooner to get his clothes, the first thing he said to me was, 'Have you got those papers?' I told him they were found by the officer. He then said, 'Why in hell did you not destroy them?' and likewise, 'By God, I am done!'" Three of the papers which were concealed in the teapot, and which Chadwick speaks of as private letters, are letters to Chadwick containing some very important matter. One of them is dated at "Bristol, England, Oct. 29, 1861," and is addressed to Chadwick by a person who signs himself "R. H. Leonard, ship Alexander, Confederate States." Leonard expresses his pleasure that he is able to furnish Chadwick with "the book required," without price. He refers to it as a book which Chadwick had written for, says that it belongs to him, Leonard, and that, if it were worth 50%, he would willingly give it to an enterprise of Chadwick's, and hopes it may be of valuable service to him. This book is the copy of the United States Coast Survey that was found on board of the vessel, containing charts, as has been seen, for entering very many of the blockaded ports of the enemy. In his testimony, given on his re-examination, Chadwick refers particularly to this book of charts as one which he recommended to his employers to purchase, and which they told him to purchase at any price. He says that he obtained one, which was presented to him by "R. H. Leonard, the mate of the ship Alexander, then lying in Bristol." Those employers, Chadwick states, in his deposition on re-examination, to have been Mr. Hughes, "the commercial Confederate agent for purchasing arms and ammunition for, and shipping the same to, the Confederate States," "William L. Yancey, of the United States," a South Carolina captain, named Connor, and Mr. Saul Isaac. In the same letter, Leonard says: "Captain Johnson will mark out the chart; also the route, with some information; also write a letter, which he will wish you to deliver or forward. Mrs. Bain will also have a letter for you to take, and forward to Virginia, if you arrive safe. I hope you may be successful. If so, report the old Alexander laying up at Bristol, with the palmetto tree constantly flying, and that her captain and officers are ready to aid the South in any enterprise. Tommy, I will not ask you to disclose the secret of your voyage. Be whatever it may, I believe it is true to the South. My heart and well wishes are with you, hoping you may be successful, and I may hear of the consequences. If that book prove serviceable to you, it will afford me more pleasure than its weight in gold in return. . . . I shall send the book by express this evening. I wish you to write me two or three mails before you put to sea, as Mrs. Bain will have some other letters to send. If you should fail, destroy." Chadwick, on his re-examination, states that he received a letter from Captain Johnson, of the ship Naomi, of Charleston, S.C., giving him a description of the entrance to Charleston, and also received from him letters for his wife, and for other persons residing in the "Confederate States." In confirmation of this, we find that another of the three letters, being one dated at "Bristol, England, Oct. 29, 1861," and signed "John Johnson, ship Naomi," and addressed to "Mr. Benjamin H. Chadwick, schooner Stephen Hart, Surrey Canal, London," says: "Mr. Leonard, chief officer of the ship Alexander, and I, had some private conversation this morning concerning some things, which I need not now repeat." Johnson then proceeds to give specific directions as to the mode of entering the harbour of Charleston, and adds: "The chart of Charleston Harbour, in the book called the United States Coast Survey, will be your best guide." He also says: "Enclosed is a letter, and I beg that you will, in case you succeed in safely reaching any Southern port, forward the same to its destination. At the same time, do not let its incumbrance in any way interfere with your enterprise. Destroy it, if need be; but, if it could be managed to forward it safe to my wife, I should feel very grateful towards you for your kindness. I hope and trust that you will succeed in your undertaking. Observe secrecy by all means, and I can assure you that no information as regards the Stephen Hart's whereabouts or movements shall be gained from me by any one here or elsewhere. . . . May the God of Justice guide you in safety to your port of destination is the fervent wish of one who loves the South, its institutions and its people." The remaining one of the three letters is from Leonard, and is addressed "To Mr. B. H. Chadwick, alias Tommy, 1st officer, Stephen Hart," and is written at Bristol, England, but without date. It says, among other things, "Give me the particulars of your voyage, what your cargo consists of, and if you have got any guns on board." The suppression by Captain Dyett, until his examination in preparatorio, of the letter of instructions to him from S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., and of the letter from Saul Isaac to Helm, and the attempt by Chadwick to conceal the letters from Leonard and Captain Johnson, are circumstances of great importance, as tending to show the illicit and fraudulent character of the entire transaction connected with this vessel and her cargo, and that Captain Dyett and Chadwick were concerned in carrying out the unlawful purpose, and endeavoured to promote that end by attempting to conceal the evidence which they had in their possession. The spoliation of papers is a strong circumstance of suspicion: (1 Kent's Comm. 157.) It is not, however, either in England or in the United States, held to furnish, of itself, sufficient ground for condemnation, but is a circumstance open to explanation: (The Hunter, 1 Dodson, 480; The Pizarro, 2 Wheaton, 227.) But, if the explanation be not prompt and frank, or be weak or futile, if the cause labours under heavy suspicions, or if there be a vehement presumption of bad faith or gross prevarication, it is ground for the denial of further proof, and the condemnation ensues from defects in the evidence, which the party is not permitted to supply: (1 Kent's Comm. 158; The Pizarro, 2 Wheaton, 227; Bernardi v. Motteaux, Doug. 554, 559, 560.) In the case of the Two Brothers, 1 Ch. Rob.

131, the master had burned some letters, before capture, which he said were only private letters. Sir William Scott says, in commenting upon that circumstance: "No rule can be better known than that neutral masters are not at liberty to destroy papers; or, if they do, that they will not be permitted to explain away such suppression by saying, they were only private letters. In all cases it must be considered as a proof of mala fides: and, where that appears, it is a universal rule, to presume the worst against those who are convicted of it. It will always be supposed that such letters relate to the ship or cargo, and that it was of material consequence to some interests that they should be destroyed." In the case of the Rising Sun, 2 Ch. Rob. 104, Sir William Scott says: "Spoliation is not alone, in our Courts of Admiralty, a cause of condemnation; but if other circumstances occur to raise suspicion, it is not too much to say of a spoliation of papers, that the person guilty of that act shall not have the aid of the court, or be permitted to give further proof, if further proof is necessary." The withholding by the master of the two letters, in the present case, until his examination, while he gave up to the captors the letter to the British consul at Havannah, and, as he says, all his own private papers, would have been a complete suppression of the two letters in question, if their production had not been compelled by the stringent character of the standing interrogatories. In the case of the Concordia, 1 Ch. Rob. 119, the master withheld his instructions until the time of his examination. Sir William Scott says: "This was certainly incorrect. It is a master's duty to produce all his papers, and, least of all to withhold his instructions, which are very important papers to be communicated for the interest of both parties." So, also, the concealment by Chadwick of the letters to him, which showed the true character of the enterprise of the Stephen Hart, would have been as effectually a destruction of those papers, for the purposes of this case, if they had not been found upon the search, as if they had been actually thrown into the sea and lost. And the suspicion which the law attaches to a spoliation of papers arises with equal force from an attempted spoliation. That Captain Dyett and all of his crew knew of the blockade of the enemy's ports, is abundantly established by the evidence. Nellman states (Int. 21), that "all on board knew that the Southern States, including Florida, were in a state of war with the United States, and the Southern ports blockaded by the United States Navy." "It was a matter of conversation on board during the voyage." Captain Dyett says (Int. 21): "I knew of the rebellion in the Southern States, and that some of the Southern ports were blockaded." Captain Dyett says (Int. 36), that the vessel was steering for Cardenas when she was captured, and that her course was not altered upon the appearance of the capturing vessel. Chadwick, on his first examination (Int. 35), says the same thing. Nellman says (Int. 36), that when they first saw the capturing vessel, about six o'clock in the morning, the Stephen Hart was standing towards Key West, and continued on that course until about twelve o'clock, when she tacked and steered towards Havannah, and was steering towards Havannah when captured; that their course, at all times when wind and weather permitted, was towards Cardenas, except in the instance mentioned, and except when obliged to pursue another course on account of head winds; and that the latter was the reason why the vessel was steering towards Havana at the time of her capture. Nellman says that he had the watch when the capturing vessel was first seen; and that Chadwick had the watch from eight a.m. until noon, and he, Nellman, again from noon to four o'clock. Nellman (Int. 19), and

Allan (Int. 3), say that the capture was made about two o'clock p.m. Although Captain Dyett, and Chadwick, on his first examination, say (Int. 36) that the course of the vessel was, at all times when wind and weather would permit, towards Cardenas, yet it is apparent that she set out from England with the intention of running the blockade, if she could, and she was captured in a position consistent with that intention. The evidence which has been reviewed establishes, beyond reasonable doubt, that the cargo of the Stephen Hart was intended, on its departure from England, to be carried into the enemy's country, for the use of the enemy, by a violation of the blockade of some one of the enemy's ports, either in the Stephen Hart, or in another vessel into which the cargo was to be transhipped, for the purpose of being transported by sea to the enemy's country. This is clearly established without the aid of the testimony given by Chadwick on his re-examination. Some portions of that testimony have been incidentally alluded to. The other main facts detailed by Chadwick on his re-examination are entirely consistent with all the rest of the evidence in the case, and are corroborated by that evidence. Some of the points of corroboration have been already alluded to, and I shall refer to others. Chadwick says, on his re-examination (Int. 11): "The vessel was bound to Cardenas, in Cuba, but the destination of her cargo was certainly to one of the Confederate States, and the vessel was, in like manner, so destined if Charles J. Helm, the Confederate agent at Cuba, should so direct. That voyage began in London, and was to have ended at Cardenas, or any port in the Confederate States which the aforesaid Confederate agent should direct." He also says (Int. 36): "The vessel was steering for Cardenas, but that port was to be used only as an intermediate port of call, and of transshipment of the cargo, if necessary, or ordered by Charles J. Helm." He also says (Int. 39), that after he had gone in the vessel, then called the Tamaulipas, from New Orleans, by the way of Havannah and Matanzas, to Falmouth and Bristol, England, and thence in the same vessel to London, he was requested to go to No. 71, Jermyn-street, London. He adds: "I accordingly went, and was there introduced to Mr. Isaacs, the head of the firm of Isaacs, Campbell and Co., and also to a Mr. Hughes, whose first name I did not learn, who told me he was the commercial Confederate agent for purchasing arms and ammunition for, and shipping the same to, the Confederate States. He asked me how I would like to run the blockade of the Southern States in the Stephen Hart. I answered, 'That I would sooner go in a steamer.' There was no definite arrangement made at that time. I was again sent for, and went to the same place, where I met Mr. Isaacs, the same Captain Hughes, and William L. Yancey, of the United States. There was also a South Carolina captain there. I was taken by Captain Hughes and this South Carolina captain (whose name was Connor) into another room, and there fully examined in regard to my knowledge of the southern coast of the United States. I was then employed by Captain Hughes as a pilot agent, and to leave the Stephen Hart and go on board of a steamer which he had chartered, and which was then taking in a cargo of arms and ammunition for the Confederate States. I was to leave the Stephen Hart, go ashore and take lodgings, and observe secrecy until I was called, which I did. About a week afterwards I was told to go on board of the steamer Gladiator, then lying in the Thames, and examine and see if she had proper boats for landing her cargo in the surf on the Southern coast, if required, and report to Hughes. I did so, and reported that she had, with the exception of one boat.

I was then ordered to take my things on board of that vessel (the Gladiator), and proceed in her to Nassau, and there either obtain a pilot for her, or else pilot her myself into some Southern port of the Confederate States between Cape Carnival, in Florida, and York River, Virginia. I went aboard accordingly. That vessel was loaded with arms, ammunition and army outfits. After I got aboard, it was found that she could not carry all the cargo which had been bought for her, and accordingly, what portion thereof could not be taken by the Gladiator was put aboard of the Stephen Hart, together with other like cargo to fill her up. I was ordered to proceed from the Gladiator and take charge of the loading and fitting out of the Stephen Hart, which I did. On my recommendation to Captain Hughes, Captain Dyett was appointed master of the Stephen Hart, while I was to go in her nominally as mate, but really in charge of the cargo, consisting of arms and munitions of war. The vessel proceeded down the Thames several miles, and there took aboard a quantity of powder." Nellman testifies (Int. 30) to the same effect as to the place where the powder was taken on board. Chadwick proceeds: "Before the Stephen Hart left, I was instructed by Capt. Hughes to proceed to Cuba, that is, to Cardenas, and there to work under the instructions of Charles J. Helm, the agent for the 'Confederate States' at that place. He said the cargo was to be transhipped into a steamer, which could be used with greater facility in running the blockade, or she might be ordered to proceed herself." The connection of Hughes with the transaction, and his being an agent for "the Confederate States," and the lading of the cargo on board of the Stephen Hart, are also testified to by Nellman (Int. 16). The contents of the letter of instructions to Captain Dyett confirm all that Chadwick says, on his re-examination, as to the connection of Helm with the matter, and as to the certain destination of the cargo and the contingent destination of the vessel being to a port of the enemy. It is stated by Nellman (Int. 14), that he heard Chadwick say that the cargo was going to the enemy's country, and (Int. 24) that a steamer would receive it at Cuba very probably, and would carry it thence to a port of the enemy. And it is apparent, from what Nellman says (Int. 14), that it was understood, on board of the Stephen Hart, that the cargo was destined for a port of the enemy, and was to be carried there in that vessel, or to be transhipped to another vessel for the same purpose. Chadwick proceeds: "The agreement was, that I should have 45 dols. a month for all the time I was employed, including any time I might be detained or imprisoned in consequence of any attempt to run the blockade; and, if I had gone in the Gladiator, I was to have received a bounty of 500 dols.; and in the Stephen Hart, if ordered by Helm to cross the blockade, I was to have a bonus, to be agreed upon with him." The shipping articles confirm this statement of Chadwick's to a certain extent, as they show that his wages were to be 9l. per month. They also show that the wages of the mate, whose place he took, were only 6l. per month. He then goes on to state, as he had already stated in his affidavit upon which the order for his re-examination was made, that he was induced to state these facts, not by any persons in any way connected with the libellants or captors, but solely by the persuasions of his wife, "who is a loyal woman, and now residing in Boston." The absence from on board of the Stephen Hart of the bills of lading and manifest, to whose existence the master testifies, and of all invoices of the cargo, has been already referred to. The absence of these papers, in time of war, is a suspicious circumstance, as affecting the question of the neutrality of the cargo and the honesty of the trade: (1 Kent's Comm. 157; Halleck on International Law, c. 25, s. 25, p. 622.) It has been strongly urged upon the court, in the present case, that as Harris, the alleged owner of the vessel, is not shown to have any interest in any of the cargo, the vessel can be visited with no greater penalty for carrying contraband articles, even though they were intended for the enemy, than the loss of freight and expenses. But, even on the assumption that the grounds already set forth in respect to the real ownership of the vessel are not sufficient for her condemnation, the court is of opinion that her condemnation must, under the circumstances, follow the condemnation of the cargo, the latter being contraband of war, and intended, on its departure from England, to be carried into the enemy's country by a violation of the blockade. The contingent destination of the vessel to a blockaded port would be sufficient, under the authority of the case of the Richmond, before cited, to warrant her condemnation. But, even if her destination was only to Cardenas, yet, as her cargo was intended, on its departure from England, to be introduced into the enemy's country, by being transhipped from the vessel at Cardenas, condemnation must equally follow, because of the employment of the vessel in this unlawful enterprise under the circumstances disclosed in this case. As testified to by Captain Dyett, there was no charter-party for the voyage. He says that he was put in charge of the vessel, not by Harris, her alleged owner, but by S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., the claimants of the cargo. No instructions from Harris to Captain Dyett are found, but only instructions to him from S. Isaac, Campbell and Co. Harris, therefore, surrendered the entire control of his vessel to that firm, and her master must be regarded as their agent, and the claimant of the vessel must be held responsible for the use to which the master and the claimants of the cargo put the vessel: (Jecker v. Montgomery, 18 Howard, 110, 119.) That use was the carrying, for a portion of the distance on its way to the enemy's country, of a cargo contraband of war, intended for the use of the enemy, and to enter the enemy's port by a violation of the blockade. This use of the vessel was, under the authorities before cited, unlawful in its inception, and, the entire transportation of the cargo from England to the enemy's country being unlawful, the vessel must be condemned for having been permitted, by Harris, to be used, at the pleasure of S. Isaac, Campbell and Co., in carrying out a portion of the unlawful purpose. Such use was, under the circumstances, in judgment of law, with the knowledge and assent of Harris. Chadwick, on his re-examination (Int. 39), states that Harris wished him to continue in the Stephen Hart as mate, "that either she would go to, or else he would put me on board of another vessel to go to the Confederate States." In the case of The Ringende Jacob, 1 Ch. Rob. 89, Sir William Scott says that, under the ancient law of Europe, the carrying of a contraband cargo rendered the vessel liable to condemnation; but that, in the modern practice of the Courts of Admiralty of England, a milder rule has been adopted, and that the carrying of contraband articles is attended only with the loss of freight and expenses, "except where the ship belongs to the owner of the contraband cargo, or where the simple misconduct of carrying a contraband cargo has been connected with other malignant and aggravated circumstances." And he cites as an exception, a case attended with particular circumstances of falsehood and fraud, both as to the papers and the destination of the voyage, and in which there was an attempt, under colourable appearances, to defeat the rights of the belligerent. The same doctrine is laid down in the case of The Jonge Tobias, 1 Ch. Rob. 329.

In the case of The Franklin, 3 Ch. Rob. 217, a neutral vessel, ostensibly bound to a neutral port, and whose cargo consisted of several articles which were contraband if going to the enemy, was held, by Sir William Scott, to have been captured while really on her way to a port of the enemy. He says: "I have had frequent occasion to observe that it is very difficult to detect a fraud of this species in the particular instances. Pretences and excuses are always resorted to, the fallacy of which can seldom be completely exposed; and therefore, without undertaking the task of exposing them in the particular case, the court has been induced (and I hope not unwarrantably) to hold generally in each case that the certain fact shall prevail over the dubious explanations." "I am satisfied, on the facts of this case, that it was the plan of this voyage to carry the ship fraudulently, under a false destination, into a Spanish port. The consequence will be, that this fraudulent conduct, on the part of those who are concerned in the ship, will justly subject her to confiscation. Anciently, the carrying of contraband did, in ordinary cases, affect the ship, and, although a relaxation has taken place, it is a relaxation, the benefit of which can only be claimed by fair cases. The aggravation of fraud justifies additional penalties." He then announces it as the settled rule of law, "that the carriage of contraband, with a false destination, will work a condemnation of the ship as well as the cargo." In that case the owner of the ship was not the owner of the cargo, but, being himself a neutral, had entered into a charter-party for a voyage of the vessel from one neutral port to another neutral port. In a note to the case, these very appropriate remarks are made: "The relaxation of the old rule has been directed, in its practical application, as well as in its origin, only to such cases as afford a presumption that the owner was innocent, or the master deceived. Where the owner is himself privy to the transaction, or where his agent interposes so actively in the fraud as to consent to give additional cover to it by sailing with false papers, all pretence of ignorance or innocence is precluded, and there seems to be no further ground, consistent with equity and good sense, upon which the relaxation in favour of the ship can any longer be supposed to exist." The same principles are laid down in the case of The Mercurius, 1 Ch. Rob. 288; The Edward, 4 Ch. Rob. 68; The Neutralitet, 3 Ch. Rob. 295. In the latter case, Sir William Scott says that, where a vessel is carrying contraband articles under a false destination or false papers, those circumstances of aggravation constitute excepted cases out of the modern rule, and continue them in the ancient one. In The Ranger, 6 Ch. Rob. 125, which was the case of an American vessel with a cargo which was documented for a neutral port, but was going to the enemy's port, and was condemned as contraband, Sir William Scott says: "I also condemn the vessel, as employed in carrying a cargo of sea stores to a place of naval equipment, under false papers. It is described, I perceive, as an American vessel. But, if the owner will place his property under the absolute management and control of persons who are capable of lending it, in this manner, to be made an instrument of fraud in the hands of the enemy, he must sustain the consequence of such misconduct on the part of his agent." In the Oster Risoer, 4 Ch. Rob. 199, Sir William Scott held, that a master could not be permitted to aver his ignorance of the contents of contraband packages on board of his vessel; that he was bound, in time of war, to know the contents of his cargo; and that, if a different rule could be sustained, it might be applied to excuse the carrying of all contraband. One important circumstance, to show that the cargo of the Stephen Hart was intended for the enemy, is the fact that a part of it consisted of 30,000 buttons, marked with the initials "C. S. A.," which it is well understood stand for the words "Confederate States of America," or "Confederate States Army," the buttons being such as are used in army clothing for the three services of an army. This review of the facts in this case leads to the conclusion that the vessel and her cargo must both of them be condemned. No doubt is left upon the mind that the case is one of a manifest attempt to introduce contraband goods into the enemy's territory by a breach of blockade, for which the vessel must be held liable to forfeiture, as well as her cargo. Chadwick was evidently employed by reason of his being a citizen of the United States, familiar with the enemy's country, and qualified to conduct the vessel into one of the blockaded ports. The vessel was captured in a position convenient for running the blockade. The cargo consisted of arms, munitions of war and military equipments, and, among them, a large quantity of military buttons, stamped in such a manner as to render them capable of no appropriate use save for the infantry, cavalry and artillery of the enemy's army, thus showing that the enemy's country was their only appropriate destination. The absence of the manifest and bills of lading is not satisfactorily accounted for, and the want of any invoices and of any charter-party is a circumstance of great weight against the lawfulness of the commerce. The attempt, by the master, to suppress his letter of instructions and the letter to Helm, the agent of the enemy in Cuba, and the attempt of the mate to conceal the letters which show that the design was, that the Stephen Hart should, under his guidance, enter a blockaded port of the enemy, and which also contain specific directions for entering the harbour of Charleston, justify the conclusion that Charleston, or some other port of the enemy, was the real destination of the vessel and her cargo. The absence of any charter-party, and of any instructions from Harris to Captain Dyett, and the entire surrender by Harris of the control of the vessel to the loaders of the cargo, and to the master as their agent, involve the vessel in all the guilt which attaches to the cargo. The object of carrying the flag of the enemy could only have been that it might be used for the purpose of entering the enemy's ports—a conclusion strengthened by the fact that it was thrown overboard at the time of the capture. The charts found on board are charts of such a character as to enable a vessel to enter any of the blockaded ports. The letter concealed by the mate, which contains directions for entering the harbour of Charleston, is one which he had a motive to preserve by concealing and not to destroy, because, upon the regular papers of the vessel, he must have indulged the hope that she would have been permitted, after a search, to proceed upon the voyage indicated by her papers, and thus, that the letter in question would afterwards become useful on a further voyage to the port of the enemy. There is an absence of all papers and circumstances which warrant the conclusion that there was any intent to dispose of the cargo at Cardenas in the usual way of lawful commerce. The consignee of the entire cargo was the agent of the enemy, and the cargo was laden on board by the agent of the enemy in London. The asserted ignorance of the master, as to the contents of his cargo, and as to the fact that arms are contraband of war, and the ambiguous destination set out in the shipping articles, are circumstances which, with many others, go to swell the volume of suspicion attaching to the enterprise. In addition to all this, there is the positive evidence which has been referred to, particularly of Chadwick and Nellman, as to the actual destination of the cargo. All the material facts of the case, which lead to a condemnation, are proved without any resort to the re-examinations either of Leisk or of Chadwick. This is not a case for further proof, and no application has been made on the part of the claimants to supply any further proof as to any point. There must, therefore, be a decree condemning both the vessel and her cargo.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by JAMES PATTERSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, June 30, 1864.

(Present—The Right Hon. Lord KINGSDOWN, Sir E. RYAN and Sir J. T. COLEBRIDGE.)

BLACK v. ROSE.

Ship—Charter-party—Delivery of cargo—Freight—Lien of master.

By charter-party R., the master of a ship, undertook to load and take a cargo to Galle, at so much per bag, the cargo to be taken alongside, and to be taken from the ship's tackle at the port of discharge free of risk and expense to the ship:

Held, that the master was bound to deliver, and the merchant to receive, at the ship's side, and the master was entitled to be paid freight each day for the quantity delivered; for his lien would be given up on delivery of each bag.

This was an appeal from two judgments of the Supreme Court of Ceylon.

The first action was brought by the app. against the resp. for not delivering a portion of a cargo of rice pursuant to charter-party. The libel alleged that the deft., master of the ship Alpine, received from the plt.'s agent at Calcutta a cargo of rice, to be delivered at Colombo, and that deft. delivered part only, and refused to deliver the whole, though plt. was ready and willing to pay the freight.

The charter-party was as follows:

Galle, 16th April 1861.

It is this day mutually agreed between John Black, of Galle, and James Rose, master of the A 1 ship Alpine, of 1164 tons register, that the said vessel being tight, staunch, strong, and in every way fitted for the voyage, shall, after the discharge of her cargo of salt in Calcutta, load there, from charterers' agents, a full and complete cargo of rice, not to exceed thirteen thousand bags, and the balance to complete her loading to be of light freight, and being so loaded, shall sail and proceed to Colombo for instructions as to whether the said cargo shall be delivered in that port or in Point de Galle, or part in Colombo and part in Galle, freight to be paid at and after the rate of one rupee and four annas per bag of rice of two maunds, and light freight at 2l. 12s. per ton, as per Calcutta scale of tonnage on the quantity safely delivered; twelve working days for loading in Calcutta, and fifteen working days for discharging at Galle or Colombo, including both ports, but exclusive of time occupied in changing ports, to commence from the time the master gives notice that he is ready to load and discharge cargo, or demurrage to be paid at the rate of 30s. sterling per day for every day over and above the said working days, the cargo to be taken alongside, and to be taken from the ship's tackle at the port of discharge, free of risk and expense to the ship. Five per cent. commission on the gross amount of freight laden in the vessel to be paid to Messrs. Jardine, Skinner and Co., Calcutta, on account of John Black. The act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all other dangers of seas, rivers and navigation excepted. Penalty for non-performance of this charter-party, estimated amount of freight.

JOHN BLACK.
JAMES ROSE.

Witness, J. W. Morel.

The deft. pleaded:—1. That he was always ready and willing to deliver the remaining portion of the said cargo, the plt. paying freight on the quantity safely delivered and taking it alongside the ship, according to the charter-party, and the deft. tendered the cargo to the plt. and requested him to remove it, paying freight for the same; but the plt. refused to pay freight. 2. That the deft. had a lien on the cargo for the freight then due.

BLACK v. ROSE.

[PRIV. Co.]

3. That the alleged deposit in the hands of the collector of customs was insufficient, and was no payment or tender to the deft.

The plt. replied:—1. That he was always ready and willing to receive the cargo and pay freight for the same, but the deft. would not deliver it. 2. That the deft. had no right to detain the cargo to the prejudice of the plt., he being ready to pay freight, which was secured in the hands of the collector with the deft.'s knowledge and consent, to be paid over to him after the due landing of the cargo into the Queen's warehouse. 3. That the deposit made in the hands of the collector was sufficient to answer the claim for freight.

The evidence was in substance as follows:—The deft. stated that he arrived at Galle on the 2nd Sept. 1861, and thereupon caused a letter to be sent to the plt., stating that the freight must be paid according to the quantities delivered at the ship's side, and received an answer from the plt. to the effect that freight would be paid on due delivery of the cargo into the Custom-house; that plt. refused to pay freight alongside the ship; and afterwards the deft. proceeded to deliver the cargo without being so paid, and proposed that the money should be lodged with the collector of customs; that deft. afterwards learned it had been so deposited, but (as he alleged) under such restrictions that he could not touch it, and he thereupon required the freight to be delivered on the quantities delivered safely to the plt.'s agents on board; that the plt. replied to the effect that the custom at Galle, and every other British port, was to take delivery of cargo when landed, and that the charter-party, as usual, only provided that the boats should be sent at the plt.'s expense, and that, if more agreeable to the deft., he was ready to pay freight on each day's landing, as delivery was taken at the Custom-house, and would send a man on board to see the bags carefully placed in the boat, and to give a receipt for them; that the deft. consented to receive freight on the quantity of cargo delivered daily, instead of demanding freight on each parcel delivered, and began to discharge the cargo on such terms, the payment being made on shore at the close of each day; but on the fifth day of unloading there was no one at plt.'s office to pay the freight, and the deft. did not receive it until the middle of the next day; that he thereupon refused to deliver any more of the cargo unless the plt. paid freight on receipt of the cargo at the ship's side; that the plt. thereupon informed the deft. that freight would be paid according to the custom of the port, on due delivery of the entire balance of cargo, for which the deft. could hold a lien until the claim for freight was satisfied, unless he continued to receive freight on daily landings; that the deft. refused to deliver any more of the cargo except on the terms of payment of freight on receipt of cargo at the ship's side; that the plt. proposed again to pay, and did in fact pay the freight into the hands of the collector of customs, to be held by him until the cargo should have been delivered at Her Majesty's warehouse in the port of Galle, and informed the deft. thereof, and that freight would be duly paid by the said collector on the quantity of cargo delivered as per charter-party, and that no stop would be put on the freight so deposited; that the deft. then stated to the plt. that he had been informed by the collector that the freight had been forwarded by him to the Treasury, and that the payment thereof to the deft. could not be immediate, to which the plt. replied that the amount had been forwarded to the Treasury, not by his instructions, but according to the rules in the customs, for safe keeping, and there would be no delay in the deft. receiving immediate payment after the delivery of the cargo; that the plt. authorised the collector to pay the full amount of freight due to the deft. on balance of the cargo immediately after delivery of the same, but the deft. refused to deliver any other portion of the cargo unless the freight was paid on receipt of the cargo at the ship's side. The plt. stated that he had, before the refusal by the deft. to deliver the rice, resold it to native merchants, and that he had chartered a great many vessels since he had been trading at Galle, and had never before paid freight at the ship's side.

Evidence was given to the effect that freight was never paid for each boat load at the ship's side, but in the lump, on delivery of the whole cargo.

The judge of the district court dismissed the plt.'s claim, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed the judgment.

A cross-action was brought for demurrage, and the judgment was given for the resps.

In both cases the following judgment was delivered by CREASY, C.J.—These were cross-actions between a shipowner and a merchant, and the main point in dispute was, whether the shipowner was entitled to require payment of freight as the goods were delivered into the merchant's boats over the ship's side, or whether he was bound to deliver the whole cargo into the boats, and wait till it was brought on shore before he had his freight. The merchant had by a charter-party dated 16th April 1861, chartered the ship to fetch a cargo of rice from Calcutta to Colombo, to be unladen there or at Galle, wholly, or in part at such place according to instructions. The dispute arose about the part which (as was agreed) the ship was to deliver at Galle. The parts of the charter-party material for the decision of these cases are as follows: "Freight to be paid at and after the rate of one rupee and four annas per bag of rice of two maunds, and light freight at two pounds and ten shillings per ton, as per Calcutta scale of tonnage on the quantity safely delivered. Twelve working days for loading in Calcutta, and fifteen working days for discharging at Galle or Colombo, including both places, but exclusive of time occupied in changing ports, to commence from the time the master gives notice that he is ready to receive and discharge cargo, or demurrage to be paid at the rate of twenty pounds sterling per day for every day over and above the said working days. The cargo to be taken alongside, and to be taken from the ship's tackle at the port of discharge free of risk and expense to the ship." The ship proceeded to Calcutta and took in her cargo. The master drew and sent bills of lading to the merchant, which the merchant received, and which stated that freight was to be as per charter-party, but which contained the following stipulation as to the delivery of the cargo: "To be taken from the ship's tackle at the risk and expense of the consignees and a receipt to be granted on board." The ship delivered part of her cargo at Colombo, and then proceeded to Galle, by instruction to deliver the residue. Various quarrels took place between the parties, into which it is unnecessary to enter; but at last, after some cargo had been delivered, the master required the merchant to pay daily the freight for the amount of cargo delivered each day over the ship's side into the merchant's boats, and refused to deliver more cargo on the merchant's refusing to pay on delivery as required. The question is, was the master justified in such requirement and refusal? and we think that he was. As a general principle, when there is no express stipulation as to the time and manner of payment of freight, the master is not bound to part with the goods until his freight is paid. This is expressly laid down in Abbott on Shipping, the highest authority on the subject, and the same doctrine is laid down in perhaps the next highest authority, Ken

Commentaries, vol. iii. p. 293. It was urged on behalf of the merchant in this case, that where the time and mode of paying freight are left uncertain by the contract, the custom of the port of delivery is to prevail; and some evidence, though very feeble, was given, that it is not usual at Galle to pay freight till the whole cargo is brought on shore. Smith's Mercantile Law was cited on this point. His words are: "The manner of delivering up the goods, and consequently the period at which the master ceases to be responsible for them, depends, in the absence of agreement, on the custom of the place." Mr. Smith cites a case from Espinasse which by no means bears out his text; but even if it did, that text has no application here. In this case the charter-party provides that "the cargo is to be taken alongside, and to be taken from the ship's tackle at the port of discharge free of risk and expense to the ship," and the bills of lading provide that "the cargo is to be taken from the ship's tackle at the risk and expense of the consignee, and a receipt to be granted on board." It is further in evidence, that an agent of the merchant was on board of the vessel during the days on which delivery went on, and that he gave receipts, though the form of those receipts does not appear on the face of the proceedings before us. We think it clear that in this case it was intended that the master should deliver, and the merchant receive, at the ship's side; that on such delivery and receipt the master ceased to be responsible for the goods, and also ceased to have any lien on the goods. It is clear on all authority and common sense that he had a right to be paid before he gave up his lien. It has been said on the other side, that it was impossible for the merchant to examine the condition and weight of the bags of rice as they came out of the ship. No evidence was given of this. The contrary would appear to have been the case, from the fact of the merchant having for several days before the quarrel sent his agent on board to superintend the delivery and acceptance of the cargo from the ship into the boats. And even if there had been any difficulty of the kind, it was one which the merchant brought upon himself by the mode in which he contracted. As we hold that the merchant's refusal to pay freight on delivery was wrongful, we must hold that his omission to unload and receive the cargo on the proper terms was wrongful also, and that the part of the judgment which fixes him with demurrage is correct. Objection has been made to that part of the judgment which gives interest on the demurrage, and it is urged that demurrage is in the nature of damages, so that interest is not to be given on it. We think that this objection is well founded. The verdict in the case of Rose v. Black is therefore to be reduced by the disallowing interest on the demurrage. In other respects the judgments of the district court in both cases are affirmed.

Macnamara (with him Denman, Q. C.), for the app., contended that the judgment was against the true construction and against evidence. It could never have been intended by the charter-party that the rice should be weighed on board ship, for such a course would be inconvenient and impracticable. It must have been intended that the cargo should be taken from the ship at the risk and expense of the app., but that the owner should be allowed a convenient time to ascertain the quantity before payment. The custom of the port was in favour of this construction. The master's lien might have been preserved by landing and warehousing the goods till the lien was satisfied.

Mellish, Q. C. and Brown, for the resp., were not heard.

Sir J. COLERIDGE.—This case has been extremely well argued, and almost everything that could have been said in favour of the app. has been brought before us by Mr. Macnamara. But after all this has been heard, including the evidence as to the custom of the port, it certainly is not difficult to come to a conclusion. Their Lordships are of opinion that the judgment of the C. J. was founded on the right ground—the construction of the contract between the parties. The view taken by the C. J. was, that as the goods were to be discharged at the ship's side, their delivery was to entitle the master to his freight, and to take from him his lien. In that view we concur. This being so, in both cases we must affirm the decision of the Supreme Court.

Judgment affirmed.

Where, therefore, the lights of a brig were placed in-board and not on the outside, and only six feet above deck:

Held (reversing the decree of the Admiralty Court), that the lights were not improperly placed, having regard to the size of the brig.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Admiralty in a cause of damage, promoted by the owners of the brig or vessel the Thomas Snook against the owners of the ship City of Carlisle.

The cause arose out of a collision which occurred between the two vessels on the 30th June 1862, off Hastings.

The collision happened at about 1.45 a.m. of the said 30th June, the City of Carlisle making about 5½ knots an hour, the wind being from the west, and the weather thick and dark with fine drizzling rain.

The City of Carlisle had her proper Admiralty regulation lights burning, and a good and proper look-out was kept on board her.

The Thomas Snook had no light whatever visible to those on board the City of Carlisle, and when seen bore about two points on the starboard bow of the City of Carlisle, and distant about a cable's length only, and rapidly approaching.

On account of the close proximity of the Thomas Snook, it was found to be impossible for the City of Carlisle to avoid her, the port bow of the Thomas Snook coming in contact with the starboard bow of the City of Carlisle, and the Thomas Snook shortly afterwards sank.

The present apps. brought an action in the court below against the City of Carlisle and her freight, to recover for the loss of the Thomas Snook and her cargo.

The cause was heard on the 20th July 1863, when the learned judge of the court below was assisted by Capt. William Elisha Farrer and Capt. Mark Currie Close, two of the elder brethren of the Trinity Corporation. The learned judge of the court below came to the conclusion that the Thomas Snook had not complied with the Admiralty regulations of the 1st Oct. 1858 with respect to sailing lights, and that such non-compliance contributed to the collision.

and he pronounced against the damage proceeded for, and dismissed the resp. and their bill from the suit, but made no order as to costs.

The following observations were addressed to the Trinity Masters by

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Gentlemen,—If you please, in the consideration of this case, we will throw away all that which is immaterial to the issue on which the case is put. We will assume, if you please, that the lights of the Thomas Scock were burning, and were burning well. We will assume that, if a proper look-out had been kept on board the City of Carlisle, they would have seen these lights, provided they were properly placed, and burning. We will assume these two matters, and the single question for your consideration will be, whether these lights were properly placed in compliance with the directions which are given in the Admiralty Regulations. Now, beyond all doubt the burden of proof is upon those who allege that they carried the lights. There is no doubt about it in law, nor is there a doubt about it in common sense, because of course those who are on board the vessel herself must be able to give the best evidence of what was the state of things on board that vessel, and those who never saw the vessel at all until they came into collision with her can only say that they did not see the lights. The burden of proof is thus upon those who allege the affirmative that the brig had at the time her lights properly fixed and brightly burning. Our sole consideration is, were they properly fixed? This averment is denied on the part of the City of Carlisle. With respect to the evidence as to how they were fixed, it is principally to be found in the evidence of the carpenter, a person of the name of Morcombe. Now with respect to the regulations themselves, I must draw your attention particularly to them. "All sea-going sailing vessels, when under way or being towed, shall, between sunset and sunrise, exhibit a green light on the starboard side and a red light on the port side of the vessel." Now my understanding of these directions is, not that there is any positive order that the lights shall be fixed on the actual sides of the ship itself, but that the green light shall be exhibited on the right hand and the red light on the left hand, so as to be visible, as the regulation goes on to prescribe: "And such lights shall be so constructed as to be visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere, at a distance of at least two miles, and shall show an uniform and unbroken light over an arc of the horizon of ten points of the compass, from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard and on the port sides respectively." Then follow further directions: "The coloured lights shall be fixed, whenever it is practicable, so as to exhibit them;" and "when the coloured lights cannot be fixed," then other things are to be done. Now it is not pretended on the present occasion that the state of the weather was such as to render it impracticable to fix the lights as directed by these regulations, but it is contended that they were so fixed. What, then, is the substance of these directions? It is that the lights shall be visible, fairly visible, as described; there is no order that the lights shall be fixed in any peculiar manner, or in any particular part of the ship. And the whole question for you is this—whether, taking the description of the manner in which those lights were fixed, collecting it from the evidence as far as you possibly can, you can come to the conclusion that they were so fixed as to be fairly visible. As far as I have any knowledge of the matter, lights are in some ships fixed in one way, and in other ships they are fixed in another way; but what the regulation requires is, that they shall be fairly visible. It would be useless for me to read the evidence, you are much better judges of the effect of it than I am, because you know from experience whether the statements given by the witnesses are such as to prove to your satisfaction that the lights were so carried as to be fairly visible according to the purpose of the regulation. I need hardly tell you that if the lights were not fixed in compliance, in fair compliance, with the regulation, and the collision was thereby in part occasioned, then the statute says that the owner of the ship so in default cannot recover. We will now go into the next room.

ON RETURNING,

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—The gentlemen who assist me are of opinion that the lights of the brig were not so fixed as to be fairly visible. That being so, there was a breach of the Admiralty regulation, and I am of opinion that the owners of the Thomas Scock cannot recover in this suit. I do not, however, give costs, because we consider the City of Carlisle was much to blame.

Dr. DANA.—Then the court considers that the position of the lights contributed to the collision.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Yes; but I do not give costs, because the City of Carlisle was grossly negligent. They had only one look-out, when they ought to have had two.

The Thomas Scock appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

The Queen's Advocate (Phillimore) and Dr. Dana, for the appa., contended that the lights of the brig were fairly visible, and their position did not lead to the collision, nor was any negligence attributable to her.

Brett, Q.C. and Clarkson, for the resp. the City of Carlisle, contended that the Thomas Scock had not complied with the Admiralty regulation as to sailing lights; that therefore a presumption arose that she had caused or contributed to the collision.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord KNOXDOWN.—In this case, at about a quarter before two o'clock on the morning of the 30th June 1862, the brig Thomas Scock, the property of the appa., was run into and sunk by the barque City of Carlisle, the property of the resp. The evidence in the cause established that the Admiralty regulation lights of the brig were burning brightly. The question on the appeal is, whether the lights were fixed in a place which complied with the regulations; or, to use the words of the learned judge of the Admiralty Court, whether they were "so fixed as to be fairly visible." The gentlemen who assisted the judge of the Admiralty Court were of opinion that they were not so fixed, and in consequence the court determined that the owners of the brig could not recover; but, as they were also of opinion that the City of Carlisle was grossly negligent and much to blame, no costs were given to the resp. The learned judge of the Admiralty Court in his judgment in the court below, stated his understanding of the regulations to be, not that there is any positive order that the lights shall be fixed on the actual sides of the ship itself, but that the green light shall be exhibited on the right hand and the red light on the left hand, so as to be visible." He also stated that the substance of the regulation is, "that the lights shall be fairly visible as described. There is no order that the lights shall be fixed in any peculiar manner, or in any particular part of the ship." And the whole question is whether, taking the description of the manner in which these lights in the present case were fixed they were so fixed as to be fairly visible. With these observations their Lordships concur entirely

They have, in consequence, carefully examined the evidence for the purpose of arriving at the means of giving a correct answer to the question so put. There is no dispute about the place where the lights were fixed. There was on the deck of the brig, just behind the foremast and nearly touching it, a galley, the length of which was about six or seven feet. It was about six feet high, and about seven feet broad. The lights were placed on the top of this galley, about six inches from the outer edge of it, and about three feet behind the foremast. At the time when the collision took place the brig was close hauled on the starboard tack, heading south south-west, and proceeding at the rate of $5\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour, with the wind in the west blowing a fresh breeze. The City of Carlisle was close hauled on the port tack, heading about north north-west, and making about $5\frac{1}{2}$ knots an hour. The vessels were therefore approaching at the rate of eleven knots an hour. The City of Carlisle struck the brig just before the fore-rigging on the port side, cutting right into her, when she filled rapidly, and went down with the master, steward and one of the crew, the mate and eight of the crew having just time to save their lives by getting on board the barque, who thereupon returned to London for repairs, and afterwards proceeding on her voyage to Bombay. There is no question but that it was the duty of the City of Carlisle, who was on the port tack, to give way, and if therefore the lights of the brig were properly placed so as to be fairly visible, the collision must be attributed solely to the negligence of the barque. The objections made by the resps. to the place where the lights were placed on board the brig resolve themselves principally into this, that they were placed on board, and not on the outside of the vessel, and that by reason thereof they were not, as the resps. contend, fairly visible. The breadth of the brig at this spot is not very accurately ascertained, it was not measured. Morecombe, the carpenter, supposes it to have been about 26 feet. Of the other witnesses Richard Swift, the mate, supposes it to have been 18 or 20 feet; Matson supposes it to have been from 18 to 21 feet. Their Lordships are informed by the nautical gentlemen who assist them, that having regard to the size of the brig, which was 249 tons, it is probable the breadth of the brig at this spot where the lights are fixed did not exceed 20 feet. If this be so, the distance from each light to the side of the vessel was about seven feet. The lights were properly secured, so that only one light could be seen at the same time, unless by a vessel exactly ahead. The foresail was set, and was just in front of these lights. The dimensions of the foresail are given by Isemonger, who made it; it was 17 feet 4 inches deep, 34 feet across the head, and 34 feet across the foot, and 19 feet 4 inches depth of leach. The foot of the foresail was about $11\frac{1}{2}$ feet or 12 feet above the deck, from the clew of the foresail to the deck was about 9 feet or $9\frac{1}{2}$ feet. The brig had two foresails, but their Lordships consider it to be proved that the foresail, the dimensions of which are given by Isemonger, was the foresail set at the time of collision. It was made to be used in going out of the Channel, and Isemonger saw it bent on the day before the vessel went out of dock on her last voyage. If this be correct, it establishes that the sail could not have interfered materially with the lights, which were only 6 feet above the decks, while the foot of the sail was from $11\frac{1}{2}$ to 12 feet above the deck, and therefore from $5\frac{1}{2}$ to 6 feet above the lights. The only material additional circumstance to be noticed is, that the brig was lying over on the port side, about three strakes from an even keel, and the height of the bulwarks above the deck were from three feet to four feet.

In this state of circumstances, the nautical gentlemen who assist their Lordships are of opinion that, the position in which the lights were placed was a fit and proper place for them, having regard to the size of the vessel. They are also of opinion, having regard to the fact that the vessel was lying over considerably on the port side, that if the lights had been fixed in the usual place, that is, on the top of the bulwarks, the red light on the port side would have been obscured by the spray, and would have been less fairly visible than on the top of the galley; and that if a proper look-out had been kept on board the barque, the red light would have been seen in sufficient time to avoid a collision. Their Lordships concur in the opinion expressed by the learned Judge of the Admiralty Court, that there was gross negligence on the part of the City of Carlisle. The persons on board that vessel were engaged in furling the foretop-gallant-sail; there was but one man on the look-out, and little attention seems to have been paid to anything except what the men aloft were engaged in. The brig seems to have been seen and reported simultaneously from aloft and by the man on the look-out, but not in sufficient time to avoid the collision. Their Lordships, after reading the evidence and considering the matter with the nautical gentlemen who assist them, have come to the conclusion that the lights were not improperly placed, having regard to the size of the brig; that they were placed in a position in which they were fairly visible, and in fair compliance with the regulation. Their Lordships are of opinion that, if a proper look-out had been kept on board the City of Carlisle the collision would have been avoided, and that that vessel was the sole cause of the collision. Their Lordships will, therefore, humbly advise Her Majesty that the decision of the Court of Admiralty be reversed, and that the resps. be condemned in damages and costs.

Decree reversed.

Ship—Collision—Commission to clear the mouths of of Danube—Regulations as to navigation—Negligence—Steamers in rivers.

The Treaty of Paris 1856, after putting the Danube as regards navigation on the same footing as other great European rivers were put by the Congress of Vienna, empowered a European commission, consisting of delegates from each country, to execute works below Isatcha, to clear the mouths of the Danube, and levy tolls to pay the expenses of making and keeping the river clear. This commission was expected to cease in two years, when a permanent riverain commission was to regulate the navigation of the river:

Held, the European commission had no power to issue provisional regulations as to the navigation of steamers in the river:

Held, further, that such regulations were not valid merely because Turkey was one of the powers represented, and the river traversed the state of Turkey.

Where a steamer ascends a river with a strong current, common prudence requires that she should place herself out of the strength of the current, so as to allow full swing to the descending vessels.

This was an appeal from a decision of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, affirming a judgment of the Consular Court at Galatz, in a suit by the apps. the Imperial Royal Privileged D^r bian Steam Navigation Company, against the resps. the Greek and Oriental Steam Navigation Company, to recover damage for a collision between the steamers Mars and Smyrna, their respective properties.

The plts. put in evidence, subject to objection by the defts., certain regulations, dated the 27th June 1860, made by the European Commission of the Danube, appointed under the 16th article of the Treaty of Paris of 1856, but not by the Riverain Commission, which, by the 17th article of the treaty, is empowered to make regulations for the navigation of the Danube.

The European Commission consisted of commissioners from Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia and Turkey (but Bavaria, Wurtemberg and the Danubian Principalities were not represented on that commission); and, according to the provisions of the Treaty of Paris, the Riverain Commission, which was to be a permanent body, should consist of the delegates of Austria, Bavaria, Turkey and Wurtemberg, together with commissioners from the three Danubian Principalities approved of by the Porte.

The plts. further proved that the foregoing regulations of the 27th June 1860 were published at Sulina on the 24th Aug. 1860, but no evidence was given of any publication at the other places mentioned in the 44th article of the Treaty of Paris.

It was proved that at the time of the collision the master and pilot of the Smyrna were not aware of the so-called regulations of the European Commission; and it was further proved that such regulations were not generally known to the Danube pilots.

The defts. put in evidence the Treaty of Paris of 1856.

The Consular Court, on the 30th Sept. 1861, decided in favour of the defts., the Smyrna, giving credit to her statements, and holding that the regulations of the European Commission were ultra vires, and not binding.

The Supreme Consular Court, on appeal, affirmed the judgment on the same grounds, and adding the further ground that even if the regulations of the European Commission were valid, yet they had not been duly published. The Mars appealed from that judgment.

The Attorney-General (Palmer), Bovill, Q.C., and Archibald, for the apps., contended that at the time of the collision the regulations laid down by the European Commission were binding on all persons navigating the Danube, and by the 7th regulation the resps. were to blame; moreover, they were, independently of those regulations, guilty of negligence.

Lush, Q.C. and Honyman, for the resps., contended that the commission had not power to make the regulations in question, nor were the regulations properly published; and even if they were binding there was no negligence in the resps.

Cur. adv. vult.

LORD CRANWORTH.—Both the parties in this appeal were owners of steam-vessels navigating the Danube. The name of apps.' vessel was the Mars; that of the resps. the Smyrna. On the 6th Nov. 1860 the Mars was coming empty, or nearly empty, down the river, and the Smyrna was ascending it with a cargo, besides two vessels which she had in tow, one an English brig lashed to her port side, the other an Austrian vessel towed astern. At about twelve miles above the Sulina mouth of the Danube the river in its descent makes a sudden bend or sweep to the right, at nearly a right angle; concave, therefore, on the left, or, as it is designated, the Russian side of the river, and convex on the right or Turkish side. The reach for some miles above this bend is called the Tavola di Ciamburla, that below it the Tavola di Greco. On the 6th Nov. 1860, at about half-past six p.m., it being then calm and moonlight, the Mars descending the river and the Smyrna ascending it, came into violent collision close to the Turkish side in the Tavola di Greco, a little below the point where the river makes its bend. The result was very disastrous. The Mars was nearly cut in two by the stem of the Smyrna, and she almost immediately sank. On the 23rd Jan. 1861 the apps. presented their petition to the Consular Court at Galatz, alleging that their vessel had been destroyed owing to the fault of the Smyrna, and praying the court to condemn the owner of the Smyrna to pay them a large sum, exceeding 42,000 Austrian ducats, by way of compensation for the loss they had sustained. The admission of this petition was opposed by the resps.; but, on hearing arguments on behalf of each party, the Consular Court admitted the petitions, and on the 17th Sept. 1861 declared that the issue to be tried was, whether the collision was caused by the fault or neglect of the Smyrna, and to this issue the parties agreed. The court then immediately proceeded to the trial of this issue, which lasted many days, and on the 30th Sept. 1861 the Court pronounced its judgment in favour of the resps., "being of opinion and deciding that the collision between the steamers Smyrna and Mars was not caused by the fault or negligence of the Smyrna." At the trial the captains and many of the crews of both vessels were examined, as well as several pilots and other persons who were considered qualified to throw light on the subject, and much documentary evidence, including, among other things, the General Treaty of Peace signed at Paris on the 30th March 1856, and also certain provisional regulations for the navigation of the Danube between Isatcha and Sulina, made by a commission appointed under the provisions of that treaty of peace, for clearing the mouth of the Danube from sand and other impediments. The Consular Court refused to attribute any binding force to these regulations, and gave its judgment on the merits of the case as if no such regulations had ever been made. The apps. were dissatisfied with this decision, and appealed from it to the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople, where the case was argued by the learned counsel on both sides. The appeal failed; the Supreme Consular Court having concurred with the court at Galatz, both as to the invalidity of the new regulations and as to the merits of the case. From the latter decision the owners of the Mars appealed to Her Majesty, and the appeal was heard at great length before the Judicial Committee on the 23rd and 24th June last, and their Lordships are now prepared to state the conclusions at which they have arrived. The first point to be considered is, whether the apps. are right in their contention as to the effect of the regulation made on the 27th June 1860 as to the navigation of the Danube between Isatcha and Sulina. They contend that under the General Treaty of Peace of 1856 these regulations had the binding force of law on all vessels navigating this part of the Danube. Whether they are warranted in so contending depends on the effect of the 15th and following articles of the treaty of peace. The 15th article begins by putting the Danube with respect to the rights of persons using it for purposes of navigation, in the same category as the rivers in which the other great European rivers separate or traversing different states were placed by the Congress of Vienna. And then, it provides that navigation shall be subject to no impediment or charge not thereafter provided for, and that the regulations of police and quarantine to be established for the safety of the states separated or traversed by that river, shall be so framed as to facilitate the passage of vessels. The general objects of the treaty of peace having been thus laid down, the 16th article provides that a commission, in which Great Britain, Austria, France, Prussia, Russia, Sardinia and Turkey, should each be represented by one delegate, should be charged to designate and cause to be executed below Isatcha the works necessary to clear the mouths of the Danube, as well as the neighbouring parts of the sea, from sands and other impediments; and power was given to them to establish fixed duties to be levied in order to cover the expenses of the works as well as of the establishment intended to secure and facilitate the navigation at the mouths of the Danube. This commission, called in the treaty the European Commission, was to be temporary, the object being that it should endure only so long as the works with the execution of which it was charged were in progress; but the 17th article provides for the establishment of another commission, called the River or Riverain Commission, which was to be permanent, its duties being, first, to prepare regulations of navigation and river police; secondly, to remove all impediments which prevented the application to the Danube of the arrangements of the Treaty of Vienna; thirdly, to order and execute all necessary works through the whole course of the river; and fourthly, after the dissolution of the European commission, to see to the maintaining of the mouths of the Danube in a navigable state. The commissioners, who were to constitute this permanent commission, were to consist of delegates, not like the European Commission, from the great European powers, but from the states traversed by or bordering on the river along its whole line. Austria, Turkey, Bavaria and Wurtemberg were each to send one delegate, and there were to be commissioners from the three Danubian Principalities, to be approved, however, by the Porte. The 18th article, after stating that it was understood that in two years the European Commission would have completed its task, and the River Commission would have finished its duties under the first and second heads mentioned in the 17th article, proceeds to declare that the parties to the treaty would, after having been informed of that fact, pronounce the dissolution of the European Commission, from which time the permanent River Commission should enjoy the same powers with which the European Commission had been, up to that time, invested. It may be collected from the evidence that the European Commission was duly constituted; but there is nothing to show what works it executed under the powers conferred on it by article 16 of the treaty. On the 27th June 1860 the European Commission issued a document entitled, according to the English translation of it published afterwards in the London Gazette of the 10th May 1861, "Provisional Regulations for the Police of the Navigation on the Lower Danube between Isatcha and Sulina," in which part of the river it may be observed both the Tavola di Ciamburla and the Tavola di Greco are situated. These regulations were forty-five in number, and the seventh is in these words:—"Article 7th. When two steam-vessels, or two sailing vessels, sailing with a favourable wind, meet whilst proceeding in different directions, the one ascending stream must steer towards the left bank, and the vessel descending towards the right bank. Any captain or master breaking these regulations will be absolutely responsible for all accidents which may result. He is bound besides to give the signals prescribed by articles 8 and 9 following." The apps. contend that this regulation was binding on the Smyrna; that in ascending the river she ought therefore to have kept on the left or Russian side of the river; that she did not do so, but, on the contrary, crossed over to the right or Turkish side; and so that the collision was wholly attributable to her neglect in not attending to the new regulation. The force of this argument depends on the question whether the European Commission had authority to make this regulation; and we are clearly of opinion that it had not. No functions were confided to that commission, except those of designating and causing to be executed the works below Isatcha necessary for clearing the mouths of the Danube and the neighbouring parts of the sea, and it is impossible to bring these provisional regulations within the scope of those functions. It was indeed argued that the mode in which vessels should navigate the river, where works were in progress, might be very important with reference to the due carrying on of those works, and that the commissioners must therefore, by necessary implication, be considered to have authority to prescribe such regulations as might assist them in the discharge of their proper duties. It is not necessary to consider how far this argument is sound, for there was no evidence as to any works being in progress to which the regulations promulgated would apply; and indeed, looking to the whole document, it was plainly intended to have reference to the general convenience of vessels navigating the Danube between the sea and Isatcha, and not to any special provisions rendered necessary by works then in progress. It is true that the regulations are described as "provisional," but that evidently had reference, not to any temporary circumstance connected with the clearing of the river's mouth, but to the fact that no such regulations had yet been made by the Riverain Commission. The European Commissioners probably felt that such a code as they promulgated would confer a great benefit on persons navigating the Danube. Whether this were so is a point on which we have no means of forming an opinion. All we can say is, that they certainly had no authority to issue such a code, and the regulations are therefore void. It was next contended that, even if the commissioners as a body had no power to make these regulations, yet that inasmuch as Turkey was represented in the commission, the regulation would have validity as emanating from the sovereign of the state traversed by the river. To this reasoning, however, we cannot accede. Turkey concurred with the other great European powers in naming commissioners by whose acts in performing certain defined duties she agreed to be bound, but it is impossible to hold that she is bound by the acts of her commissioner done beyond the scope of his commission. This is so clear that it becomes unnecessary to consider whether political relations subsisting between the Danubian Principalities and the Porte do not make it impossible for her, though enjoying a sort of suzerainty, to frame regulations for the navigation of the Danube without their consent. The necessity of such concurrence may perhaps be inferred from the express provision in the treaty of peace that no permanent regulations for navigation of the river can be promulgated without the concurrence of commissioners from the Principalities. We do not dispute the proposition, that such a code of navigation rules as was embraced in these regulations might, even though not emanating from any competent authority, by long usage or well-recognised practice, obtain the force of law. But there was certainly no usage or practice at the time when this collision occurred. On these grounds we are of opinion that this case must be decided on the laws and practice of navigation on the Danube as they existed before the publication of these regulations, and it is unnecessary for us to consider whether there had or had not been such a publication of them as was required in order to give them validity if there had been authority in the European Commission to make them. Looking then to the case, independently of the new regulations, and recollecting that the question is, whether the collision occurred through the fault or negligence of the Smyrna, the first question is, in what position ought she to have placed herself when she first became aware that she was meeting the descending steamer? The current at the part of the river between the two reaches is described on all hands as setting strongly towards the Russian or concave bend of the river, and not only the numerous pilots called by the resps., but also the English naval officer, Lieut. Crozier, who had been for two years on the Danube station, state it to be their opinion that a steamer ascending the stream at night, and being about to meet a steamer descending the river at the bend in question, ought to place herself on the right or Turkish side. The reason for this is obvious. The descending vessel will of course be moving with great velocity, and must also of necessity be carried, more or less, into the concave bend of the stream, where the current is much stronger than on the opposite or Turkish side. Prudence, therefore, must dictate what the great bulk of the evidence shows to have been the practice, namely, that in such circumstances the ascending vessel ought to place herself out of the strength of the current, in order to allow full swing to the descending vessel, which must necessarily be hurried along by its force. The naval officers whose assistance we had as assessors, informed us that, independently of any special regulations, this would obviously be the course which ought to be pursued. Indeed, they thought that no regulations for the general navigation could properly be so construed as to oblige an ascending vessel, at night, to prosecute her course on the left bank, at the bend of the river near which the collision occurred. Common prudence would require her to place herself out of the strength of the current. This brings us to consider what, in fact, was the position of the Smyrna at and immediately before the collision. On this point there is a conflict of evidence. The captain of the Mars deposed that this vessel was descending on the right or Turkish side of the river, and that the Smyrna was ascending the river on the left or Russian side, and that whilst the Mars was thus keeping the Turkish side, the Smyrna crossed over from the opposite side, and while she was across the stream, with her bows pointed towards the Turkish beach, ran into the Mars at full speed, striking her at the fore part of the port paddle-box. This was the account of the relative position of the vessels given by the master of the Mars; but the evidence of the master of the Smyrna was very different. He says that he was ascending the river on the Russian side, but that seeing across the land the Mars descending, being then about a mile and a half or two miles off, he, after consulting his pilot, crossed over to the Turkish side, and was proceeding up the stream in a line parallel to and distant about two ship's breadths from the bank, when he saw the Mars round the point close over on the Russian side; that she then crossed over to the Turkish side, and so came into a position in which the Smyrna unavoidably came into collision with her, catching her at the port paddle-box. If this latter account of the accident be the true one, it is impossible to say that the plt. has made out what, according to the issue on which both parties had agreed, he had undertaken to prove, namely, that the collision was caused by the fault or negligence of the Smyrna. She was, according to this evidence, steaming up on the side of the river on which the evidence satisfies us she ought at that point to have been when meeting a descending vessel. The question therefore is, which of these two accounts of the accident is entitled to credit? Two successive courts, after long and elaborate arguments, have decided in favour of the resps., the judge of one of these courts having had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses themselves. It would, therefore, be a strong thing to reverse such judgments on the facts of the case. It would be improper to do so unless it could very clearly be seen that a wrong result had been arrived at. So far, however, is this from being the case, that the weight of evidence seems to preponderate greatly in favour of the resps. The accounts which the resps.' witnesses gave as to the lights of the Mars which they saw from time to time, is in exact conformity with what they must have seen if their account of the collision is true. Hughes, the master, and Creak, the second officer of the Smyrna, both say that at the moment when the Mars rounded the point, they saw her mast-head light and her green light, that they then suddenly saw all three lights, the red, the green and the white, and in a few seconds shut in the green. This is exactly what would have happened if the Smyrna was, as these witnesses swear she was, ascending the river on the Turkish side; and if the Mars, descending at a rapid rate, swung round the point up to the concave bend on the Russian side, and from thence crossed over to the Turkish side. It may further be observed, that the evidence given by the captain of the Mars as to what he saw of the lights of the Smyrna is scarcely to be reconciled with the facts of the collision as put forward by the apps. He says, that before the collision they lost sight of the red light of the Smyrna. This could hardly have happened if the Smyrna had been, as the captain says she was, across the stream, with her bows pointed to the Turkish bank. But, on the other hand, if the Smyrna was ascending the river parallel and close to the Turkish bank, then it might well be that, just before the collision took place, the red light of the Smyrna would be shut out from the Mars. Their Lordships do not forget that the evidence of Abramovich, the pilot, and of Busdan the steersman of the Mars, on this point is a variance with that of the captain. They say that they continued to see all the three lights up to the moment of the collision. This discrepancy shows at all events, without imputing to the witnesses dishonesty, that they cannot be implicitly relied on for their accuracy. On one important point, at least, they are not agreed. And it is more probable that in the confusion and terror of the collision these two witnesses should have forgotten, or failed to observe, a change in the lights of the Smyrna than that the captain should have imagined that he discovered such a change if no such change occurred. The judge of the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople points out several discrepancies in the testimony of the witnesses called on behalf of the Mars. The captain says, and several of the crew confirm him, that he called out to the Smyrna to keep to his right ("Tenetevi alla dritta—alla dritta.") But one of the seamen, Haiduco, deposes that the words uttered by the captain were not "alla dritta," but "alla sinistra," and that he understood them to be addressed to the Smyrna by the way in which the captain waved his hand. There are other minor discrepancies pointed out in the judgment. Their Lordships, however, are not inclined to attach much weight to them. It is possible they may be the result of a want of truth in the witnesses. It is, at least, as possible that they may arise from imperfect observation and recollection of what took place at a moment of great peril and confusion. But what their Lordships have to consider is, whether the evidence adduced by the apps. is such as to establish what they were bound to make out, namely, that the collision was occa-

the fault or negligence of the Smyrna. It was incumbent on them to show that the testimony given on behalf of the owners of the Smyrna was more trustworthy than that given on behalf of the Jane. This they failed to do. It might have been the result if they had shown to their Lordships that the new regulations introduced by the European Commission in 1860 were the rules of navigation by which this case should be decided, it is unnecessary to say. Even naval gentlemen who assisted their Lordships were strongly inclined to think the course by which the Smyrna was the proper course. But, we have already given our opinion that those regulations had no binding force, their Lordships only look to the same arguments and positions on which the Consular Court at Constantinople and the Supreme Consular Court at Constantinople rested their judgments. With the conclusion at which those courts arrived their Lordships concur, and they must therefore advise Her Majesty that this appeal should be dismissed, with

THE GREAT EASTERN.

Collision—New sailing rules—Steamer meeting sailing vessel.

A steamer met the J. sailing vessel on the Atlantic night. The J. on first seeing the G. was two miles distant, and then ported her helm:

the conduct of J. being contrary to the 18th regulation, she was to blame for the collision, and she materially contributed:

Further, that the G. was also to blame for not keeping her speed in thick weather.

A steamer on meeting a sailing vessel is bound to slacken speed so as to make it possible, having regard to the force of the weather, to avert a collision.

There was an appeal from the High Court of Admiralty of England.

The respondents were the Great Ship Company (Limited), owners of the steamship Great Eastern.

The respondents were shipowners of Liverpool, the owners of the late British ship Jane.

The Court of Admiralty the respondents sued the appellants to recover damages for the loss of their ship, caused by a collision with the Great Eastern.

The collision took place about 2.15 a.m. of the night of the 1st. 1863, in the Atlantic Ocean, in latitude 41.11 N. longitude 14.11 W.

The Jane was a sailing ship, of 775 tons burthen, and at the time of the collision was bound from London in ballast for Quebec. She was sailing on the port tack.

The Great Eastern was on a voyage from New York to Liverpool with a general cargo and passengers.

She was going, according to her own log, at least 12½ knots an hour in thick weather, and did not observe the Jane until very close to the collision, and failed altogether to give light of the Jane which was towards her, and which, it was proved, was brightly burning.

On the circumstances it was contended on behalf of the respondents, plaintiffs in the court below, that the Great Eastern, whose duty it was by the 15th article of the new regulations to "keep out of the way," was to blame for the collision.

The respondents, the defendants in the court below, on the other hand contended that the Jane was to blame in not having kept her course as prescribed by the 18th article. The respondents, plaintiffs in the court below, gave evidence that the Jane did keep her course as long as it was reasonable and proper she should so do, and that her helm was only ported at last in order to avoid immediate danger, and especially to save life; and this question was, with the other questions, very clearly submitted by the learned judge in his summing up to the Trinity Masters.

The following were the regulations bearing on the case:

15. If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision, the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship.

18. Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article.

19. In obeying and construing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation; and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

The learned Judge, assisted by the Trinity Masters, found that the Great Eastern was solely to blame for the collision for going too fast, and not keeping a good look-out, and condemned her in damages.

Dr. LUSHINGTON (after adverting to other matters) made these observations as to the new rules:—Let us now see, with reference to these circumstances, how far the new sailing and steering rules apply, and as to the application of these rules to night navigation. I would observe, that the mere discovery of a strange light does not necessarily immediately bind a person in charge of a vessel to follow any particular rule, but as soon as he has opportunity of ascertaining by reasonable care and skill what the strange vessel is, and what course she is pursuing, then the rule which is applicable to the circumstances at once becomes binding upon him. Now, article 15 says: "If two ships, one of which is a sailing ship, and the other a steamship, are proceeding in such directions as to involve risk of collision"—that is to say, where there is a probability a collision would take place if both proceeded on their respective courses, then—"the steamship shall keep out of the way of the sailing ship;" she must keep out of the way, but may do so according to circumstances, either by porting or starboarding, all former regulations and rules being repealed. This article intimates, but does not define, the duty of the sailing ship, but the 18th article prescribes, "Where, by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article." The purpose of this article is obviously this, that as an obligation is imposed on one vessel, say vessel A, to keep out of the way, with liberty to carry out that obligation either by starboarding or porting, the other vessel, vessel B, is directed to keep on her course, so that she may not interfere with any course or measure taken by vessel A. That brings us directly to the consideration of the present case. The Jane sees the white bright light of the steamer, and she sees that bright light approaching. If you are of opinion, looking at the facts of the case, that she unnecessarily ported, and contributed therefore to the collision, you will hold the Jane to blame; but there is a great deal to be said before we arrive at that conclusion. There is a qualification here of great importance, "subject to the qualifications contained in the following article" (article 19): "In obeying and construing these rules, due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation." Now, when a steamer is approaching a sailing vessel on such a course as would involve the risk of collision sion, how long is the sailing vessel to keep quiet and do nothing to avoid it? That she ought not hastily and without strong reason to deviate from the direction of keeping her course, we shall all agree; but under what circumstances for the salvation of life, or for the safety of the ship, such deviation may be allowed, is a question for your consideration generally, and more particularly under the given circumstances of this case. The 19th article then goes on to state, "and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the above rules necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger." Then, bearing this qualification in mind, let us consider what the evidence is with regard to the conduct of the Jane. I am sorry to say it is involved in some obscurity, but in this case, as in all others, we must not hastily depart from the statements which we find in the preliminary acts. Did or did not the Jane for a certain length of time continue her own course unchanged, and when she altered her helm, was it at a time of danger, was the danger imminent, was the measure taken for the sake of saving the lives of the persons on board?

The Great Eastern appealed against the decree.

James, Q. C., Hannen and Pritchard, for the apps., contended that the evidence showed the Jane did not keep her course as required by the 18th regulation, and so neutralised the navigation of the apps., which would have sufficed to avoid the Jane, if that rule had been observed.

Brett, Q. C. and Lushington for the Jane.

LORD KINGSDOWN.—The collision in this case took place in the Atlantic Ocean on the 18th September last, about 200 miles west of Cape Clear. The Jane, a vessel of 775 tons, was close hauled on the port tack, heading north-west, and making seven knots per hour. The Great Eastern is a steamship of unusual size, of 13,344 tons burden. She was heading east by south half south, going at full speed under both steam and sail, and making about thirteen knots per hour. The wind was west-south-west. The collision took place by the starboard-bow of the Great Eastern striking the port bow of the Jane. Two men on board the Jane were killed by the collision or falling of the spars. The rest of the crew escaped on board the Great Eastern. The blow was angular; that is, at the moment they were both going nearly in the same direction. The Jane was not sunk by the first collision; but she was, by it and the subsequent grinding down and rolling of the Great Eastern, reduced to a wreck and abandoned. The case comes within the new regulations issued in Jan. 1863. By those regulations it was the duty of the Great Eastern to slacken her speed, to stop and reverse her engines, and, if the weather was foggy, to go at a moderate speed. It was also the duty of the Great Eastern to keep out of the way of the Jane, and, by art. 18, where by the above rules one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course subject to this qualification, that these rules need not be followed in any special circumstances which may render a departure from them necessary in order to avoid immediate danger. In this state of circumstances the duty of the Jane was to keep her course without alteration, unless the collision was so imminent when the Great Eastern was discovered as to render a departure from the above rules necessary for the purpose of avoiding danger. Both vessels were carrying their proper lights. This is disputed on behalf of the Great Eastern, which contends that if the Jane had carried her proper lights they would have been observed on board the steamer, which they were not; but, the evidence on behalf of the Great Eastern states only a bright light was seen, as if a lantern had been shown over the side of the vessel. In answer to this, on behalf of the Jane, it is replied that there could not have been a good look-out on board the Great Eastern, or that the red light of the Jane would have been observed. The evidence is distinct on behalf of the Jane that the lights were properly fixed and duly trimmed, and if they were not seen on board the Great Eastern, it appears to their Lordships that this could only have arisen from the circumstance, either that the look-out was not sufficient, or that the state of the weather prevented their being observed. Their Lordships first proceeded to consider the evidence relative to the Jane, for the purpose of ascertaining whether she adopted the course which, having regard to the position of the vessels and the new rules, it was her duty to take. It is established by the evidence that the white light of the Great Eastern at the foremast head was the light first seen. Andrew Mathie, one of the look-out men on board the Jane, states that he first saw the white light, and that he did not see the green light till they were about twenty or thirty yards off. William Phillips, the mate of the Jane, saw first a mast-head light, bright light, and he did not see the green light until after he had given the order to port the helm. Verso, the man at the helm, saw one light and afterwards saw the green light. Law, the other look-out man, saw only one light, did not distinguish the colour, but thinks that it was about two or three miles off. Their Lordships consider it to be clear that the masthead light of the steamer was the light so seen. The distance it was off when first seen is variously stated. Phillips thinks it was about a mile and a half, but he corrects this in his answer to the next question, and says, from two and a half miles. Law thinks that it was about two or three miles. The other witnesses give no statement on this subject. Their Lordships consider that the distance at which the masthead light of the steamer is off when first observed, unless quite close, must be mere conjecture. Except the brightness of the light, the only indication is the angle above the horizon at which the light is seen, and a more distant light might present the same angle as a nearer light if the elevation of the distant light were greater; and if the more distant light were in fact brighter than the nearer one, it might present the same appearance of distance. The only other criterion of distance is the time which elapsed before the collision took place; this is also necessarily vague, from the imperfection of the recollection of men under such circumstances, where anxiety of mind and the rapidity of events, crowded into a short space of time, have a natural tendency, on recollection, to make the time seem longer than it really was. On this point, however, there is much agreement in the evidence of the witnesses on board the Jane. John Law says, "It was about a quarter of an hour from the time we first saw the light till she struck." Andrew Mathie says: "Somewhere about ten minutes, to the best of my idea; between ten minutes and a quarter of an hour. It would be about nine minutes or so from the time when I reported the white light until I saw the green light." This estimate of time agrees well with the evidence given on behalf of the Great Eastern, which put the time which elapsed between the first observation of the Jane and the collision at about five minutes, it being obvious that the masthead light of the steamer would have been discerned on board the Jane a considerable time before from the deck or paddle-box of the steamer the light on the bows or the deck of the Jane could be observed. Phillips does not appear to have been asked the time which elapsed between the first observation of the light on board the Great Eastern and the collision taking place. As, however, the vessels were approaching each other at the rate of a mile every three minutes, the nine or ten minutes spoken of by the two witnesses Law and Mathie would agree with the evidence which puts the vessels at from two to three miles off when the Great Eastern was first seen on board the Jane. To arrive at the satisfactory conclusion as to the answer to be given to the next question is very important. Did the Jane on first observing the Great Eastern port her helm, or did she not do so till after the green light of the Great Eastern was observed, when it is admitted on both sides that it was proper to do so in order to save the lives of all on board? If the Jane, on the first observation of the masthead light of the Great Eastern, was ten minutes off, and from two to three miles distant, and if she then ported her helm, she was in the wrong, and acted contrary to the 18th article of the new regulations, which has been already mentioned. The evidence of Phillips, the mate who had charge of the vessel, on first examining it, seems to be confused and contradictory on the point. He says, "When I first saw it, I should say it was about a mile and a quarter." He is asked, At the time you gave the order could you see the other ship, or could you only see the light?—I could not see her green light then. Did you see the green light before you gave the order or not?—I never saw the green light till after I had given the order. Again, You say that after you had given the order to put the helm hard a-port, you saw the green light of the other vessel; is that so?—Yes. In cross-examination he says, "We ported our helm for the safety of our lives." In re-examination he says expressly that he ordered the helm to be put hard a-port after he had seen the green light. Now I want you to clear one thing which you answered in several ways, unfortunately. You have told me that you first saw the bright light?—I did. And that you watched it for some time?—Yes. Now tell me—just take time to consider about it—did you order your helm hard a-port before or after you saw the green light?—After I had seen the green light. How long was it after you had seen the green light that you ordered your helm hard a-port?—About a minute; or perhaps not so much. On examination of his evidence it does not appear that he was asked whether he gave two orders to port the helm or only one. If he gave two orders to port the helm, one when he first saw the masthead light of the Great Eastern, and afterwards gave a second order to put the helm hard a-port after he had seen the green light of the Great Eastern, this would make his evidence on cross-examination and on re-examination consistent with his evidence in chief which has already been referred to; and this appears to be the true solution of the apparent contradiction in his evidence. The clue to this solution is furnished by the evidence of Verso, the helmsman, whose evidence is quite positive and distinct on this subject. Was she sailing close hauled?—Yes; close hauled, laying north-west. Do you remember, shortly before the accident happened, getting an order from the officer of the watch?—Yes. What was that order?—To port the helm. Did you obey that order?—Yes. Did you get any order from the officer?—Yes; hard a-port a few minutes afterwards. Did you obey that order?—Yes; and the mate assisted me in putting the helm hard a-port. This explains that the evidence of Phillips respecting the order given by him after seeing the green light applies to the second order he gave to put the helm hard a-port, and which was subsequent to the former order he had given to the same effect, and it also explains other parts of his evidence which relate to the stamping for the captain, and assisting Verso to put the helm hard a-port. It does not appear, in his evidence, that he anywhere says that he kept on his course until the green light of the Great Eastern was visible. In the preliminary act, filed in pursuance of the orders of Nov. 1859, the twelfth article of the statement on behalf of the owners of the Jane is in these words: "Upon the bright light being observed, and before the green light was seen, the helm of the Jane was put hard a-port." This statement was made 24th Oct. 1863, within six weeks after the collision had taken place, and while the facts were fresh in the memory of the witnesses. It agrees with the evidence of Verso, and also with the evidence of Phillips when so examined as to make it consistent with itself. The conclusion to which their Lordships have come is, that the evidence given on behalf of the Jane is not inconsistent with the statement made on her behalf in the preliminary acts, and that the case is taken out of the rules laid down in the report of the Inflexible, Swab. 35, and Vortigern, Swab. 518, referred to in the argument. If the view which their Lordships have taken of the evidence on behalf of the Jane be correct, it establishes the facts that the course of the Jane was in violation of the 18th article of the new regulations, and this violation, in the opinion of the nautical gentlemen by whom they are assisted, has materially contributed to the collision which took place. These gentlemen are of opinion that if the Jane had been kept on her course, hauling her a little closer to the wind, and thereby diminishing her speed, instead of falling off and thereby increasing her speed and accelerating the rate of approximation to the Great Eastern, the collision would have been avoided. Their Lordships, therefore, have come to the conclusion that the Jane was to blame in this case. Their Lordships, however, concur with the court below in considering that the Great Eastern was also to blame. Without expressing any opinion on the point whether the look-out on the Great Eastern was or was not sufficient, their Lordships consider it to be proved that the lights of the Jane were properly fixed and brightly burning. In truth this seems scarcely to have been capable of being contested on the evidence adduced. If the Great Eastern had a proper and sufficient look-out, the port light ought to have been seen, unless the state of the weather rendered it impossible to do so. What the light was which was first observed by the Great Eastern, assuming the evidence given on behalf of the Great Eastern to be completely accurate, it is difficult to explain. Their Lordships cannot admit the suggestion offered to them in argument, that it was the cabin light of the Jane seen from the Great Eastern impending over her just before the collision, and that it was first seen at the time when Phillips heard a bell on board the Great Eastern, and when the two vessels were within hailing distance, and when Phillips was desired to port his helm, and answered that it had been hard a-port a long time ago. The evidence is distinct, that the light was seen five minutes before the collision occurred. The evidence on both sides evinces that the way of the steamer was much diminished at the time of the collision, and that she was then going very slowly through the water. This is also confirmed by the evidence of the character of the collision. After they had struck, the Jane swung round under the starboard sponsons of the steamer, and, to use the expression of the mate of the Jane, "then she rolled and smashed our ship up, the Great Eastern sponson rolled into us." If the Great Eastern had not greatly diminished her speed, their Lordships are assured by the nautical gentlemen that she would have gone right over the barque and away from her; and they are also assured, as, indeed, is sufficiently obvious, that if the first intimation of the proximity of the vessels had been at that time when the occurrence of the collision was obviously unavoidable, it would have been impossible to have diminished the speed of a vessel of the size and momentum of the Great Eastern in the time which elapsed before they actually struck. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion that the collision was, in a great measure, attributable to the state of the weather and the rate at which the Great Eastern was proceeding, which was not, in the opinion of their Lordships, justifiable in the circumstances. The rate at which she was proceeding is stated in the preliminary act as twelve knots per hour: the evidence states that, by the log, it was fifteen knots, and after allowing two knots for the current produced by the paddle-wheels, the rate cannot properly be put to less than thirteen knots an hour when the paddle-engines and the screw-engines were working full power and every sail was set that could be set to accelerate her pace. At the same time the state of the weather was this: in the preliminary act, on behalf of the Jane, it is stated to have been thick with showers of rain, and on behalf of the Great Eastern, dark and raining. The witnesses on both sides state that it was a dark night, hazy weather, and that a drizzling rain was falling. Their Lordships do not mean to lay down any rule beyond that expressed in the regulations themselves as to the occasion when a steam-vessel is bound to moderate her speed, or as to the rate which in the circumstances described in the evidence she ought not to exceed; but their Lordships are of opinion that it is the duty of the steamer to proceed only at such a rate of speed as will enable her, after discovering a vessel meeting her, to stop and reverse her engines in sufficient time to prevent any collision from taking place. Here the evidence shows that from the moment the Jane was reported on board the Great Eastern everything was done to avert the collision, but without success. If the Jane had been wholly in the right, and by pursuing her course properly had been in the spot where the collision took place, the rate of speed at which the Great Eastern was advancing would have rendered their contact inevitable. Their Lordships are of opinion that it was the duty of the Great Eastern to proceed at no greater speed than having regard to the state of the weather, made it possible for them to avert the collision. Their Lordships, therefore, are of opinion that both vessels were to blame, and that the collision is attributable to both. That the Jane, by not holding on her course when she first saw the masthead light of the Great Eastern, got into a position which brought her directly against the Great Eastern; and that the rate of speed at which the Great Eastern was advancing made it impossible for her when she first observed the Jane to avoid the catastrophe which occurred. Their Lordships will humbly advise Her Majesty that the judgment of the court below be altered accordingly.

REG. F. SILLER AND OTHERS.

Foreign Enlistment Act (59 Geo. 3, c. 69), s. 6
Interpretation—Equipment.

By the Foreign Enlistment Act (59 Geo. 3, c. 6) it is enacted that, "if any person within any part of the United Kingdom, or in any part of His Majesty's dominions beyond the seas, shall, without the licence of His Majesty first had and obtained, furnish, fit out, or arm, or attempt to equip, fit out, or arm, or procure to be equipped, fitted out, or armed, or shall knowingly aid, be concerned in the equipping, furnishing, or arming of any ship or vessel, with intent that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince, state, or potentate, foreign colony, &c., or of any person or persons, or assuming to exercise any powers of government in and over any foreign state, colony, or part of any province or people, as a warship, or with intent to commit or to engage in hostilities against any prince, state, or potentate, or against the persons exercising, against the inhabitants of any foreign colony, or part of any province or country in His Majesty shall not be at war, or shall, in the United Kingdom, issue or deliver any commission any ship or vessel to the intent that such ship shall be employed as aforesaid, every person so doing shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour. Every such ship or vessel, with the tackle, equipment, furniture, together with all the materials, ammunition and stores which may belong to or be on any such ship or vessel, shall be forfeited."

An information, filed by the Attorney-General this session, against the owners, builders, &c. of the Alexandra, alleged that the ship was for the purpose of her having been built for the service of the Confederate States of America:

It was proved that she was fitted for use as a transport ship, but not for mercantile purposes, being of unusual strength, and having no place for a cargo; that her bulwarks were lower than in merchant ships, and that preparatory work was done for placing hammock racks on the bulwarks with men of war. But at the time there were no traces of fittings for guns. It was proved that she was built by order and under the supervision of agents of the Confederate States, and it was admitted that she was not fitted for a transport ship.

At the trial before Pollock, C. B., his Lordship directed the jury, that if they were of opinion that the ship had been endeavored to equip, fit, or arm in an English port, in such a way as would prepare her to commit hostilities, with intent to commit hostilities, with intent prohibited by the statute, they would find her guilty; but not otherwise.

The jury found for the owners against the Crown. On a motion for a new trial on the ground of error, it was Held, by Pollock, C. B. and Bramwell, B., that the equipment of a ship under the act must be an equipment for the purposes of such an arm as would enable her, on being so once to commence hostilities, and that there was no such equipment in this case:

Per Channell, B., that the equipment prohibited by the statute is an equipment for war, but that on the intent with which she is furnished is alone shown that an equipment that would otherwise be peaceful is really designed for war.

The facts and arguments are sufficiently stated in the course of the following judgments:

POLLOCK, C. B.—This was an information against the ship Alexandra, charging that the defts., with others, had been guilty of a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act in respect of that vessel. The ship Alexandra had been built and partly rigged at Liverpool, and had been seized on the 6th April by an officer of the Customs, on the ground of a breach of the 7th section of the statute. The defts. claimed the ship, and pleaded that the ship was not forfeited. The information charged them with every possible violation of the Act as to equipping, furnishing and fitting out, but omitted to charge anything as to arming. The cause was tried before me on Monday, the 22nd June, and three following days. The evidence for the Crown clearly established the warlike character of the vessel. It was not at all adapted for commerce, but was capable of being adapted for warlike purposes; and though it might have been used as a yacht, according to the evidence of Captaininglefield, it was, in all probability, intended to be used by the so-called Confederate States as a vessel of war, when adapted for that purpose by them (suitable equipments and fittings-up being furnished); and if the making, in pursuance of an agreement or order for that purpose, with intention to sell and deliver to one of the belligerents, the hull of a vessel suitable for war, but unarmed, and not equipped, furnished, or fitted out with anything that enabled her to cruise or commit hostilities, or to do any warlike act, be a violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act, my direction to the jury was wrong in point of law, the verdict ought to have been for the Crown, and there ought to be a new trial. But if the commerce of this country in ships, whether ultimately for peace or war, is to continue, and provided a ship leaves the ports of this country in no condition to cruise or to commit hostilities, though she may be of a warlike character, there has been no violation of the statute, then the verdict was right. And, in substance, this is the question between the Crown and the defts., stripped of all technicality. The condition in which the vessel, unfinished when she was seized, was intended to leave this country, was, perhaps, not perfectly clear; but there was no direct evidence that she was to be made (at Liverpool or in any other British port) fit to cruise or commit hostilities. I told the jury, in substance, that the sale of a ship was, in my judgment, perfectly lawful, even of a ship so constructed as to be convertible into a ship of war; that the sale of arms and ammunition, and every kind of warlike implement was not forbidden by any law, either international or municipal; and that I thought a ship capable of being used for war might be made and sold, as well as sold, if made, provided she did not leave a port of this country either armed or equipped, or furnished or fitted out, within the meaning of the statute—that is, with intent or in order to cruise or commit hostilities against a State or Power with whom her Majesty was not at war. There was no direct evidence that she was intended to be armed at any British port, with intent on the part of any of the defts., or, indeed, any one, to cruise or commit hostilities; indeed, there was no charge in the information on the subject of "arming" at all; and there was no direct evidence of any intention to equip, furnish, or fit out the ships with intent to cruise or commit hostilities, according to what, I think, is the true meaning of the charge in the information. I, however, left the question to the jury, in the terms of the Act of Parliament; and upon this direction, with the evidence before them, the jury found a verdict for the defts. In Michaelmas Term the Attorney-General applied for a new trial, and obtained a rule to show cause, on the grounds stated in the rule, why the verdict should not be set aside, and a new trial had. Cause was shown during the term, and the argument lasted six days. We have now to deliver the judgments of the various members of the court. It is material, I think, first to call attention to the various charges contained in the information, which consists of ninety-eight counts. The ninety-seventh and ninety-eighth relate to an intent to employ the ship as a transport or storeship. These counts were given up at the trial by the then Attorney-General. The remaining ninety-six counts consist of the first eight counts repeated twelve times, merely varying the offence charged. The first eight counts charge, that the defts. did equip; the next, that they did furnish; the next, that they did fit out, and so on; then all the varieties of attempting or procuring, aiding, &c., were introduced—making the total eight times twelve, or ninety-six. The Attorney-General, at the trial, said: "The first eight counts are those only to which any attention need to be paid" (not meaning to abandon the rest, but intimating that the first eight represented all the rest). I propose to state in substance what those eight counts are. The first count charges that the defts. (without the leave, &c.) did equip the vessel with intent and in order that such ship or vessel should be employed in the service of the Confederate States, with intent to cruise and commit hostilities against a certain foreign State with which her Majesty was not then at war—to wit, the Republic of the United States. The second count resembles the first, but charges that hostilities were to be committed against the citizens of the foreign State. The third count charges that the defts. did equip with intent to cruise and commit hostilities against a foreign State with which her Majesty was not then at war. The fourth count is similar to the third, varying the description of the parties against whom hostilities were to be committed. The fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth are similar to the first and second, varying only the description in the first and second counts of the belligerent parties. The charge, therefore, resolves itself into a charge of equipping, &c., with a certain intent; the intent being stated in two different ways—or a charge of attempting, endeavouring to equip, or procuring, &c., to be equipped, with the same two intents in different counts. If what was intended to be done would not when done amount to an equipping, &c., within the Act, then there would be no attempting or endeavouring, &c., contrary to the Act. The question then arises, what is the true construction of the Foreign Enlistment Act, particularly of the 7th section of that statute, upon which the information in this case is framed; and what is the meaning of the words “equip, furnish, or fit out” in that section; and also what is meant by the expression, “with intent to cruise or commit hostilities.” It is a highly penal statute, creating a new crime or misdemeanor, making those who commit it liable to fine and imprisonment, if found guilty, and the ship (the subject of the crime) liable to forfeiture. The attempt or endeavour to commit the offence, or the procuring it to be committed, or the aiding, assisting, or being concerned in the committing it are all made criminal, and liable to the same punishment and forfeiture. In order to have a comprehensive view of the whole subject it may be useful to become acquainted with the history of the statute and of the Act of the American Congress which is said to have given rise to it. It may be useful also to learn what have been the opinions (differing, it may be observed, widely from each other) of learned jurists and eminent statesmen (not always agreeing) on the subject of international law, belligerent rights, and neutral duties; but none of these can furnish even the semblance of authority for construing an English Act of Parliament, which creates for the first time an indictable offence, rendering the party found guilty of it liable to fine and imprisonment, and his property liable to forfeiture; and it should be borne in mind that the property is not forfeited unless the crime has been committed. If the statute, in terms reasonably plain and clear, makes what the defts. have done a punishable offence within the statute, we want not the assistance which may be derived from what eminent statesmen have said, or learned jurists have written, on international law or belligerent rights, or even the decisions of American courts, to see whether the case before us is within the statute. But if not, no opinions of jurors, no decisions of foreign courts, will enable us, or ought to induce us, to declare that the scope and object, the spirit and intention of the Act, include the case before us, though it be not plainly and clearly expressed by the Legislature. We have had in this country no court of criminal equity, so Lord Campbell called the Star Chamber, in a case tried before him (The Emperor of Austria v. Day, 30, L. J. 706, Ch.), since that court was abolished. Blackstone, J. well lays down the rule in 1 Bl. Com. 92, that the freedom of our constitution will not permit that in criminal cases a power should be lodged in any judge to construe the law otherwise than according to the letter. Our institutions were never more safe, in my opinion, than at the present moment; but we must not lose any of the grounds of our security—no calamity would be greater than to introduce a lax or elastic interpretation of a criminal statute to serve a special but a temporary purpose. And here I may notice, in order to dispose of the argument of the Attorney-General about construing the statute (even a penal statute) so as to suppress the mischief and advance the remedy—he cited Plowden, and the resolutions in Heydon's case, 3 Rep. 18; but all the penal statutes alluded to are those which create some disability or forfeiture; none of them are criminal statutes: and I think it is altogether a mistake to apply the resolutions in Heydon's case to a criminal statute, which creates a new offence. The distinction between a strict construction and a more free one has, no doubt, in modern times almost disappeared, and the question now is—what is the true construction of a statute? If I were asked whether there be any difference left between a criminal statute and any other statute not creating an offence, I should say, that in a criminal statute you must be quite sure that the offence charged is within the letter of the law; in some other cases the statute is to be applied unless you are sure that the case is not within the law. As to this particular statute having for its object prevention, not punishment, which was pressed on our notice more than once, that is not a matter peculiar to this statute I apprehend that it has that object in common with all other criminal statutes that were ever passed which are all intended not to punish guilt but to prevent crime; and as to the recital that the existing law was not sufficient, to which our opinion was particularly called, I presume that recital really belongs also to every statute, whether mentioned in it or not, for if the law be sufficient, the statute is a piece of superfluous legislation. So also, I think we have nothing to do with the political consequences of our decision, or the dissatisfaction it may create in any quarter anywhere. And I cannot help here expressing my regret, not unmingled with surprise, that the learned Attorney-General has more than once adverted to the consequences that may arise from our holding that what the defts. have done is not contrary to our municipal law. That it is not contrary to the law of nations he has distinctly stated, and indeed made it the subject of an “argument in another place,” as they call it, “that other countries have no right to complain of it as a violation of the law of nations.” On the first day of his argument he pointed out how the supply of ships would work practically between a powerful country and a weak one; and he imagined this country at war with France, and the dockyards in Sweden supplying, fitting out, and equipping vessels of war for France; and he suggested that we might say, as he says we always have done in the course of our history, “We will not endure it, and if this goes on we will rather go to war with you than let war be carried on practically against us from your shores, under pretence of neutrality. That we should do that with a weak power like Sweden can any human being entertain a doubt?” I venture to entertain a doubt, and to express a hope that this country would not sully its high character by adopting towards a weak State a line of conduct which it would not think prudent or politic towards a stronger one. He then goes on to suggest that a “great power like the United States would adopt the same views, would look broadly at the practical mischief, would care nothing for Vattel, Grotius, or Puffendorf, and would say, ‘It is in substance as noxious as war, and I will not endure it.’” I must say I doubt whether such views and such doctrines ought to be presented to us at all; I am sure that they ought not to influence our judgment, and I am inclined to suspect the soundness of any proposition of law which requires such a style of argument to support it; and I may add, that international law would be of little use if it were to govern the conduct of strong nations as well as of weak ones. I thought its object was, among other things, to state and define what acts, what effect of any State, would justify war being made on it by another State; but the Attorney-General seems to think, if one nation be strong and another weak, the strong will make war on the weak, though it has no violation of international law to allege against it and to complain of. Again, the second day, he said, "The peace and welfare of the kingdom (perhaps of the world) is declared by the Legislature to depend upon this matter." When his attention was called to this, he said perhaps he was going too far in saying "the peace of the world," and no doubt he was, for there is not a declaration by the Legislature about the peace of the world at all; and the expression, "peace and welfare of this kingdom," which is in the preamble, before, relates, as far as peace is concerned, only to that tranquillity which is in the care of the magistracy, and has nothing whatever to do with the question of peace or war with respect to other countries. At the end of his address (no doubt commendable for its ability) he stated the grounds on which our decision ought to rest in a manner perfectly unexceptionable, and I wish the whole of his argument had corresponded with the dignified and elegant conclusion of it. He, also, I think we have learnt to do with the question as to which construction of the clause is most for the interest of the country as a great maritime power. It is heading the discussion to make it in any degree rest upon a question of advantage or benefit to be gained or lost, and on such a subject we might turn out to be quite mistaken. In the present enlightened state of the civilized world, it may be, that that state and those principles which would make us prosperous in peace are to be preferred to those which would make us successful in war. In construing the statute it is our duty to ascertain the true legal meaning of the words used by the Legislature, and to collect the intention from the language of the statute itself (the preamble or the enactments), and not to deduce the intention from some other sources of information, and then construe the words of the statute as to meet the assumed intention; and this appears to me to be the mistake of the counsel for the Crown. They say, "Here is a powerful State committing that what you are doing is as bad as war, and saying 'We won't endure it'; and then they say that the welfare and peace of this country require that the Act should be construed so as to leave that complaint; but we cannot, and ought not, even if the matter before us seemed to be that the mischief which it is supposed the statute meant to remedy, to deal with it as a crime, and it be plainly and without doubt included in the language used by the Legislature. In my judgment it is not within the letter of the statute, nor within the spirit, nor was it at all contemplated by those who framed the law. The danger of travelling out of the statute itself, and looking elsewhere for the object of the Legislature in passing it, may be illustrated by the wide difference of opinion between the late Attorney-General and the present Attorney-General upon this point. The late Attorney-General, in opening the case to the jury, said, 'I am particularly to have been contemplated by framers of the Foreign Enlistment Act to ensure the observance of neutrality in the event of war; which I certainly understand to mean, to comply with the duties of neutrality as sanctioned by international law. But the present Attorney-General, in the beginning of his argument upon the rule, took quite an opposite view. I own, I think a more correct one, and said, 'the whole argument of his speech "in another place" was to establish the directly contradictory proposition; and his language is this: "I say that there was no such obligation, and that it is a total misinterpretation of the municipal law to say that there was any State in the world, which, according to the settled and established principles of international law, could have required this country to prohibit those things which were prohibited under that statute." And even with respect to the Alabama, he intimates, that though there had been a breach of the municipal law, there had been—and I think he is quite correct—no violation of international law, or anything of which a belligerent at peace with this country had a right to complain. In endeavouring to discover the true construction of the 7th section of the statute, the first matter to be attended to is, no doubt, the actual language of the section itself, as introduced by the preamble; secondly, the words or expressions which obviously are by design omitted; thirdly, the connection of the 7th section with other sections in the same statute, and the conclusions which, on comparison with other sections, may be reasonably and obviously drawn. I do not mean to exclude other considerations, but these appear to me to be the most obvious and safest. The learned Attorney-General, with apparent effect, asks, why do you try to explain a statute by words which are not to be found in it?—it is dangerous to adopt such a course. On the first impression, the objection seems not unreasonable, but the answer is obvious—in order to know what a statute does mean, it is one important step to know what it does not mean; and if it be quite clear that there is something which it does not mean, then that which it is suggested or supposed to be what it does mean must be consistent and in harmony with what it is clear that it does not mean. What it forbids must be consistent with what it permits. The 7th section contains the words "equip, furnish, fit out, and arm," but does not contain the word "build;" and I think no one can doubt but that that word was purposely omitted from the Act of Congress and from our own statute. I am not surprised that the Attorney-General was desirous of preventing this mode of investigation, because it leads, in my judgment, irresistibly to this conclusion, that whatever might be done in the way of mere building before the statute, may now be done notwithstanding the statute. In common honesty and candour, it cannot be suggested that the Legislature meant to suppress the mere building of ships for a belligerent, as it were, by a side wind, and to suppress their trade without exciting their alarm. I think, therefore, I may pronounce with confidence, that it is lawful now to build ships, and even to build ships for war. The shipbuilders of this country for above a century have built ships for almost every nation on the earth, some for warlike purposes and some for commercial. It is one of the most considerable of our industrial and commercial pursuits. Building ships is not prohibited, even building ships for war is not prohibited, provided they be not equipped, furnished, fitted out, or armed in our ports, with either of the intents stated in the 7th section; and the words "equip, furnish, fit out, or arm" with the intent stated in the 7th section, ought to be construed, if they can be so construed, as to leave the commercial interest of shipbuilders untouched. If the comparison of the 7th section with the other sections in the Act makes certain propositions clear and undoubted, the Act must be construed accordingly, and ought to be so construed, as to make it a consistent and harmonious whole. If, after all, it turns out that that cannot be done, the construction that produces the greatest harmony and the least inconsistency is that which ought to prevail. I cannot understand how, in the same breath, it can be admitted that the question is too

from being free from difficulty, and yet a construction be called for to create a crime, and embarrass an important branch of British industry. A comparison of the 7th section with the 2nd leads me to a conclusion quite different from that at which the learned Attorney-General arrived. With respect to the 2nd section, it did not escape him, that the offence created by the 2nd section is, in a natural-born British subject, an offence everywhere (in the realm or out of it). To use his own expression, "the net is thrown as wide as the entire world," and enlistment anywhere is the matter forbidden. Not so the 7th section: the acts forbidden by it are forbidden to Her Majesty's subjects in Her Majesty's dominions only; elsewhere they are no offence at all; and the Attorney-General fails to draw the conclusion, which to my mind is irresistible, that neither the act nor the intention are so much considered as the place. It is the place, a British port here or abroad, that is made sacred. Let the shipbuilder, though a British subject, take his capital and materials elsewhere, and he may build what ship he pleases, and arm it and equip it as he likes, for the use of any belligerent not at war with this country; and with whatever intention he is actuated, if he commits no act of hostility, he neither violates international law, nor commits any breach of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The great object of the statute, therefore, was not to prevent the building of ships by British shipbuilders for one of two belligerents, with neither of whom we were at war, but to preserve the ports of this country from being made ports of hostile equipment against a friendly belligerent; but not in any way to fetter the commerce of this country, or the trade of shipbuilding, beyond what was necessary for that purpose. If it were important to prevent ships from being equipped, furnished, fitted out, or armed, with the intents mentioned in the 7th section, by British subjects, it might have been made the subject of universal prohibition as easily as enlisting; but the prohibition does not go beyond the ports of the British dominions. Again, a comparison between the 7th section and the 8th throws also some light on the meaning of the words used in the 7th section, and on the object with which it was framed. The 8th section of the British statute makes it a misdemeanor to add to the number of guns, or to change them for others, or, by the addition of any equipment for war, to increase the warlike force of any ship or vessel of war, or cruiser or armed vessel, which at the time of arrival was in the service of any foreign prince or government, or of any persons exercising the powers of government. In short, it forbids any one in this country to increase the warlike force of any vessel of war or armed vessel not belonging to the Sovereign of this country. In this it differs from the corresponding section in the Act of Congress (which is the 5th), and which forbids the increase of warlike armament to a ship of war only when it is at war with a State or people with whom the United States are at peace. But in this country the increase of the warlike armament of any foreign ship of war is not permitted at all. Whether it belongs to a State at peace or at war with those whom we are not at war is no question; our ports are not to be disturbed by a warlike armament at all; but then everything or anything else may be done for the purpose of mere navigation. Any sea damage to the ship or tackle may be repaired; if a vessel be capable of repair she may be equipped, furnished and fitted out. If a steamer, she may be supplied with coals, in order that she may reach a port of her own country in safety. One conclusion clearly to be drawn from this is, that whereas in the United States a foreign belligerent vessel was not allowed to increase its warlike force, if the United States were at peace with the other belligerent, in the British dominions a foreign vessel of war is not allowed to increase its warlike force at all, under any circumstances. The one may be ascribed to some doctrine of neutrality, the other to a wish to preserve the peace of the British ports, and not to allow them to be made places of warlike equipment for foreign vessels at all. But there is another result, more worthy of observation. It is, I presume, conceded, that a Federal vessel of war damaged by storm may put into an English port, and may refit and repair so far as is necessary to make it again navigable, in order to reach its own country. The 8th section, by implication, permits all that it does not forbid. A Federal vessel of war coming into our ports would be allowed, no doubt, to repair sea damage, and to supply lost stores, in order to reach some other port; but the shipbuilder in one port would be equipping, furnishing, and fitting out that vessel, knowing that the commander might cruise and commit hostilities against the so-called Confederate States. But does the shipbuilder commit a misdemeanor, or is the vessel forfeited? If the argument for the prosecution be well founded, and the construction of the statute by the counsel for the Crown be correct, the shipbuilder who repaired any damage to a vessel of war belonging to either of the belligerents would be liable to a prosecution as much as any of the present defendants. I now come to the 7th section itself, and to the terms on which the statute enacts, that persons doing certain acts with a certain intent shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor. It is necessary carefully to separate the act itself from any attempt or endeavour to commit it, and to simplify the inquiry as to how the statute should be construed; I will take (as the information does) one of the prohibited matters—"equip," for instance—and examine that alone, without reference to the others, and without reference to attempting, procuring, aiding, assisting, &c. The clause would then run thus: "If any person within any part of His Majesty's dominions, in the United Kingdom or beyond the seas, without the leave and licence of His Majesty, shall equip any ship or vessel, with intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign State or Government, as a transport or storeship, or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities against any State or Government with whom His Majesty shall not then be at war, every such person so offending shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." Two questions obviously arise upon the construction of these expressions—first, whose intention is it which is meant by the Act? and, secondly, what is the meaning of the word "equip?" It is difficult to make out what was the intention of those who framed this clause, as to the manner in which it should be broken up into parts and then be put together, so as to present all the alternatives contemplated. Probably it could not mean, that "with intent and in order that such ship or vessel should be employed in the service of any foreign prince, state, &c., as a transport or storeship," should stand alone, without some subsequent matter being added, for that would make it a misdemeanor to furnish a transport or storeship to be equipped for any foreign prince, &c., without any regard to his being at peace or at war with any State or Government with whom the Sovereign of this country should not then be at war. It is probable that the words "against any prince, state," &c., should follow the word "storeship," and then the effect of the clause would be this—it would be a misdemeanor to equip a ship or a vessel with intent and in order that such ship should be employed in the service of any foreign prince, &c., as a transport or storeship, against any prince, state, &c., with whom

[Ex.]

REG. v. SILLEM AND OTHERS.

or Sovereign should not then be at war, or with intent to cruise and commit hostilities against any prince, state, or potentate: and some twenty-two of the ninety-eight counts are founded on this view of the section. Or the alternative may be, as transport or storeship, or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities against, &c.; and then the effect of the clause would be, to make it a misdemeanor to equip a ship with intent or in order that she might be employed by one belligerent as a transport, or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities against another. It is certainly to be regretted that the wisdom and sagacity which the Attorney-General discovers in adjusting the verbal differences between our statute and the prior Act of Congress, were not exercised in baffling the enemy of the Bill, who, by levelling it at transports and storeships as well as ships of actual war, has thrown the whole clause into confusion, which, I presume, it is suggested that he meant to do by speaking of him as "not originally a friend to the Bill," as having made the alteration in committee. But neither this court nor any other court can construe any statute, and least of all a criminal statute, by what counsel are allowed to tell us were alterations made in committee by a member of Parliament who was "no friend to the Bill," even though the journals of the House should give some sanction to the proposition. This is not one of the modes of discovering the meaning of an Act of Parliament recommended by Plowden or sanctioned by Lord Coke or Blackstone. When two intents are mentioned, and they are put in the alternative thus with intent to do such a thing or with intent to do another, the obvious and grammatical mode of reading the clause would be to make the two intentions the alternatives, but most of the counts in the information (about seventy-two) combine the two intents together, and, in effect, turn "or" into "and," and charge the defendants with equipping, &c., the ship with intent that the ship should be employed in the service of one belligerent with intent to cruise and commit hostilities against the other belligerent with which Her Majesty was not then at war. If this mode of reading the 7th section be not correct, seventy-two of the counts are improperly framed, and the statute does not warrant any such charge; but, assuming it to be correct, then the question arises, whose intent does the information mean? Who is it that the information charges with an intent to cruise and commit hostilities? According to all the rules of pleading it must be the intent of the person committing the act, and this view would make all the counts in substance to mean much the same thing with reference to the intent. There was no direct evidence that the persons equipping, fitting-out, &c., aiding, assisting, &c., had any intention to cruise or commit hostilities at all, and, if so, the whole charge fails altogether. The Attorney-General would read "with intent to commit hostilities" as if the expression were with intent that hostilities should be committed by somebody; but that mode of reading the expression is contrary to the rules of pleading. And to all authority on the subject, and especially to what was decided in the United States v. Quincey, of which a full report is given in the appendix to the trial. I wish to call particular attention to this case, and to the two answers of Mr. Jefferson, referred to by the Solicitor-General in the course of his argument. I think they lead to a construction quite different from that suggested by the counsel for the Crown. Mr. Jefferson's answers clearly show what was the opinion of the American Government, and the decision of the Supreme Court in the United States v. Quincey is the best authority to the state of the law. The first answer refers to arms and ammunition, not to ships at all. Mr. Jefferson says: "Our citizens have been always free to make, vend, and export arms. It is the constant occupation and livelihood of some of them. To suppress those callings (the only means, perhaps, of their subsistence) because a war exists in foreign and distant countries, in which we have no concern, would scarcely be expected. It would be hard in principle and impossible in practice." Why, I would ask, should not this apply to ships and shipbuilders? In America it does, why not in England? The second answer relates to ships, but Mr. Jefferson does not express any disapprobation of a supply of ships, even ships of war. What he says is, "But the practice of commissioning, equipping and manning vessels in our ports to cruise on any belligerent parties is entirely disapproved of, and the Government will take effective measures to prevent it;" and accordingly, the 3rd section of the Act of Congress is directed against fitting out and arming, and also against commissioning. The 7th section is directed against equipping, furnishing, fitting out, or arming, and also against commissioning, but there is not a single syllable against shipbuilding, or selling, or making for sale ships, even of a warlike character. So with respect to the law and the construction of the American Act of Congress, the judgment delivered by Thompson, J., in the United States v. Quincey gives to the citizens of the United States a right to send armed vessels out of their ports, it aims at preventing the citizens themselves from committing hostilities against foreign powers at peace with the United States, but leaves them at perfect liberty to sell the vessel to one of the belligerents, and, provided hostilities are not committed by the citizens of the States, there is no breach of the law. The accompanying remark of the learned judge which immediately follows, proves that the Attorney-General is endeavouring to enforce against British shipbuilders a principle which the Supreme Court of the United States altogether repudiates as applicable to citizens of the United States. If our statute was passed to give to the United States the same advantage that their Act of Congress gave to us, there may be a reciprocity in words, but there is no reciprocity in reality and in construction if the argument for the prosecution is to prevail. Thompson, J. says, "All the latitude necessary for commercial purposes is given to our citizens, and they are restrained only from such acts as are calculated to involve the country in war;" which I understand to mean the citizens of the United States have a right to build what ships they please and dispose of them as they please, provided they do not themselves take part in the war, and the ships are not employed by them to commit hostilities. And what pretence is there for giving to our Foreign Enlistment Act, with respect to shipbuilding, a construction totally different from that which the Act of Congress bears, according to the judgment of the American judges themselves in their Supreme Court? There is, indeed, a difference of expression between the Act of Congress and our statute. They have merely the words "with intent," we have "with intent and in order." The Attorney-General says, he supposes the words "in order" were added to avoid some evasion or quibble. I believe they were added to leave no doubt as to the meaning. The expression "in order" is explained in Todd's Johnson to signify "means to an end," and Jeremy Taylor, Tillotson, and Swift are quoted as authorities. The passage from Swift is: "One man pursues power in order to wealth." Power is the "means," wealth "the end," and the 7th section forbids equipping a ship or a vessel as a "means" to "the end" of cruising or committing hostilities. In all common sense and understanding, if the nature of the equipment has no reference whatever to the commission of hostilities, it cannot be the "means to that end," and there is no breach of the statute by that sort of equipment. Webster's Dictionary gives the same explanation of the expression "in order," and this leads me to remark that even the word "intent" alone and without "in order" (put in, as I think, to explain it, and give it the true meaning which an English lawyer would assign) ought not to lead to a different conclusion. The Attorney-General seems to think that if there be an intent, and anything of whatever kind be done in pursuance of it, that is sufficient; with great respect for the opinion of so eminent a lawyer, in my judgment, that is not sufficient. If a statute simply made it a felony to attempt to kill any human being, or to conspire to do so, an attempt by means of witchcraft, or a conspiracy to kill by means of charms and incantations, would not be an offence within such a statute. The poverty of language compels me to say "an attempt to kill by means of witchcraft," but such an attempt is really no attempt at all to kill. It is true the sin or wickedness may be as great as an attempt or conspiracy by competent means, but human laws are made not to punish sin, but to prevent mischief. I am, therefore, of opinion that the 7th section should be construed as if the words were "if any person (in the places mentioned) shall without the leave, &c., equip as a means any ship or vessel to 'the end' that such ship shall cruise or commit hostilities," and then if, after all the equipping or furnishing or fitting out, the ship is incapable of cruising or committing hostilities, there has been no such equipping, &c., as the statute was intended to prevent; and this brings me to what is the meaning of the words "equip," "furnish," "fit out," or "arm," for they must all be considered together, and the question is not so much what did the Legislature mean, as what is the meaning of what they have said, of the words they have used. A clause admitted to be awkwardly framed, by no means free from difficulty, and of considerable doubt, was scarcely worth the very minute criticism and comparison it has received. On the part of the prosecution, it is contended that the 7th clause was meant to put ships constructed for war, or adapted to war, upon a footing different from any other munitions of war, to leave cannon of every description, arms of all sorts, gunpowder, and shot and shell to be freely supplied to either belligerent; but no ship or vessel of a warlike character was in any respect to be furnished to a belligerent with whom this country was not at war. If this had been the object it might have been accomplished by the simplest possible piece of legislation, instead of the awkward, difficult and doubtful clause which, it is admitted, we have to deal with. It cannot be suggested that the object was to conceal from the shipbuilders the ultimate effect of the clause, and so prevent a clamour on their part, that they were interfered with in a way which the casters of cannon and the makers of gunpowder were not. There is not a syllable in the Act of Parliament, nor in anything connected with it, nor in any contemporary proclamation, speech, or publication of any kind professing to put ships on a footing different from any other implement of war: and it was admitted that there was no foundation for any such distinction in international law. And what is the ground of this distinction between cannon, army ammunition, and other articles of that description, and ships? It was insisted upon, I think, without any foundation. The Attorney-General, as I understand him, says, as far as international law is concerned, there is no distinction between them; the distinction arises from our municipal law. He said, "I entirely subscribe to what fell from the Lord Chief Baron at the trial, that it could make no difference whether there was a sale of a thing ready-made, without a previous contract, or a delivery and a contract." No doubt, if no legislation make a difference, there would be none; as he considers that the Foreign Enlistment Act made that difference. His reason is a singular one. He says Her Majesty has the power, whenever she pleases, to prohibit every other species of contraband trade, but she had no power to do with a ship, so that ships are left out, to be dealt with under the Foreign Enlistment Act. The present statute forbidding exportation of arms is the 16 & 17 Vict., passed in 1853, founded on statute, 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 52, passed in 1833. I cannot find in the index to the statutes any earlier one. I find that the construction of the Foreign Enlistment Act passed in 1819, turns upon an Act passed in 1813. The result of the argument on the part of the Crown seems to be this: A shipbuilder may build a ship altogether of a warlike character, as may arm it completely to the latest and most mischievous invention for the destruction of human beings, and may then sell it to one of two belligerents with a perfect fitness for immediate cruising and ready to commit hostilities the instant it is out of neutral territory, provided there was no contract or agreement for it. But if there be any contract it cannot be made to order with the slightest warlike character about it, though this be part of the accustomed and usual trade of this country, and though the ship leaves our shores a mere hull, utterly incapable of cruising or committing hostilities, and, as far as war is concerned, as innocent and harmless as the mere timber of which it is built, the means of evasion which it furnishes is obvious—a signal, a word, a gesture may convey an order wholly incapable of being proved. It is unnecessary to dwell upon this; it is at once perfectly obvious, and the real difference between a crime and an act of commerce almost disappears. To use an expression borrowed from one familiar in Westminster-hall about a coach and six, a whole fleet of ships might sail through an Act of Parliament as this; and we are to believe that our legislators exhausted all their wisdom in settling the language of the 7th clause and had none left to perceive the enormous loophole they had left. Again, a British subject may buy a vessel of war rejected by our navy, fit it up, arm it, and sail with it to a port of either belligerent to sell it; but if either belligerent should by an agent purchase at a public sale by auction he cannot put a mast into it and hoist a sail, reach his own country, but an armed vessel either belligerent may come into our ports and obtain whatever mere naval, but not warlike stores that he may require, so as to enable him reach some other port—observe, coming into a port completely armed, he may refit and repair, being altogether unarmed, he cannot put in a mast or a sail merely to cross the ocean. I cannot believe that the sound construction of an Act of Parliament passed within fifty years of the present time can by possibility lead to such an amount of inconsistency and absurdity, and, I may add, injustice, is involved in the construction we are asked to put so much earnestness to put upon this statute. It seems to me to amount almost to that degree of what is repugnant to common sense as our law according to the golden rule to defeat the effect even if words conveyed the meaning, which they do not. In my judgment, the Act was not formed in order to make any difference between ships of war and guns, ammunition and other implements of war, but to prevent our shores from being made points of departure of hostile expeditions, commissioned and equipped to commit hostilities against a belligerent not at war with us. The 7th section therefore, forbids the issuing or delivering a commission, as well as equipping in order to com-ilities (for without a commission any act of hostility would be a clear and undoubted act of war, and there was no occasion for a new law against piracy). To suppose that the Legislature gave to British shipbuilders the power and right to build ships for war, as before the statute, but that they meant by the words equip, "furnish and fit out" to forbid them from sailing away, however harmless and innocent of war their condition might be, is, I think, an unworthy imputation on the good faith of those who made the law. There can be no doubt they did not mean to permit a ship or vessel to go away armed, for they have said so distinctly, but "arming" admits of many degrees, and a doubt might arise, if the word "arm" alone had been used, what degree of arming would constitute the offence. But the degree is settled and determined by taking the whole sentence—the ship is not to be equipped, &c., in order to cruise or commit hostilities; if the equipment amounts to that the law is broken; if it does not, no offence has been committed. With respect to the rule, I am of opinion that none of the grounds on which it was moved ought to prevail, and that the rule ought to be discharged.

BRAMWELL, B.—The law which governs this case is a written law—an Act of Parliament—which we must apply according to the true meaning of the words used in it. We must not extend it to anything not within the natural meaning of those words, but within the mischief or supposed mischief intended to be prevented. Nor must we refuse to apply it to what is within that natural meaning because not, or supposed not, within the mischief. In this, as in other cases of doubtful meaning, it is legitimate to resolve that doubt by ascertaining the general scope and object of the enactment; and, accordingly, international law has been referred to, certain propositions have been laid down in that necessarily vague science, and it has been argued that the Act was passed merely to enable the Crown to enforce the observance of that law by its subjects, and so it has been sought to find its meaning. But it is clear to me that the statute prohibits some things which are not, and I strongly incline to think permits some things which are, prohibited by international law. In the result I concur with the learned Attorney-General, that the question we have to answer cannot be solved by treating the statute as a mere enforcement of international law, or by referring to its origin. Again, it may be a legitimate mode of determining the meaning of a doubtful document to place those who have to expound it in the place of those who made it: and so, perhaps, history may be referred to to show what acts existed bringing about a statute, and what matters influenced men's minds when it was made. But we know that in our legislation an argument may be used in support of the principle of a Bill which is consistent with particular provisions of great variety, and we know that in all legislation where it is intended to prohibit a thing, it may be necessary to prohibit others under colour of doing which the thing intended to be prohibited may be done. This, therefore, affords no certain clue to the meaning of the enactment, nor would ascertaining the objects of the authors of the American Act, from the provisions of which in our Act there is a supposed difference. It becomes necessary, then, minutely to scrutinise the words of our statute, and interpret them with such assistance (if any) as can be got extra its four corners. Now it is, no doubt, a penal statute; but I think it ought to be construed as laid down by the late Mr. Sedgwick in his book Statutory Law. He says (p. 326): "But the rule that statutes of this class are to be considered strictly is far from being a rigid or unbending one or, rather, it has in modern times been so modified and explained away as to mean little more than that penal provisions, like all others, are to be fairly construed according to the legislative intent as expressed in the enactment: the courts refusing, on the one hand, to extend the punishment to cases which are not clearly embraced in them, and, on the other, equally refusing, by any mere verbal nicety, forced constructions, or equitable interpretations, to exonerate parties plainly within their scope." And I must here record the well-founded remark of the Attorney-General, that whereas formerly statutes being extended equitably, as it was called, beyond their natural meaning, penal statutes were exempt from such extension, but now that such liberties are not taken with statutes, there is no reason for construing penal statutes on such different principles as were formerly applied. Nor, I confess, can I think that the interests of the shipbuilder or any other trade are so concerned in this matter as to afford an argument in favour of the defendants' construction. I now come to the very words of this much debated sect. 7. I leave out all which are needless to the matter in hand. I am satisfied that "equip, furnish, and fit out" are not limited to transport and storeships. The rule which interprets reddenda singula singulis does not apply, because all the words "equip, furnish, and fit out" are sensible in reference to vessels intended to cruise or commit hostilities. The section reads thus:—"If any person within any part of the United Kingdom shall equip, furnish, fit out, or arm any ship or vessel, with intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince as a transport or store ship, or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities," &c. Now to ascertain the meaning. On the part of the Crown it is said that if there is an intent that the ship shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince with an intent to cruise or commit hostilities, any equipment with that intent is sufficient, however unfit to accomplish such intent; that the rigging, victualling, manning, and other parts of equipment are lawful or not, according to the intent with which the ship will be used by those for whom they are done. This is said to be according to the very words of the statute. Supposing it to be so, it seems to me that the difficulty is only shifted—that the question remains, what is the meaning of the words "with intent or in order that such ship shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince with the intent to cruise or commit hostilities? Does it mean with intent or in order that by means of such equipment she may cruise or commit hostilities, that she shall be in a condition for proximate hostilities, so that the port she leaves will be a "station of hostilities?" or does it mean, as contended by the Crown, that an intent is within the statute where the equipment is in order that she may be employed in the service of a foreign prince, though further acts on his part are necessary to enable her to cruise or commit hostilities. I think this is a correct statement of the question, and it seems to me that it must be answered adversely to the Crown's contention. I think the fair and natural meaning of the words is, that the equipment must be fit for cruising or the commission of hostilities. The word "intent" before "to cruise or commit hostilities" seems put there on purpose to show this. But I dislike relying on a single word. Let it then be repeated, and the statute read thus:—"If any person shall equip any ship with intent or in order that such ship shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince to cruise or commit hostilities." Now what would be the meaning if the words were "If any person shall equip any ship with intent or in order that such ship shall cruise or commit hostilities in the service of any foreign prince?" Surely that would require an equipment suited for such cruising. Do those words differ from the following:—"If any person shall equip any ship with intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed to cruise or commit hostilities in the service of any foreign prince?" And do these latter words differ from those in the statute? I think not. Take Mr. Mellish's illustration. If the words were "equip with intent or in order that the ship shall be employed in the service of a merchant in the whale fishery," could it be said any equipment or intent would be within the Act, unless the equipment was or was meant to be fit for whaling? I think this the plain, fair, natural meaning of the words by themselves; but there are collateral considerations to the same effect. Building is not prohibited, selling is not prohibited. I don't agree with Mr. Mellish that if the statute does not prohibit building it must necessarily permit equipping. It is possible the Legislature meant you may build, which is harmless unless you equip, and that you may not. But it seems to me that the omission of "build" and "sell" shows that something beyond a harmless ship and equipment was meant to be prohibited. It may be said that selling an equipped, armed and manned ship is not prohibited in words, at least; therefore, no argument could be derived from the omission of "build" and "sell." My answer to that is—there are no ready-made ships armed and equipped for sale; they are done to order, and there was no need, therefore, to prohibit what never has happened or never could happen. Such a prohibition would be useless; but a prohibition of building and selling would not. Again, Mr. Karlake's argument comes in; a man has a ship for sale; he may sell it to a belligerent if he does nothing to it; he may equip it if the buyer means to use it as a packet ship, &c., but the same equipment is unlawful if the buyer's intent is different. So that the misdemeanor is committed or not, according to the intent, not of the equipper, but of his customer. Because, suppose the equipper says, and truly, "I equipped it that the buyer might do as he pleased with it, I cared not what that was;" what intent is there, then, in the equipper's mind that she shall be employed to cruise? Moreover, the words are "in order that," &c. Can there be an equipment in order that a vessel may be employed to cruise, unless the equipment is calculated to enable them to do so? Again, surely the equipment of a vessel with intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any foreign prince as a storeship or transport, means an equipment as such, or an intent, should enable it so to be employed. Read the enactment without the word "employed," and can there be a doubt of the meaning? Does the use of that word make a difference? I think it cannot be properly said that a man does an act with intent, unless he intends the act to bring about the thing intended. Thus, if a man builds a ship in which he means to go a whaling voyage, he builds with intent the ship shall go a whaling voyage, though unfit for whaling. But if he builds her for another, he does not build her with an intent she shall go on a whaling voyage, unless he particularly adapts her to that service. In this case, if building, with intent to be employed to cruise, had been forbidden, I think the forfeiture would have been incurred, for by her build she is particularly adapted for that purpose, but the word "equip" is used, and there is no forfeiture unless there is equipment particularly fitting her for cruising, the equipper himself not intending to cruise in her. I now come to sect. 8. It ought to be a warning to those who indulge in confident opinions, that this is relied on by counsel of great ability on both sides as being in his favour. It seems to me strong for the defts. It by implication permits any equipment to a vessel already armed, provided it is not an equipment for war. If the Alabama, with her armament, could run into an English port, whatever was done to her in this country before in the way of equipment, could be done now lawfully, and she might sally forth armed and equipped, though it is said the equipment alone was unlawful. It is said, such ship must have been equipped before, but she may have lost her mast, or sails, or screw. According to the argument of the Crown, they may be replaced if she is armed already, but not if she is unarmed; or she may come here armed and have her equipment bettered to any extent—new masts, boilers, engines, &c.; but any one of these, if she is unarmed, is unlawful. Further, in sect. 2, British subjects are prohibited from serving in vessels fitted out or equipped, or intended to be employed in warlike purposes. Surely, the vessel in which serving is prohibited must be capable of fighting. Again, the title and preamble both show that the statute was directed against fitting out and arming for warlike purposes. Sect. 2 is in the same sense. It is said that this construction requires the vessel to be armed to be within the Act, and that so the words "fit out, furnish and equip" are superfluous. I agree that they are not to be so treated if it can be avoided, though I strongly incline to think that the persons who used them attached no very definite idea to them. In the title it is "fit out or equip" without "arm;" in the preamble it is "fit out equip and arm." In sect. 2 it is "fitted out, or equipped, or intended to be used for any warlike purpose." In sect. 7 the words are "equip, furnish fit out, or arm." Surely, no precise idea was in the mind of the author of the varying though similar expressions. The probable intent was to use sufficiently comprehensive words, and to avoid such a question as whether a ship was "armed" strictly speaking, and make it enough if she was equipped for warlike purposes. Such a case may well be that the ship, though not armed, is equipped for warlike purposes. By "armed" I suppose it would be mean ordinarily that she had cannon; but if she had fighting crew, muskets, pistols, powder, shot, cutlasses and boarding appliances, she might be well said to be equipped for warlike purposes, though not armed. On these grounds, independently of authority, and on the very words of the Act, I think the construction contended for by the Crown is wrong, and that of the defts., prominently put by Mr. Mellish, is right, viz., that the section prohibiting that equipment only, which is itself such that by means of it the vessel can commit hostilities, and that no equipment which gives no means of attack and defence is within sect. 7. It may be said this is a lawyer's mode of dealing with this question—merely looking at the word. It is, and I think is right. A judge discussing the meaning of a statute in a court of law should deal with it as a lawyer and look at its words. If he disregards them, and decides according to its maker's supposed intent, he may be substituting his for theirs, and so legislating. As has been excellently said, "Better far be accused of a narrow prejudice for the letter of the law than set up or sanction vague claims to discard it in favour of some light interpretation more consonant with the supposed intentions of the framers or the spirit which ought to have animated them. Important as are the objects of this statute, must be construed on the same principles as on regulating the merest point of practice or other trifling matter. But I am willing, as far as possible, to look beyond the mere words of the enactment, to look at its general scope and intent and to do what is called take a broader view. In my opinion, the statute was intended to prevent any of the subjects or territories of this country being belligerent; to prevent them being immediately in hostilities between foreign belligerents with this object it forbids British subjects foreign service everywhere, whether the is in or out of the Queen's dominions. Any one, whether subject or not, to enlist within the Queen's dominions. It forbids the fitting out of vessels of war in the Queen's dominions by all persons, whether the Queen's subject or not. It thus forbids the British subject to be combatant, and the British territory a theatre of hostilities. It is personal and local to the Queen's sovereignty. It does not forbid a British subject, if abroad, from fitting out a ship, nor, if here, from building or equipping it. Those provisions of the Act which forbid enlistment of British subjects everywhere go beyond the municipal law of international law; but as far as the Act, now in question, is concerned, it is intended to prevent the subjects of this country from being a cause of complaint of violation of international law, by making the country a station of war.

[Ex.]

REG. V. SILLEM AND OTHERS.

[Ex.]

I think a vessel departing neither equipped so as to be capable of attack or defence, nor a violation of international law, be what it may. No doubt the employment of a vessel as a transport is prohibited by this Act, whether such a vessel is not equipped for warlike purposes. Nor is the port from which she departs a theatre of hostilities. But, as I have said, I know the statute goes beyond the municipal law of international law; in the provision which I think it does not. Historically, however, these words, inconsistent with the preamble, were introduced. Further, under the different matters brought forward to assist us in putting a construction on the Act, they all seem to confirm the view I have expressed. There is no doubt what the object of the statute—what the object in view. It was to prevent the issuing of vessels on hostile expeditions from British territory. It (to judge from its history and the preamble in reference to it) to prevent the issue from this country of vessels incapable of attack or defence. So of the American statute. The object and the object immediately in view are the same. They were the same as in the case of the Independencia.

Nay, we know from American authority that it was intended not to prevent a commerce in arms. But the language of the American statute is decisive. In sect. 3 the words are "fitting out, arming, or equipping." It is true the section proceeds "or assisting in furnishing, fitting out, or arming;" but that means be concerned in any part of the offence. There must be a fitting out and arming, and any person to be concerned in either. It is to suppose the statute should make it an offence to fit out and arm, and also an offence, and an offence to be concerned in fitting out where there is no arming. Besides, the same words apply to the same matter—viz. "with intent, &c." Further, the object of the American statute only applies to a ship built for warlike purposes, and the offence consists of arms and munitions of war, or a number of men or other circumstances observable that such ship is intended to be used by the owner to commit hostilities, &c. It is not that the bond to be given under these provisions should not be required in the case of the vessel until she was armed or had a cargo of arms and munitions of war. So, again, if the rights and obligations created by international law. If a hostile expedition, fitted out by a person within its territory to attack another State, it is so, if the expedition is fitted out, not by the State, but with its sufferance, by a part of its subjects, or by strangers within its territories, it is war, at least at the option of the assailed. They would be entitled to say, "Either you can prevent this or you cannot. In the former case it is your act, and is war; in the latter case, in self-defence, we must attack your territory, whence this assault proceeds." And this is equally true, whether the State assailed is at war or at peace with all the world. The right in peace or war is not to be attacked from the territory of another State, that territory shall not be made the basis of hostilities. But there is no international law forbidding the supply of contraband of war, and an unarmed vessel is, in my opinion, that, and nothing more. It may leave the neutral territory under the same conditions as the materials of which it is made might. The State interested in stopping it must stop it, as it would other contraband of war—viz., on the high seas. I have hitherto considered the case independently of the authorities. They are exclusively American, on the American statutes. I concur in the eulogium the Attorney-General has passed on American legislation and American judges on this matter. An English lawyer must rejoice to see that those who administer in America a law in great part our common inheritance, administer it on the same fearless and honest principles as, I venture to say, law is administered here. The way to show our sense of their example is not to consider what would be acceptable to their countrymen merely, and decide accordingly, nor to be influenced by the foolish threats which have been uttered, but to decide, as their judges have done, truly and honestly, to the best of our ability. Now, there are but three decisions to be noticed. The first is the case of the Independencia. It has not the slightest bearing on the present. The Independencia was an armed vessel. Being so, she came to Baltimore and had her fighting crew increased. Story, J. expressly states as a fact found that the court is driven to the conclusion that there was an illegal augmentation of the force of the Independencia in our ports by a substantial increase of the crew. This renders it wholly unnecessary to enter into an investigation of the question, whether there was not also an increase of her armament. As to the Alvarida, he says there was an "illegal outfit, and an enlistment of her crew, within our waters for the purposes of war." He decides, then, on the ground of warlike equipment in the American port. I doubt if Mr. Jones was right when he cited this case to show it was not an authority against him. If a precedent of honest and eloquent indignation were wanted, I would refer to the judgment of Marshall, C.J., in another case, which, however, like the two I have mentioned, has no bearing on the present. The vessel was "completely fitted in our ports for military operations." She could have fought at the moment of leaving Baltimore. She might have been subjected to the penalties of piracy, but she was not the less equipped and armed for war. The next case is the United States v. Quincey. I say, with all respect, that the case was wrongly decided. The learned Attorney-General confessed it. It supposes that a person can assist in doing what nobody is doing or trying to do. It applies a pleading test—very little use in discussing a statute, and doubly misapplies it. In the first place it is bad enough to use the words of a statute in an indictment where, from their position in the statute, they would have a different meaning from what they would have standing alone. Then the objection is misunderstood. Supposing it taken to the indictment, it would be that the indictment should have said, "A. was fitting and arming, or attempting to fit and arm, and the deft. was assisting to fit." Further, this case does not say that if the principal in the transaction were indicted, anything less than a warlike equipment would suffice, and that is the only question before us. These authorities, to my mind, if anything, are in support of that view of international law and of the statutes which I have expressed. The history of our statute, the history of the American statute, the duties of international law, and the speeches and acts of jurists and statesmen, all point to the same conclusion. A like opinion was recently indicated in an important official statement, in which it was said, "England was preventing the departure of hostile expeditions from her shores." Whether this is a correct statement in point of fact I know not, but it is by implication a correct statement of what she is bound to do by international law, and what she has power to do by municipal law. I am aware of the consequences if this is the law. A ship may sail from a port ready to receive a warlike equipment, that equipment may leave in another vessel and be transferred to her as soon as the neutral limit is passed, or at some not remote port, and thus may the spirit of international law be violated, and the letter and spirit of the municipal law evaded. But, as the law stands, or as both laws stand, I see no remedy. I do not see what line can be drawn but the sharp line. As Sir H. Cairns said, "If it is unlawful to put a peaceful equipment on a ship because at three miles from the neutral territory she is meant to receive a warlike one, why is it not unlawful if the distance is to be 1000, or in this case one of the Southern ports? If she may not sail peacefully equipped to a Southern port, why would it be lawful to send there her parts ready to be put together? If not those, why the materials of which they could be made, and so on? I am aware, of course, that it would be easy to draw a line and make a law prohibiting the sending forth of a ship and permit the exportation of its parts, leaving that to be dealt with as contraband of war; and that such a law would make a broader distinction between what would and what would not be lawful than now exists, and that its evasion by sending forth the parts of a ship would be more difficult and less hurtful and irritating to the opposing belligerent. Whether such a law would be desirable I do not presume to suggest. What I wish is to show that, in considering this as a matter of principle, I have borne in mind, first, that the present law is capable of easy and mischievous evasion; second, that if it is sought to extend its construction it is impossible to stop short of the prohibition of the export of contraband, though a positive law so stopping would not be difficult of enactment. An argument I have partly dealt with already has been used—not, indeed, before us—that there may be an attempting or assisting by persons who do not commit the complete offence of equipping or arming. So there may be. But there can only be an attempt to commit an offence where, if the attempt succeeded, the offence would be committed. A person can only assist in doing an act where the act is to be done. Now there is one thing in this section clear beyond all doubt, viz., that there can be no offence against it unless that offence is committed within the Queen's dominions; that, therefore, no one can attempt contrary to the provisions of this Act, unless the equipment attempted be meant to be done in the Queen's dominions, and that no one can assist contrary to those provisions, unless some one is equipping or attempting to equip within the Queen's dominions. This, indeed, was admitted by the Attorney-General, and it is, to my mind, too plain for argument. Taking this view of the statute, I think a right direction to the jury would be, "If you are satisfied that the parties concerned were equipped or arming, or attempting to equip or arm the ship claimed, with intent that it should be employed in the service of a foreign prince to cruise or commit hostilities against others, as alleged, find for the Crown: but such equipment or attempted equipment must be of a warlike character, and that by means of it she is in a condition more or less effective to cruise or commit hostilities; otherwise find for the claimant." Holding this opinion, I think the direction of the Lord Chief Baron was substantially, if not verbally, correct. Still, in considering whether the jury have come to a wrong conclusion, whether the verdict was against evidence, or otherwise unsatisfactory, all that his Lordship had said must be taken in consideration. And though the proceeding is perfect if there had been any evidence on which the jury could have acted, I should have thought there ought to be a new trial, considering that the deft. kept witnesses out of the box who must have known the whole truth. But, interpreting the statute as I do, I think the verdict was right. I have no doubt the vessel was building and equipping for the Confederates in order that they might use her, when armed and equipped, for hostilities against the Federals. This was being attempted, but I see no evidence that it was intended to arm or equip her in the Queen's dominions so as to be capable of attack or defence. On the contrary, I believe it was intended to evade, not to infringe, the statute, not to commit a misdemeanour, nor to do, or attempt to do, what would cause a forfeiture of the ship. I believe, on the evidence, that it was intended to deal with this vessel as with the Alabama—get her out of the country and give her her armament and warlike equipment out of the Queen's dominions. It is worthy of remark that the information does not suggest it was intended to arm her here. I think, therefore, that this other ground for a new trial fails, and that the direction was right, and that on a right direction the verdict for the deft. was right on the evidence. Consequently, I am of opinion that the rule must be discharged.

REG. V. SILLEM AND OTHERS.

CHANNELL, B.—This was an information filed by her Majesty's Attorney-General, insisting upon forfeiture of a ship called the Alexandra, under the provisions of the 7th section of the Foreign Enlistment Act. That section makes certain acts done with respect to a ship misdemeanours. It then proceeds to say that "every such ship or vessel shall be forfeited and may be seized" as therein provided for. In the present case a seizure has been made and this seizure had to be justified by the Crown at the trial of the information before the learned Lord Chief Baron. Upon that trial a verdict was given for the defts., and the learned Attorney-General in last term obtained a rule nisi for a new trial upon five grounds. Those five grounds may be ranged under two heads—viz., those of misdirection, and the verdict being against the evidence. The question as to the verdict being against the evidence necessarily depends in some degree upon the question whether there was misdirection or not, because we must see clearly what were the questions which the jury had to decide before we can apply the evidence and see whether it supports the finding of the jury. The consideration of the evidence would therefore, whatever view I were to take on the question of misdirection, come more appropriate after than before the consideration of the construction of the statute. But it will be unnecessary for me further to revert to the question of the verdict being against the evidence in the view which, after much anxious consideration, I feel compelled to take of the construction of the statute and of the effect of the Lord Chief Baron's direction—a view which differs in some respects from the opinions of the Lord Chief Baron and of my brother Bramwell, and leads me to a different conclusion from that at which they have arrived, and which, for that reason, and on account of the great respect which I always have for their opinions, I express with the utmost diffidence. Now, under the head of misdirection I include an inadequate direction and also a direction which, though right in the main could be calculated to mislead a jury. Where the question turns upon the construction of an Act of Parliament, the judge is, I think, called upon to explain to the jury the sense in which any doubtful word or expression in the Act is to be understood: see Edgett v. The South Devon Railway Company, 11 B. 725. In the consideration of the question of misdirection it will be convenient first to endeavour to construe the Act, and see what direction ought to have been given, and then to consider whether the direction given agreed in substance with what ought to have been given. The Foreign Enlistment Act, particularly the 7th section, is very perfectly worded. There is no doubt that it was a great measure, but with what appears to me to be important variations, passed from an Act of the United States passed in Congress—first in the year 1794, and re-enacted by Congress in the year 1818. This circumstance has given rise to a great deal of argument on both sides. Sir Hugh Cairns has suggested, apart from the language of the Acts of Congress, certain a priori views, tending to show why the American Act was passed and altered, and then treating the Acts of Congress with some exceptions identical with our own, he seeks to apply certain decisions in the Courts of America to the consideration and construction of our own statute. Into this very wide field of inquiry he has constrained the counsel for the Crown to follow him, and they came down so in the very order in which his argument was addressed to us. I do not say that any time was lost, or that in the course of the very long argument that was addressed to us any view was omitted not calculated to assist the court; but, having carefully considered the arguments, I cannot help thinking that the decision of this most important question should proceed on grounds less wide than those to which the attention of the court has been so ably called. Faulty and imperfect as may be the wording of the 7th section of the Foreign Enlistment Act—and more imperfect or faulty wording I can scarcely conceive—if, notwithstanding all this, the words of the 7th section, read with reference to the other parts of the Act, do, by a reasonably fair interpretation of our statute and the evidence, embrace the case of the Alexandra, then, in my judgment, it scarcely becomes necessary to consider what have been the decisions of the Courts in America upon Acts of Congress. In the main much the same, but in not unimportant respects different from our own Act. Whether for the present purpose the Foreign Enlistment Act is to be considered as a penal statute, the Crown in this case proceeding for a forfeiture of the ship, or is to be considered as an Act for the first time creating a criminal offence, the rule to be applied in order to the construction is that which is so well expressed in the passage from the late Mr. Sedgwick's treatise used by my brother Bramwell, and to which passage I need not advert in detail. But I may say that it serves, in my judgment, the high eulogium which my brother Bramwell has passed upon it, and is, I think, in perfect accordance with the American and English authorities which that late learned writer is cited in support of his view. Now, faulty and imperfect as the wording of our statute, particularly the 7th section, is, there are certain matters clear enough beyond all reasonable doubt. First, the statute was a statute passed merely to define what shall be an offence, or to create an offence for the first time of defining its punishment, but in its intent it aims at prevention of the offence and of the completion of the offence, and not punishment merely. It is, therefore, in every sense a remedial statute. And secondly, it is a statute intended to remedy a mischief, which, though forcibly expressed, is only contingent and possible, and not certain. The language of the preamble points to certain acts which may be prejudicial to and tend to endanger the peace and welfare of the kingdom; and, further, it goes on to recite that the laws in force are not sufficiently effectual for preventing the same. The statute has not, therefore, for its object solely the prevention of acts which if done must endanger the peace of the kingdom, but appears from the preamble to be aimed also at acts which may possibly excite such feelings in other nations as to have that effect. This inclines me to think that the equipment of ships to be employed at a future time for war, though not so complete in this country that the ship shall be at once able to commit hostilities, may be within the Act. I do not, of course, come to any conclusion from the preamble alone, that such an equipment is prohibited. What we have to look at are the enacting words. But I think the preamble is, as Lord Coke calls it, a key to unlock the meaning of the Act where it is doubtfully expressed. And I concur in the decisions which determined that the words of an enacting clause shall not be cut down or restricted by the preamble. So that if the case I have mentioned were clearly within the words of the 7th section, but not within the mischief as declared by the preamble, I should hold that it was prohibited by the Act. As my brother Bramwell has remarked, the Legislature often finds it necessary, in order to restrain certain acts, to prohibit other acts under colour of which the act to be restrained may be done. Now this Act has clearly two distinct and several objects in view: First, the enlisting or engagement, without licence, of British subjects to serve in foreign service. There I agree that the statute includes the whole world, provided the persons enlisting or engaging are British subjects; secondly, the fitting out or equipping in British dominions vessels for war purposes. The part of the Act which relates to the second of these objects includes all persons, British subjects or not, provided the offence prohibited by the Act is committed within the Queen's dominions. I am not incoherent to the value of the arguments which have been addressed to us by the counsel for the claimants founded on these different objects. Those arguments raise one of the many difficulties in the case. They do not, however, seriously affect my view as to the conclusion to which we ought to arrive. Prohibition and prevention of a mischief which may be prejudicial to and tend to endanger the peace and welfare of the kingdom were, as I have said, aimed at by the statute. By our municipal law every one, British subject or not, being within the dominions of our Sovereign, claiming protection of the Government of this country, may be bound. Out of her dominions the municipal law of this country could only bind the subjects of the realm. We ought not to lose sight of the first object contemplated by the Act, and provided for by the first six sections; but it is the part of the Act which relates to the second object that principally requires our attention. The last part of the Act, beginning at the 7th section, does by that section provide against equipping vessels with a certain intent, loading or delivering any commissions for ships with the intent therein mentioned. And, lastly, for a forfeiture of that ship or vessel: I have said that the forfeiture clause following the clause creating certain misdemeanours applies to "every such ship." This is, certainly, rather clumsily expressed, but we must take it that every ship is forfeited with respect to which any of these misdemeanours have been committed. We have, therefore, to see what are the misdemeanours created. They are, first, equipping, fitting out, furnishing, or arming a ship with a certain intent or purpose; secondly, attempting or endeavouring to equip, &c., with the same intent; thirdly, procuring to be equipped, &c., with that intent; fourthly, aiding, assisting, or being concerned in equipping, &c., with that intent. Now, it is, I believe, the unanimous opinion of the court that the second, third and fourth of the offences here spoken of mean respectively the attempting, the procuring, and the assisting in such an equipment as is spoken of in the first, that is to say, that the secondary offences, as they have been called, are the attempting, &c., such an equipment as if completed would amount to the principal offence. If, therefore, we can arrive at any clear conclusion as to what is the principal offence, the question whether there was any attempt, &c., to commit that offence becomes a mere opinion of evidence. This being clearly understood, we may for the purpose of construing the Act disregard all the words about attempting and aiding and being concerned in and so on. We have, therefore, now reduced the main question in the case to this—what did the Legislature mean by the words “equip, furnish, fit out, or arm a vessel with intent or in order that she should be employed in the service of a foreign power as a transport or storeship, or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities against a power with whom we are not at war?” Arming is not charged in the present information; we may therefore leave out the words “or arm.” The words “transport or storeship” are also immaterial, now that the 97th and 98th counts, charging the Alexandra to be a transport or storeship, are abandoned, except that we must adopt such an interpretation of the words common to both clauses as they would be capable of bearing when combined with the words “as a transport,” as well as when combined with the words “with intent to cruise.” The words “equip, fit out and furnish,” seem to me to mean nearly the same thing. Throughout the whole course of the argument in this case little stress was laid upon any supposed difference between the words “equip, fit out and furnish.” We may, therefore, still further reduce the words we have to construe to these, “equip with intent or in order that the vessel shall be employed in the service of a foreign power, with intent to cruise or commit hostilities.” It is admitted, I think, on all sides, that these are the words upon which the main question turns. Now, it is clear that the offence created by these words is one consisting of an act done with a certain intent or purpose. The act and the intent must both be present to constitute the offence, and the act must be done and the intent must exist in the Queen’s dominions. It is also, I think, agreed on both sides that the intent spoken of must be the intent of some person who has control over the vessel so as to be able to carry out his intent or purpose. We now come to the points on which there is a difference of opinion. The Attorney-General contends that any equipment, however peaceful in its nature, will be an offence against the Act, provided there is an intent that the vessel shall be used at some future time in the service of the belligerent. He admits that where the equipment is clearly peaceful there will be much greater difficulty in proving the intent; but he says that assuming that you can prove the intent, then any kind of equipment will be within the case contemplated by the Act. On the other hand, the counsel for the claimants connect more closely the act and the intent—that is to say, they explain the general word “equip” by the subsequent words, “with intent or in order that the ship shall be employed in a given manner.” And they say that these words show that the equipment spoken of is an equipment suitable to the employment. Further, I understand them to go the length of saying that it must be suitable only for that employment. It is remarkable that the words “or in order that” are not in the American Act, but have been added in ours. This will be a subject for remark by-and-by, when we come to consider the applicability of the American cases. Now, we have only to see what difference these words make. Do they enlarge the scope of the Act by mentioning another case, another kind of equipment which is also within the Act, which in the course of the argument I was much disposed to think was the right view? Or do they rather restrict the previous words, explaining them and throwing a light upon them, as suggested by Mr. Mellish? It seems to me now that the latter view is the right one, and that the words “or in order that” restrict and explain what is meant by “with intent,” rather than include any new case not before included. If I do an act which is entirely immaterial to the employment of the ship, as painting her name on her stern, I may do that, having all the time the intent that she shall be employed in a given manner, but I cannot do it in order that she may be so employed, for it has no reference or relation whatever to her employment, and does not further her being employed in one way more than another. Thus there may be an equipment “with intent that,” which is not an equipment in order that. But can there be an equipment in order that which is not “with intent that?” The Attorney-General has suggested that there may, or, at all events, that the framers of the Act thought there might. He argues that the words were inserted to meet the argument that builders and other tradesmen are not parties to the intent, but he says at all events they may be said to do it “in order that.” But is it clear that a man can do an act in order that a result may follow without intending that result? Does not every man intend to effect the object of his act? If, however, we do suppose such a case, where a man, without having the intent that the ship shall be employed in a given manner, yet equips her in order that she may be so employed, is not the inference as strong as possible that the equipment must in that case be of a nature suitable and appropriate for that employment? It seems, then, that if we are to give any force to the words “in order that,” it must be as explaining and illustrating the words “with intent that.” It may also be remarked that in this information the charge is that certain persons did equip the Alexandra “with intent and in order that,” &c. This shows that whoever drew the information supposed the two expressions to mean the same thing. I do not attach much importance to the last remark, for if we ought to decide them to be different, then I think the words “and in order” in the information might be rejected as surplusage. It seems, then, on the whole, that in order to justify the seizure the Crown must show an equipment (either completed or attempted) of the Alexandra, in order that she might be employed, &c.; and further, that this necessarily means an equipment enabling or tending to enable her to be so employed. This last conclusion I draw also from the nature of the words “equip, furnish and fit out.” I do not adopt the idea that any one of these words can include building. The Attorney-General at one time seemed disposed to contend that fitting out might include building. I do not think that he adhered to that throughout. If he still holds that opinion, I certainly differ from him upon the point. I do not pretend to say whether any particular act, as fixing the ship’s bulwarks, is part of the building or part of the equipping and fitting out. That, I think, might be a question for the jury. I do not even say that acts done to the structure of the vessel may not be equipments. I should say that you were equipping a ship for an Arctic expedition by strengthening her ework in order to enable it to resist the pressure of ice. But I say that equipping, fitting out, and arming are all acts subsequent in their nature to building, and in speaking of which you contemplate the ship as already in existence. I think there is nothing contradictory to this view in the cases cited by the Attorney-General—viz., The United States v. Guinet, Wharton's St. Tr. 95; The Ship Hectors and The Ship Mermaid, both in Bee's Reports. What it seems to me that these words, "equip, furnish, or fit out" do all signify is this—contemplating the subject-matter of the equipment already in existence, they express an idea of arming it for some purpose or another. That purpose may be either expressed or implied. When we speak of "equipping a ship" simpliciter, it may be that that means getting her ready for sea, and use to go to sea is the natural and ordinary employment to which a ship is put. If you state the nature of the employment, then equipping means getting ready for that employment. I interpret the language, therefore, as showing that the equipment mentioned in the 7th section must, as a matter of fact, be an equipment for the employment spoken of. We are left in doubt whether this is the right interpretation or not, I think, as I have said before. We may and ought to look at the preamble to the object of the Act. There we find that the mischief to be remedied is one which may arise from fitting out and equipping and arming of vessels for warlike operations. This, then, is the very case which I have interpreted the 7th section to strike at, provided that the employment there mentioned is an employment for warlike operations. What is the employment there mentioned? "Shall be employed in the service of a foreign prince with intent to raise or commit hostilities." It has been assumed in the argument on both sides that this may be read without the words "with intent" were there omitted, they are in the American Act. Whether this is the case or not, their insertion certainly causes great confusion. In the first place it provokes comparison with the other clauses commencing "with intent," and, at first sight, to read them as showing separate intents, either of which would, with the present act, constitute the offence. This, on looking into it, is agreed on all sides not to be the right construction. But they create a further difficulty. The intent now spoken of is necessarily, from the meaning of the words "shall be employed with intent," an intent of the employer, and not of the shipper, which is, as it were, engrafted upon the intent of the equipper; and it is very difficult to show how one man can intend that another man shall do something or other. It is probable this difficulty which has prevented the counsel on either side from founding any argument upon these words. For this I should have thought it might have been argued that an employment with intent to cruise differed from an employment to cruise in this, that it might include an earlier employment, and that it cover the voyage in an unarmed state from port to some port where she was to be armed, and from which she was to start to cruise. But even if we adopt the view taken by the Attorney-General, that an employment with intent to cruise may be construed the same as an employment to cruise, I think that an equipping in order that the vessel may be employed to cruise or commit hostilities means equipping for warlike purposes. So far, then, I think it is clear that there must be an equipment for war; that an equipment which cannot be used, or is not useful for war, will not do. The conclusion at which I have so far arrived is drawn from the 7th section, with such light as is thrown upon it by the preamble and by the 2nd and 8th sections. Drawing that conclusion I agree in a great measure with the argument of the claimants, and with the judgment of the Lord Chief Baron and my brother Bramwell. But another, and, to my mind, very important and difficult, question arises. Suppose there is evidence of some equipment or other either completed or attempted, but that the equipment does not in itself show whether it is an equipment for war or not, may we take into consideration evidence of the intent to prove that it is actually and in point of fact an equipment for war? Upon this question, after much anxious consideration, I have arrived at the conclusion that we may. I do so with the most sincere and respectful deference to the opinions of the Lord Chief Baron and my brother Bramwell, and with great distrust as to the correctness of my own judgment. It will be convenient, now that I am about to consider whether the character of the equipment where doubtful may be explained by the intent of the parties, to see what effect the clause "as a transport or storeship" has on the interpretation of the section, because it is especially in the case of a storeship that we see the absolute necessity of explaining the character of the equipment by the intent. Now, is there anything which militates against the view that the equipment with intent, or in order that the ship may be employed in a given manner, means an equipment suitable to that employment, in the fact that one of the employments spoken of is "as a transport or storeship?" It may well be that there is no equipment specially suited to a storeship. All equipments of an ordinary merchant vessel may be, and probably are, suitable to a storeship. But is it any reason for saying that the equipments struck at by the Act are not equipments suitable for a storeship, because, being so, they would also be equipments for another object? Is a gun the less an equipment for war because it may be used for firing salutes? But the counsel for the Crown deduce from the case of the storeship a very important argument—they say that in that case the jury must necessarily look at the evidence of the intent to enable them to say whether the equipments are for a storeship or not; and if so, why are they not to look at the evidence of intent to say whether certain equipments of a doubtful nature are for warlike purposes or not? I grant at once that they may, provided that the equipments as to which the doubt exists are such as can be directly used for war without further addition. They might, of course, if they were in doubt as to whether a gun was an equipment for war, look at the evidence of intent to satisfy themselves that it was not intended to be used simply for firing salutes. But the question is more difficult, supposing that the equipments are such as can only be used for war by some addition being made to them. Suppose a jury to find as a matter of fact that a certain vessel is intended to be sent to the West Indies and then to have guns put on board; that when her guns are on board, the mainsail with which she had been equipped in Liverpool may assist her in chasing an enemy's vessel, are they then justified in deducing from that, that the mainsail is an equipment, in order that she may be employed to cruise? I have, after giving the question my best consideration, come to the conclusion that the jury may so reason. I am supposing a case where an equipment is made, which, though not in itself sufficient to make the vessel a war-vessel, is still a necessary part of the equipment of a war-vessel. It would, as it strikes me, be a question for the jury to consider whether the equipments are in fact equipments for war. And they may decide that question for themselves by the nature of the equipments, if they sufficiently show it (in which case they will have to look to the intent and purpose only so far as to see that the vessel is to be employed against a power with whom we are at peace), or they may decide that certain equipments which are capable of being used for war are, as a matter of fact, equipments for war, on the ground of evidence being laid before them showing an intent so to use them. But I do not mean to say that if a jury found specially these facts, that A. B. had equipped a vessel which was in its structure capable of being converted into a war-vessel to the extent merely of enabling it to sail away from this country, that he knew that the purchaser intended to convert it into a war-vessel, but the jury also distinctly found that what A. B. did to it was done, not in order to convert it into a war-vessel, or in order to be useful to her when so converted, but simply in order to enable it to reach a port where the purchaser might, if he pleased, convert it; in such a case I do not say that A. B. ought to be convicted of a misdemeanor under this Act. That case would not, I think, be within the Act, because the jury would there, in effect, find that the intent with which the act was done was a different one from that mentioned by this section. So far, then, for what may be called the principal offence. There remains for consideration the attempting and the aiding and being concerned in, &c. I have said that the attempt must be to do the act which has been made an offence by the previous clause. The equipment attempted must, therefore, be an equipment in this country, and of the nature I have described. In this the counsel on both sides and all the members of the court are agreed. Where an attempt is charged we contemplate an equipment commenced, but interrupted. In that case the jury will certainly have still more difficulty in seeing whether the equipment is an equipment for war; but, in my judgment, they may so find upon evidence, not of the nature of the equipment, but of the intent of the parties, provided always that the nature of the equipment, so far as it appears, is such that it can be used for war. The same rule applies to the assisting and being concerned in equipping. It must, in the opinion of the jury, be an equipment for war. But I think that their opinion may be formed either from the nature of the equipment or from the intent. Having arrived at this construction of our statute, I will refer shortly to the cases cited from the American reports for the purpose for which, and for which only, I think we ought to notice them—that is, to see whether there is anything in the opinions of the learned judges of that country, for whose opinions I have the greatest respect, delivered in cases to some extent in pari materia with the present, which ought to make me pause or review the interpretation I have adopted on looking at the words of our Act. The cases cited are the cases on the point of what the meaning of equipment is, to which I have already referred. And besides these there are the cases of The United States v. Quincey, and The United States v. Gooding. In Quincey's case the portion of the decision which is material in our case was this: That it was not necessary that the jury should find that the vessel when she left the United States was armed or in a condition to commit hostilities in order to find the deft. guilty. They do not say that she need not be equipped for war, but only that she need not be completely equipped. This view, then, coincides with the view I have taken of our Act. It may be that some of the other points decided in that case are not very intelligibly reported, or even not accurately decided, but, at any rate, there is nothing decided but what is in accordance with my interpretation of our Act. Even if there had been, I think the insertion of the words “in order that” in the English Act—words to which I attach a certain importance, and which are not found in the American Act—and the omission in the English Act of any words corresponding with the 10th and 11th sections of the American Act, might cause me to hesitate before acting on the authority of that case. I think that the 10th and 11th sections of the American Act tend to show that the 3rd section of that Act is less restrictive than our own. The United States v. Gooding was the case of a supposed slaver. The statute, on the construction of which the case turned, was very similar to the Act we are considering. It was held in the case that it was “an act combined with an intent, and not either separately, which was punishable.” It was decided that the equipment need not be a complete equipment but that a partial equipment was sufficient. There are also words in the decision which would seem to show that the equipment need not be an equipment for the purpose of a slave voyage as a matter of fact, though it might be only a partial one. It is said, “Whether the fitting out is fully adequate for the purposes of a slave voyage may, as a matter of presumption, be more or less conclusive; but if the intent of the fitment be to carry out a slave voyage, and the vessel depart on the voyage, and her fitting out is complete, as far as the parties deem it necessary for their object, then the statute reaches the case.” That seems to amount to this, that there must be fitting out as a point of fact for a slave voyage, but either the intent or the nature of the fitting may determine whether it was for that purpose. This agrees with the conclusion to which I have arrived. And now to see what questions ought to have been left to the jury. Disregarding any question as to the propriety of the style of the Confederate States, which is no doubt sufficiently laid in the information, the question, in my views as before explained be right, should have been:—First, was there an intent on the part of any one having a controlling power over the Alabama, that she should be employed in the service of the Confederate States to cruise or commit hostilities against the United States? Secondly, if she was she equipped, fitted out, or furnished in a British port in order to be employed to cruise, &c. Thirdly, if not equipped, was there an attempt to equip her in a British port in order that she should be so employed? Fourthly, or did any one knowingly assist, &c. in such equipment in a British port? I do not, of course, mean to say that these questions should have been left to the jury precisely in the words I have stated. But I think that, in substance, these questions should have been put. Now, with great submission, I doubt whether the substance of these questions was so left to the jury that they would be likely to understand rightly the points they had to decide. The question finally left to the jury seems to me to be correct as far as it goes. The Lord Chief Baron says, “Was there an intention that in the port of Liverpool or any other port she should be equipped, furnished, fitted out, armed with the intention of taking part in any contest?” That, I think, so far as it went, was right but, in my opinion, it ought to have been accompanied by some further explanation than was given of the words “equip, &c., in order that.” Further, I think the jury ought to have been directed that they might form their opinion as to whether she was to be equipped with the intention of her taking part in any contest, either from the nature of the equipment or from any evidence before them as to the intention of the parties with respect to such equipment, if they thought it anticipatis usus. I think further, that, though there may have been no equipment completed, the question whether there was an attempt at such an equipment as would, if completed, have been within the Act, should have been distinctly left to the jury. This was not left to the jury as a separate question, though it may have been, and, on the whole, I think, was included in the question, “Was there any intention that she should

[Ex.]

REG. v. SILLEM AND OTHERS.

[Ex.]

Ex.]

REG. v. SILLEM AND OTHERS.

[Ex.]

REG. v. SILLEM AND OTHERS.

quipped, &c." It has been contended by the Lord Chief Baron, that besides these objections to the sufficiency of the summing up, there are other expressions in it calculated to mislead the jury. The Lord Chief Baron remarked, in strong terms, upon the policy of selling gunpowder and other articles—in short, whatever can be used in war for the destruction of human beings—to a belligerent, and concludes a part of his observations, "Why should ships be an exception?" adding that, in his opinion, in point of law they were not. The question why should ships be an exception is repeated in another part. Now, if these observations were understood by the jury to apply to a state of things existing under the provisions of or with reference to international law, and quite irrespective of any municipal law, they would be, I think, unobjectionable; but they are, in my humble judgment calculated to mislead a jury, unless attention was distinctly drawn to the fact that this statute, whatever be its true construction, does certainly place equipped ships in a different position to other contraband of war. The Lord Chief Baron again uses expressions which it might have led the jury to understand him as drawing a distinction between equipping without an order and equipping in obedience to an order, instead of distinguishing between equipping and building, which I now understand to be the meaning which attributes to the words with respect to which this complaint is made, and it is a meaning which, I think, they may fairly bear, and would necessarily bear if the clauses were inverted as suggested by me in the course of the argument, and assented to by the Attorney-General. Again, the Lord Chief Baron, having stated that a man may sell an armed ship to a belligerent if he has it ready, which is I think correct, proceeds to draw from that a conclusion that he may make one to order; and possibly he may build a ship, but he may not equip it in order that it may be employed for war. Now, if the Lord Chief Baron is to be understood as saying that a man may make to order the same kind of vessel as he may sell when he has it ready, that is to say, a vessel equipped and armed, then such a direction, in my opinion, would be erroneous, and I cannot help thinking that a jury would understand the Lord Chief Baron to mean that. Again, the Lord Chief Baron said that he would not leave to the jury the question of what service she was intended for. This, I think, should have been put. It may be that the Lord Chief Baron thought, not that it did not arise and become material in any event, but that it might be assumed in favour of the Crown as the facts were in evidence, for he proceeds to say that the question was whether the vessel was built or the course of building. If the jury thought, the Lord Chief Baron seems to have thought, that the ship was not completely built, and therefore no equipment or fitting out could have even commenced, the question of intent would not arise. But that was a question for the jury, and it was only in the event of their finding that question in one way that the question of service for which the vessel was intended became material. Further, it is complained that the Lord Chief Baron directed the jury that equipping, fitting out, and furnishing all meant the same as building. This we now understand him to say he did not do, but only expressed his opinion that they

It is clear, however, the learned Lord Chief Baron did not direct the attention of the jury to the question whether there was an equipment (completed or attempted) of a character doubtful in itself, but capable of being used for war, which was to the satisfaction established to be an equipment for service by the evidence of the intent of the parties; this, I think, should have been left. I adopt the proposition stated by the counsel for the Crown, that a summing up which, fairly considered, has on the whole a tendency to mislead a jury upon a question of law on which they ought to be guided by the opinion of the judge, and not to form their own opinion, is open to the objection of misdirection. As remarked by the Attorney-General in his able argument, that the learned Lord Chief Baron was obliged to deal on the trial with a difficult subject, and, as said by the Attorney-General, it is not wonderful if, in some things, his Lordship may have omitted to have made observations which he would have made, or may have made observations which he would not have made had it been otherwise, yet I am not prepared to say that I find in the summing up of the Lord Chief Baron, delivered as it was under these circumstances of difficulty, any statement of law which is, in my judgment, absolutely erroneous. But it does seem to me that the explanation given of an extremely difficult and obscure Act of Parliament was not so full or so clear as a jury ought to have in a case of so great importance, and certainly not so full as the jury will have if a new trial is granted, now that the whole subject has been so ably discussed. I think, also, that there are expressions in the summing up which a jury would probably have misunderstood. So that, on the whole, I think we ought to grant a new trial on the ground of misdirection, including, as I do in that, inadequate direction and expressions calculated to mislead the jury. Taking this view, I need not again revert to the question whether the verdict was against evidence, or whether, supposing it to be so, the present case ought to be assimilated to a penal action, in which case the rule is that a new trial is never granted solely on the ground that the verdict is against the evidence. I expressly refrain from offering any opinion whether the verdict found by the jury in this case was or was not in my judgment the right one. But I say that it was an unsatisfactory verdict, because it may have proceeded upon a misapprehension of the law and of the questions to be decided. It is a satisfaction to me to find that my Brother Pigott has arrived in the result at the same conclusion with myself, though his reasons for doing so may not be entirely the same as my own. It is also a satisfaction to me to know that, although I differ from the Lord Chief Baron and Mr. Baron Bramwell in the result, there are many broad points of agreement between us. I agree with them in thinking that what this statute forbids is an equipment for war. I agree with them in thinking that the main object of the statute was to prevent our ports being made stations of hostilities. Our difference appears to be this, that they think the equipment must be intended to be completed so that the vessel when it leaves our port shall be in a condition at once to commit hostilities; while it seems to me that in the fair and reasonable meaning of the words used another case is included—viz., where the equipment not being complete to that extent is yet capable of being used for war, and the intent is clear that it is to be used for war. I say that the full and reasonable meaning of the words includes that case, and that we should judicially construe the Act to include it. It may be said that the manner in which I have considered this case, by a minute scrutiny of the words of the Act, is a mere lawyer's method of viewing the matter; that in a case of this kind it is our duty to take a broader view—to take into our consideration the principles of international law, the duties of nations to nations, and even the opinions of great statesmen on those duties. I, for my part, have no ambition to decide cases in this court in any other capacity than that of a lawyer. In days long past judges, I think, often invaded what we now consider the sole province of the Legislature. They interpreted statutes to include cases which they assumed to think ought to have been included. Thus, not merely constituting themselves legislators, but generally also legislators ex post facto. That, I think, will never be done again. As long as Acts of Parliament are drawn as they are now, the office of construing them will be no sinecure, though we have but to interpret the law, and not to make it. If it is for the interests of the nation that the law should be other than we interpret it—if our construction of this Act of Parliament may endanger the peace of the nation, then I say that it may be the duty of Parliament to enact a new law, but it is not our duty to look elsewhere than at the present statute for an interpretation of it.

[Ex.]

REG. v. SILLEM AND OTHERS.

[Ex.]

PAGOTT, B.—The rule for a new trial in this case has been drawn up on seven different grounds. We have, however, to consider them as practically reduced to two, and, accordingly, the arguments were directed to impeach the general verdict which was found for the claimants of the ship the Alexandra—first, upon the ground that the Lord Chief Baron had misdirected, or had insufficiently directed, the jury in point of law; and secondly, that the verdict was against the weight of evidence. The material facts disclosed in evidence on the trial were, that the vessel, the Alexandra, was built by Messrs. Miller, who stated that she was for Messrs. Fraser, Trenholme and Co., agents of the Southern Confederacy; that she was launched in March, and, at the time of the seizure, on the 5th April, the decks' workmen were variously engaged in fitting her with stanchions for hammock-nettings. The masts were up, and had lightning conductors on them. She was provided with a cooking apparatus sufficient for 150 or 200 people. That her build was apparently for a gunboat, with low bulwarks, over which pivot guns could play, and her hatches were too small for merchandise; in fact, that she was not qualified for mercantile purposes. No evidence was called for the defence. The contention upon the trial (as upon the argument before us) was that, upon the true construction of the 7th section of the statute, the evidence disclosed no illegal act done or attempted in reference to this vessel, which worked its forfeiture. The Lord Chief Baron's direction to the jury is before us at full length, and I now propose to consider the objection to its sufficiency, and the arguments which were addressed to the court thereupon. It is clear that the construction of a statute is for the judge, and there are, no doubt, many statutes which are so unambiguous in their language that it is quite sufficient to read the words to the jury without explanation or comment. A judge has a right to assume that the jury whom he is directing are persons of ordinary intelligence, and in his direction to them to treat them as such. But there are a variety of statutes of quite a different character, and which persons of intelligence not accustomed to the consideration of the artificial language in which Acts of Parliament are frequently framed, require to have fully and carefully explained. In such cases the duty lies upon the judge to give the necessary explanation, and to evolve the question of fact, which the jury are to decide. The statute in question is clearly one of this class, and we have to see whether, upon the whole, the jury were sufficiently directed on the true meaning of the 7th section of the Enlistment Act, so that they would clearly understand the issues of fact which they had to try. In order to determine this, it is necessary to ascertain the construction which the 7th section ought to bear, and I propose to examine the arguments which were addressed to the court to guide us in our decision. As to one class of these arguments, I felt great doubt if they could be legitimately addressed to us for the purpose of expounding a municipal statute; and, certainly, I do not consider myself at liberty to look to them, except as matters of history, to throw light on the state of our law at the date of this statute. I allude to the debates in Parliament, to the correspondence of English and American ministers of state, Mr. Hamilton's rules of 1793, and the writings of modern historians. But a second head of argument was founded on the state of international obligations as between neutral and belligerent nations, and which, it was argued, the Legislature, by the 7th section, intended to enforce upon the subjects of the Crown. The arguments necessarily embrace a very wide field, and no doubt these obligations are the foundation of this legislation; but, in my opinion, they are pushed too far if argued as the necessary limit of a municipal enactment. A belligerent would have no right to complain of a neutral State, so long as it is not affected by hostile acts, or until aid be in some way actually afforded to his adversary; but the neutral State, as between itself and its own subjects, may find it expedient so to legislate that between them it attempt to commit acts of hostility and the completion of them by their subjects an opportunity would be afforded to arrest such completion, where the object is a "prevention of mischief," on which the peace of the country is supposed to depend. I should expect, a priori, that such would be the course adopted. Be this as it may, the consideration of the subject can, for the present purpose, be serviceable at the utmost where the language employed in legislation is in itself really ambiguous; and I think that it cannot be carried to the extent of creating an ambiguity which does not otherwise appear. It is not necessary for me to determine whether this branch of argument is otherwise well founded by a comparison of international obligations with the actual provisions of the Act, for it is admitted that to some extent the latter go beyond them. A third head of argument was founded by both sides on the language and provisions of the American statute. Doubtless it has the same general object, is framed in pari materia, and was the forerunner of our statute. In the circumstances, I see no objection to the making a comparison of the language of the two, and seeing whether by their marked agreement or variance any doubtful meaning of the English Legislature can be more certainly ascertained, and in the same way the authorities of the American courts may serve to guide, though not to govern, our judgments. Now, with reference to the corresponding section of the American Act, as compared with the 7th section of the English statute, it is impossible, on the most cursory glance, not to perceive that, although the former was (judging by the similarity of language) taken as the model of the latter, yet that our Legislature has made very material variations from it. Of these the very prominent ones are the use in the English statutes of the disjunctive for the conjunctive, the extending the prohibition to equipping transports or storeships, the addition of the "or in order" to those "with intent," and the omission in the forfeiture clause of the materials for building the ship—alterations which can only have been made with the same object at least. As regards the American authorities, the case of The United States v. Quincey, 6 Peter's Rep., is most relied on by the Crown. The decision must be admitted to be open to some criticism. There was in that case certainly evidence of hostile preparations, and neither of the questions answered by the court is exactly in point. But it does, nevertheless, appear from several parts of the judgment, that the court would, if necessary, have gone the length of holding, and indeed, they say in terms, "that the offence consists principally in the intention with which the

tions were made." And again, "It is the point on which the legality or criminality must turn and decide, whether the adventure of a commercial or warlike character." I am that and other dicta in the judgment that were disposed to disregard altogether the effect of the preparations. I pass now to the head of the argument addressed to us by both sides, and on which, in my opinion, the judgment of the court was mainly based—viz., on an examination of the statute itself, its object, preamble, and enacting clause: and I own that were it not for the great weight of opinion which seems to exist I should have thought it so difficult to construe as it would appear to be. It is a municipal Act, and is to be construed according to the ordinary import of the language employed. This was the rule of construction stated by Parke, B. in Lyde v. Barnard. The rule of construction is also clearly stated in the Peerage case by Tindal, C. J. thus: "The words are in themselves precise and unambiguous; then no more can be necessary than to construe those words in their natural and ordinary meaning; the words themselves do in such case best express the intention of the lawgiver." And I concur, though with deference, after the able observations of Lord Coke's rule in Hammer's case. He says, "the good expositor of every sentence have its operation to suppress all mischiefs, he gives effect to every word in the statute, he does not construe it so that anything may be vain and superfluous, nor makes expostions against express words." Bearing in mind the rules of exposition, and agreeing with my friend Channell as to the nature of this statute, I think the Foreign Enlistment Act plainly recites the mischief and the cause of it, which it is designed to prevent—viz., "The fitting out and equipping of vessels by Her Majesty's subjects, without Her Majesty's licence, for warlike operations, which may be prejudicial to and tend to disturb the peace and welfare of this kingdom." The language is tolerably plain, and I pass on to the enacting clause, where the mode of offence is stated. The language of it is varied, I think, in some respects studiously varied, in contrast with the preamble. There is introduced in the enacting clause the additional word "furnish;" the copulative "and" is changed into the "disjunctive" "or" to affect the four much debated words, instead of the expression "fitting and equipping and arming of vessels for warlike operations," which is the language of the preamble, the expression is "equipping, fitting out, or arming of any ship or vessel with intent or in order that such ship or vessel shall be employed in the service of any prince, &c., as a transport or storeship, or with intent to cruise or commit hostilities," &c.; it is agreed on all hands that the latter "with intent," may be taken as omitted. The clause is also directed not only against the principal offences stated in the preamble, but against any attempt to commit them, or against the knowingly aiding, assisting, or being concerned in them—offences expressly mentioned for the purpose of the forfeiture. The enacting clause, therefore, is more extensive than the preamble, but I take it to be a clear rule of construction that where that is the case effect must necessarily be given to the larger words of the enacting clause. It would be unnecessarily lengthening my argument if I attempted to review all the arguments on this part of the case. I shall therefore confine myself to noticing some of them in the course of expressing my own views; and, first, I do not think that the Legislature have used any apt words to prohibit building a hull of a vessel as contradistinguished from equipping it for sea and for other purposes.

It seems to me that if such had been the intention it would have been done plainly by the use of the word "build" before the expressions "equip, &c., and that it is impossible for a court to guess that such might have been the meaning, as was argued by the Attorney-General from the use of so doubtful an expression as that of "fit up," rendered more doubtful for such a purpose by its collocation in the sentence, not standing even in the position which it occupies in the American statute first, but placed among expressions plainly signifying acts done on a vessel in existence. And when reference is made to the forfeiture clause, it is to be observed that neither the hull nor the "building materials" are enumerated there; but, as before observed, the latter words, which were to be found in the American Act, appear to be studiously omitted, and no equivalent ones are substituted. The subject was one too prominent to have escaped the observations of the framers of the statute, and I am led therefore to infer that the Legislature had reason for not interfering with the shipbuilding trade as such in contradistinction to the business of equipping ships. It may have been because of its extent and importance, or it may have hoped to prevent the mischief aimed at by less objectionable means, or—and I think that most probable—it may have considered that ample time would be afforded between the completion of the hull and the equipments necessary to enable it to leave the port during which its destination being ascertained, if illegal, a seizure could be effected. Whether I am right in these suggestions or not, I find no distinct prohibition of the building a hull or vessel, and I feel bound, therefore, to say that by building merely no forfeiture is incurred. But I am of opinion that any act of equipping, furnishing, or fitting out done to the hull or vessel, of whatever nature or character that act may be, if done with the prohibited intent, is expressly within the plain language, and also within the evident spirit of the statute. This intent I take to mean an intent of the principal (who has control of the vessel), having directly for its object the employment of the vessel by a foreign State; or in the equipper a like intent; and with such intent a contributing equipments of some kind necessary to such employment, and it is evident that the intents need not be derived solely from the nature of the equipments, but may be proved aliunde. It may not be easy to define, in all cases, the exact point at which the building the hull ends, and the act of equipping or fitting up begins, but that in each case would be for a jury to decide. I will now state some reasons for the construction at which I have arrived. I feel bound, where the Legislature has used different expressions, having different meanings, and has coupled them with the disjunctive "or," not to treat them as if they were coupled with the copulative "and," or as merely redundant expressions, unless I am compelled by the context to do so, but to give effect to each of them so far as they will admit of it, unless I thereby find that manifest injustice or absurdity will result. I do not find that in the present case, and I therefore do suppose that the Legislature attached meaning to the several expressions. I further think it impossible to believe that the word "and" in the American statute should have been so pointedly changed to "or" without object. It was next argued that the four expressions are to be construed as ejusdem generis, the word "arm" being the distinctive feature. But, in my judgment, the use of so many as four different words can hardly have been meant to express precisely the same thing, and it is obvious that the words "equip, furnish and fit out," are used in the sections for some purposes at least to signify something different from the word "arm." For instance, as applicable to a transport or storeship they are so used. Then, these words being there used, as they must be, to signify peaceful equipments, it would seem a very forced construction to say that they exclude the same meaning when applied to a ship intended to commit hostilities, although that ship equally requires peaceful equipments with a transport or storeship. But it was urged, and more particularly by Mr. Mellish, that the several expressions may have a several effect given to them, only that their meaning should be restricted to equipments of a distinctive character, according to the nature of the ship, and, therefore, that a ship intended for war must have warlike equipments. I think that this construction would be, in effect, introducing into the statute words that are not to be found there, which is quite as objectionable as striking out words which are there, or it would be changing the collocation of the language for the purpose of forcing its meaning, for it is not said in the statute that those equipments alone are unlawful which shall make the ship fit in all respects for its purpose, whether as a storeship or to commit hostilities; but those equipments are unlawful which are supplied with intent that the ship shall be employed in the service of a foreign State; and then the several services in which it shall not be so employed are enumerated, the service of committing hostilities being only one of them. Again, it is admitted by the claimants' counsel, that a complete equipment is not necessary to the violation of the statute, but that a partial one is sufficient (if of the distinctive kind), and further, that as regards a war-ship, any warlike equipment, even short of arming, is forbidden, the consequence would be that you may not put one gun-carriage or gun on board without a violation of the statute, and yet by such partial warlike equipment the ship would be no more in a position to commit hostilities than she would if only peacefully equipped. But it seems to me that a strange result would be produced if we were to hold that the statute intended to prohibit only warlike equipments (founded on the words "equip with intent to commit hostilities"), which was Sir H. Cairns' argument; for that reasoning would drive us to say that only such warlike equipments are forbidden which would enable the ship to commit hostilities, as was argued in Quincey's case. The consequence would be that this vessel might have had its pivot guns on board, and yet no offence be committed against the statute, because without the cannon-balls and powder her equipment would still be useless for actually committing hostilities. So that if the intention really were to go out of the port equipped with a full armament, but not to receive her ammunition on board until she was out of the English waters, the 7th section would still not be violated. Again, with reference to the necessity of distinctive equipments, I have not heard that there are any such applicable to a storeship, except the ordinary peaceful ones which a merchant ship requires. And if the argument of distinctive equipments will not hold as to all the several ships pointed out by the statute, I do not think that I have a right to apply it arbitrarily to one class—viz., to ships equipped with intent to commit hostilities. As regards the meaning of the several expressions and the necessity for the use of them in the statute, it may be that the word "equip" in its largest sense would alone have sufficed; but probably an interpretation clause would have been requisite, as it certainly means different things when applied to different subject-matters. In Falconer's Marine Dictionary it is defined as "a term frequently applied to the business of fitting a ship for sea or arming her for war," and I think, therefore, the other expressions may be regarded as in the nature of words of interpretation of the possibly ambiguous expression "equip," and meaning the same as if the words had been a prohibition of equipment, including ships' furniture of all kinds and arms. But because the word "arm" is added to the others, in order fully to express a complete description of the equipments, peaceful and warlike, of a war-vessel, I find it impossible to say that I ought so to construe the section as to deprive the other expressions to which it is superadded of their ordinary meaning. I do not, therefore, in the result find any reason for a distinctive construction. In my view, the prohibitive intent is the main ingredient, and any act of equipping done in furtherance of that intent constitutes the whole offence; for, assuming the same intent to be present in two persons, I do not see the difference between the agent who did put on board a cooking apparatus sufficient for 150 or 200 men, and fitted the stanchions, and the man who might have put on board a pivot-gun to have played over the low bulwarks when ammunition should be supplied by some one afterwards. For both would be done with a common object, and the part contributed by each would equally conduce to the fulfilment of it. Before I could come to the conclusion contended for by the claimants, in the absence of plainer words to that effect, I must believe that the Legislature, when enacting a forfeiture and power to arrest a vessel, meant to deprive itself of all reasonable opportunity for exercising that power, and that too, when the avowed object is to prevent the vessel leaving the English port, and not merely to punish offenders by indictment afterwards. Upon this restricted construction, it is practically plain that the statute would be violated at defiance in one of two ways—either as was done by the Alabama, whose armaments went out in another ship, or, by completing the peaceful equipments first, and then putting on board the guns at the last act in port, probably occupying a few hours at most, and giving no opportunity of seizure or prevention. In fine, I see no more reason for saying that the ship must, in order to violate the statute, be so equipped in our ports with arms to be ready to commit hostilities on leaving them, than for saying that she must be sufficiently manned also, which she would certainly not be in such a condition. I cannot so restrict the statute by construction without feeling that I had virtually repealed it. In arriving at my construction, I do not feel pressed by Sir Hugh Cairns' argument of inconsistency in drawing so sharp a line between the building and equipping, for the same might be said of the distinction which does exist between selling an armed vessel to a belligerent and arming one with the requisite intent under an order of the same purchaser; the line is equally sharp, and the only difference is in the place where it is to be drawn. Indeed, this argument is rather too addressed to the lawgiver than to the expounder, there be inconsistency in the legislation. Admitting as I do in my view, inconsistency in this state of the law, as to what is lawful and what is not, I believe nevertheless, that the lesser amount of inconsistency is incurred by adhering to the ordinary meaning of the language employed as I have above construed it. Upon this view of the statute, in my opinion the proper direction to the jury would have been that they should first look to see if the principal and equippers had the intention which I have above mentioned; and secondly, whether, with such intent, the latter had done any act towards equipping, furnishing, or fitting up the vessel beyond the mere work of building the hull of the vessel, or had attempted or endeavoured to do (and I agree with the definition of the latter which my brethren have given). But, looking at the whole of the direction of the Lord Chief Baron (which I need not criticise at length after brother Channell's judgment), although his Lordship appear to have left the question of fishing, or fitting up to the jury in yet I think there are other passages g-up, which are inconsistent, and ve a tendency to mislead them, and e jury should have been distinctly ents, as before defined, being estab- atisfaction, any act of equipping, in such intention, would be unlawful aning of the statute. I am also of en if my construction of the statute id that it ought to be construed as itended—that is, as prohibiting only a distinctive character, yet that upon ove stated there was sufficient upon t the jury that the claimants had tive equipments within that meaning he evidence to which I allude is the ting stanchions for hammock-racks r apparatus for a crew of 150 or 200 ar-vessel. I do not find that such iven, and I am therefore of opinion ground of an insufficient direction, be a new trial. On the other ground, et was against the evidence, I agree r Channell that it is unnecessary for as I think the rule should be absolute ove stated.

trial the loss was admitted, but the liability of the underwriters disputed under these circumstances.

In Aug. 1857 the ship called the James N. Cooper arrived sea-damaged at Monte Video, with 800 tons of guano on board, which she had shipped at Liones Island, Patagonia, destined for England. A portion of the guano, for the purpose of repairing the vessel, was unloaded and reloaded after the ship had been thoroughly repaired. The ship and cargo was then put up for sale and bought by Da Costa, Brothers, of Monte Video, who re-named the ship Dos Hermanos. They determined to send the ship and cargo to England, and it was arranged that Messrs. Jacobs and Co., of Monte Video, should advance 4000*l.* on the security of the ship and cargo, which were con-signed to the plts., their London agents. This arrangement was carried out, and Da Costa, Brothers, were requested to effect an insurance on the ship and cargo. The policy of insurance now in question was then effected with the company, of which the deft. is chairman.

The policy described "the voyage at or from port or ports in the River Plate to the United Kingdom," &c., "beginning the indenture upon the said goods and merchandise from the loading thereof aboard the said ship at as above," &c.

Brett (A. Cohen with him) for the defts.—It is submitted the judgment of the court below is erroneous. The plts. are not entitled to recover, as the policy did not attach on the guano on board the vessel. The policy states that the risk is to begin upon the goods from the loading thereof aboard the ship, "at as above," i. e., in a port in the River Plate. This guano was loaded on board at another place before the vessel arrived in the River Plate. According to a policy with a clause like this does not attach on goods previously loaded at another place before the ship arrives at the place where the adventure is to commence. Clauses like this are inserted to prevent the liability of underwriters attaching in such cases. The words of the policy are to be construed according to their ordinary meaning, and if plain, as the words in this policy are, the surrounding facts cannot be looked at to control their meaning. The taking out a part of the cargo and then re-loading it, is not a loading of the cargo within the contemplation of this clause, even if it could be considered a constructive loading :

The case of Nonnen v. Kettlewell, 16 East. 176, relied on in the court of Q. B. by the other side, is an exceptional case. Besides, there the whole cargo was ascertained and examined at the port of Lanse-rona, as well as a part taken out.

Milward (Potter with him) for the plt., was not called upon to argue.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the judgment of the Court of Q. B. ought to be affirmed. This was a policy of insurance on a ship "at or from port or ports in the River Plate to the United Kingdom . . . beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises from the loading thereof aboard the said ship at as above." The ship sailed with a cargo of guano from Monte Video, and suffered sea-damage, and the cargo never arrived in England. And the question is, whether the policy ever attached on the guano, because the policy is "beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandises, from the loading thereof aboard the said ship, at as above." It is clear that the cargo in the first instance was substantially loaded at Liones Island, Patagonia, and the ship then sailed, and from stress of weather put into Monte Video in a damaged state, and that a part of the cargo was unloaded to enable the repairs to be done, and then put on board again. And the question is, did the policy attach under these circumstances? The deft. insists that it did not, because of the words in the policy "beginning the adventure upon the said goods from the loading thereof aboard the said ship at as above;" and he says that there has been no loading of the entire cargo at Monte Video. I decide this case on the authority of the decision in Nonnen v. Kettlewell. It seems to me that as far as the stipulation for the loading at the port of departure is concerned, there is as much a loading at the port of departure in the present case as in that case. Here, in consequence of damage to the ship, a part of the cargo was taken out at Monte Video and put on board again after the ship had been repaired; while in that case a part of the cargo was taken out to enable the custom-house officers to inspect and examine the whole and adjust the duties payable, and then reloaded: and Lord Ellenborough held that to be a virtual reloading of the whole, and that the owners were entitled to recover under the policy. I am of opinion that there has been a compliance with the words of the policy according to that case, which to my mind is supported by principle, and I should abide by it, if there had been a conflict of authorities, which there is not. That was not an exceptional case, as was put by Mr. Brett, and his argument on that head, I think, is untenable. A policy of insurance is a mercantile instrument, and is to be construed according to the rules applicable to all written instruments, so as to give effect to the intention of the parties, which is to be gathered from the words of the instrument and interpreted by the surrounding circumstances. If the words are capable of more interpretations than one, it is the duty of the judge, with the aid of the jury, from the surrounding circumstances to ascertain the true meaning. Mr. Brett relied upon the case of Robertson v. French, 4 East, 120, where it was expressly stated by Lord Ellenborough that the same general rules of construction apply to policies of insurance as to other instruments. Lord Ellenborough says, at p. 435: "In the course of the argument it seems to have been assumed that some peculiar rules of construction apply to the terms of a policy of assurance which are not equally applicable to the terms of other instruments, and in all other cases. It is therefore proper to state upon this head, that the same rule of construction which applies to all other instruments applies equally to this instrument of a policy of assurance, namely, that it is to be construed according to its sense and meaning as collected in the first place from the terms used in it, which terms are themselves to be understood in their plain, ordinary and popular sense, unless they have generally in respect to the subject-matter, as by the known usage of trade or the like, acquired a peculiar sense distinct from the popular sense of the same words; or unless the context evidently points out that they must in the particular instance, and in order to effectuate the intention of the parties to that contract, be understood in some other special and peculiar sense." It is a universal rule, that the surrounding circumstances may be taken into account to assist the construction of the contract. In the recent case of Stanley v. Webber, relating to the Assheton Smith estate, this matter was a good deal considered. In Robertson v. French there was no doubt whatever of the meaning of the policy, and there was a full description that the adventure was to be in respect of goods put on board in some port of Brazil. That judgment entirely gives effect to the words of the instrument, taken in connection with the surrounding circumstances, so as to effectuate the intention of the parties. In Spitta v. Woodman, and in the Gottenburg cases to which we have been referred, the construction was so modified as, in my opinion, to defeat the intention of the parties. The question whether the description in a mercantile instrument is to operate as a condition, or a representation, or as a mere description, was a good deal considered in Behn v. Burness, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 202. There my brother Williams, J., who delivered the judgment, goes into a consideration of the rule of law by which written instruments containing words of description are to be construed. Here the words are, "at and from the loading thereof aboard the said ship at as above." There can be no doubt, if the surrounding circumstances are to be looked at, that it was the intention of the parties to effect an insurance on a cargo half way on its voyage to England, and that the subject of the insurance was the guano then on board. The time when the policy begins to run is when the vessel is in the river Plate, and from the loading of the cargo thereof. Are the words, "beginning the adventure on the goods and merchandises from the loading on board the ship in the river Plate," a condition or mere description? I should think that it was a mere description, and not a condition. In Phillips on Insurance, a masterly book, the discussion of this point at p. 511, begins by asking the question, "Whether specifying the risk to begin on the loading of goods is a mere description, or a warranty that the goods shall be loaded at the port named," and at p. 516, the author sums up in the following words:—"This specification of the terminus a quo, unless it appears by the policy to be intended as a warranty of the loading at the designated place, is to be taken as mere recital, or description, or intention, or expectation, being at most an implied representation of the loading, and is to be construed accordingly." It cannot be said that the American lawyers are entirely consentaneous on the point. After all, this is the case of an underwriter who never attached the smallest importance to the place of the loading of the cargo, and I can see no reason why he should be allowed to defeat his liability on this ground. Not meaning to run counter to any of the decisions, I dispose of this case because Nonnen v. Kettlewell is an authority in point in favour of the plts., whether the general question is to be decided according to the meaning of Mr. Phillips, or the stricter construction contended for by Mr. Brett.

BRAMWELL, B.—I do not wish to differ from any decided cases, but to state what I believe to be the true construction of the clause in question. In a policy of insurance the parties first describe the voyage, then the thing to be insured, and then they insert the time when the risk is to commence. I think it may well be argued that the clause amounts to nothing more than this, that the risk is to commence on the loading of those goods which may be loaded in the river Plate, and as to other goods loaded for the voyage from the time of their being brought there. If the loading there had been intended to be a condition precedent, one would have thought that it would have been more fully expressed than it is in this clause. As to Robertson v. French, I think that it is not very clearly reported. It was the case of a vessel which had taken on argo on a voyage from the Cape of to the coast of Brazil, to trade there and ther back. The insurance there was to be made on the return cargo, and what really decided in that case was, that neither argo was insured until the return voyage ended.

the law—Insurance abandonment—Total loss—Evidence.

Under which the master of a merchant without making any effort to save her, without rating with the underwriter, and in the of any immediate peril, is justified in abandoning her, and treating her as a total loss. cannot claim for a constructive total loss unless e that the vessel, being unseaworthy, required which were either impossible at the place where or which would entail upon them an expense as to exceed the value of her when repaired. hat the injuries arose from the perils insured Third, that the sale was justifiable as being pressure of urgent necessity.

as an action to recover from the underfull amount 15,000*l.* on a policy of insured on the passenger screw steamer, the under the following circumstances :
 amer, built in 1847, was built as a warid of greater strength than usual. Messrs. ought her in 1857, when she was therefore ears old ; and after employing her for in the China trade, they insured her for February, 1859, and had her sent home go from Calcutta. Her hull was valued , her engines at 4000*l.*; total 17,500*l.*; ttings and gear would make her, it was worth about 20,000*l.* She left Calcutta and in May called at Algoa Bay, on the of Africa, to refit. She twice left that place not a port, but an open roadstead—topro-voyage, but was twice forced back by rough It appeared that she was hardly in a state such weather. Her hull, though said to was corroded ; her woodwork and rigging ther rotten or defective, and her boilers and ere out of repair. So bad, indeed, were , that soon afterwards, it appeared, they lly work. Beyond all doubt she was in ; and when she had for the third time put Algoa Bay the captain wrote home in July, as “very doubtful” as to her hull ; that eads were gone, and that a rivethead had it. Iron vessels, it should be stated, are n plates, each of which lap over another, passing through each, and fastening them framework, with heads or “nuts” both outside. The rivet which had dropped rse left a small round hole, which let in but, though it was under the sole-plate he engines rest, that was cut away and ugged securely, and no mischief came of

it. However, the ship was in such a state in July, whether from wear and tear or rough weather, that the captain came home to consult the owners, and he conferred with Mr. Lindsay, between whom and himself the whole business was transacted. He made a claim on the underwriters for damage then done, and they “settled” at 4000*l.*, which he received, and then sent the captain back. His instructions to the captain were, he said, to get the vessel repaired and bring her home. While the captain was away in October two severe gales occurred at Algoa Bay, where the ship was riding at anchor, but she rode them out in apparent safety without any visible or sensible injury. In November the captain came back, and still no injury was observed beyond what had already been paid for, and he wrote home that he found the ship as he had left her. The repairs were, he said, proceeding, when, on the 27th Dec., a leak was discovered, which was found to proceed from a small hole in the centre of one of the plates at the bottom, the precise position of which was much in dispute, but which became of less importance when at length it was admitted in effect that wherever it was it could be got at and repaired. The ship’s “log-book” described it as of the size of a rivet-hole, and recorded that the captain ordered it to be plugged (as the other hole had been), and that it was so plugged, and that the vessel then leaked nowhere else, and was pumped dry. The captain had a survey next day, and nothing more was at that time discovered ; but on the 3rd Jan. he wrote home to Mr. Lindsay to the effect that he was so sure the vessel had received a strain that he had no doubt she would have to be abandoned. He gave orders forthwith not only to have the cargo taken out, but even the engines, and they were accordingly removed. On the 16th Jan. Captain Salmon and Captain Joss surveyed her again, and reported that from the state of the internal plates and rivets they should recommend that she be hove down—i. e., turned first on one side and then on the other—in order to expose her bottom for external examination. The captain advertised for tenders for “heaving down,” and had only one tender, for 3000*l.* Some one, indeed, offered him a hulk gratis for the purpose, but Captain Simpson and Captain Salmon, who again surveyed the vessel, advised him not to accept the tender, and he did not deem it prudent to accept the other offer. The third survey was on the 1st Feb., and the two surveyors stated that the ascertained leaks were in several places, but did not state that they had seen them, or where they were, or that they saw any rivets started or any plates loosened. They thought, however, that an external examination was necessary, and that it would be unsafe to heave the vessel down in Algoa Bay. They said nothing as to abandonment, and were not asked to advise about it, nor as to what course ought to be pursued. The Messrs. Lindsay had agents there, but who took care to remind them afterwards that they had sent them no instructions on the matter, and that the captain had considered himself authorized to act on his own judgment ; and Lloyd’s agents refused to offer any advice, as the owners had their own agents there. The captain, therefore, had no advice as to the course he ought to pursue. It appeared that there were several courses open to him. Simon’s Bay, about three days’ voyage from Algoa Bay, is a safe port of retreat at all seasons, and the voyage there at that time of the year was fair and favourable ; a respectable shipwright there told the captain that he could have the ship repaired there in two or three months—that is, in June ; and it appeared that if the vessel could not go there with her own engines there were steamers which could be got to tow her there. Further, divers could have been got to examine the ship’s bottom. However, he did not get divers, nor endeavour to get tugs (being sure, he said, that he could not have got them; nor did he wait for advices from home, though Algoa Bay is only sixty-days' post there and back), but without any advice so to do, at once resolved to abandon the vessel. On the 3rd Feb. he gave notice of abandonment; on the 8th he advertised the ship for sale; and on the 24th he sold the hull (the engines having been sent home) for 200%. The purchaser, it appeared, did not know what to do with her without engines, and declared he did not know why she should have been abandoned. He kept her lying at anchor for several months. He did not take possession till May. She broke her cable and drove on shore; and then he broke her up in July and sold her plates as old iron. Meanwhile the captain, in March, had left for England, which he reached in May, when Mr. Lindsay, approving his abandonment of the vessel, made a claim on the underwriters for a total loss. He and his captain represented at that time that the hole was under the sole-plate of the engine, and so inaccessible to repair; though how the captain came to represent this, or why, even if it was so, the hole should have been less accessible than the former hole under the sole-plate, did not satisfactorily appear. If the captain had been called as a witness at the trial, explanation of these matters might have been elicited in cross-examination; but when, after some of the underwriters had "settled" the claim at 50 per cent., the others refused to settle, the captain, said Mr. Lindsay, returned to Algoa Bay and "settled" there, and there he had since remained, not having been called as a witness at the first trial or the second. The majority of the underwriters refused to pay, upon the ground that the vessel had not been rightly abandoned, for that any injuries sustained by the vessel through perils of the seas were not fatal but repairable, even at sea.

The facts and arguments are fully stated and reviewed in the summing up.

COCKBURN C.J.—There is one point upon which I agree with the counsel on both sides, and that is the importance of this case, on which we have been so long engaged. I do not believe that a more important case ever occupied the attention of a London jury since the time when first at Guildhall commercial causes were tried, for it involves a question of the deepest importance, not merely to the interests of assurers and assured, but involving the interests of the whole of this great maritime community, of our mercantile marine, and of all merchants engaged in our extensive commerce, the question being whether, under such circumstances as have been stated in evidence, the master of a merchant vessel may, without making any effort or endeavour to save her, without communicating with his underwriters, and in the absence of any immediate peril to her, abandon her, and not only abandon her, but sell her, and treat her as absolutely and totally lost. Now, at the outset, let me state the law upon the subject. The plts. here claim in respect of the total loss of the ship; but the ship when abandoned was still a ship. She was not on shore, nor wrecked, nor sunk. She remained as much a ship as ever she had been; and, that being so, her owners cannot claim for a constructive total loss, except under one of two conditions—that the vessel, being unseaworthy, required repairs which were either impossible at the place where she was, or which would entail upon them an expense so heavy as to exceed the value of the ship when repaired. Now, the case the part of the plts. here is not the latter alternative, but the former, that the repairs were utterly impossible. If the plts. make that out to your satisfaction, then you will have further to consider whether the injuries arose from the perils insured against; and you will then have to determine whether the abandonment under the circumstances was justifiable; and next whether, even if a sale was justifiable as under the pressure of urgent necessity. Now we start certainly with a most remarkable fact. Here is a vessel, valued by the owners at 13,500% for hull, and 4,000% for machinery—altogether 17,500%; and we have her cast away not upon a barren, inhospitable coast, far from human help, but while riding at anchor in Algoa Bay. We have her abandoned there and sold for 200%. That is a fact, certainly, which calls for explanation, and it will be for you to say whether under the circumstances the explanation offered by her owners is satisfactory. But, certainly, it is a fact which calls for rigid inquiry. On the other hand, there is nothing to show that this was done for any sinister purpose. Setting aside the high character and position of her owners, they were not over-insured, and the principal owner was under-insured and wanted his vessel home. It cannot again be suggested that from any sinister or criminal motive the captain would have fraudulently abandoned the vessel. The learned Solicitor-General made some observations yesterday on the subject of barratry. It is true that the underwriters insure the owner against loss "from barratry of the captain and crew;" and that, as barratry comprehends a thing that is fraudulent against the owner, or, more generally, if the captain, in violation of his duty, does something fraudulent or illegal, as against the owners, which entails loss upon them, the insurers have to make it good. But if it could be shown that the captain fraudulently abandoned the vessel with a view to give the owners the benefit of the insurance, that would not be barratry against which the insurers would be held to indemnify, for it is an inflexible axiom of law that a man cannot take advantage of the fraud of his own servant intended for his benefit. It is not, however, necessary to enter into that question, for the plts. do not say that they are entitled to recover upon this ground. But the Solicitor-General contended that, if the captain abandoned the vessel from a desire to get rid of his engagement, that would be a fraud upon the owners, and would be barratry for which they could recover against the underwriters. Conceding that for the present to be so, there appears to be no evidence that in fact the master has been guilty of such fraud. Still, it is contended, on the part of the defendants, that he, knowing it would be for the interest of her owners to abandon, did not show the energy and earnestness which he otherwise should, and it is urged that he knew that a large sum of money was about to be laid out upon her, and doubted if she was worth it, and that this was detracted from his anxiety to use all possible exertions to save her. I should deeply regret that anything said here should be considered as in any way reflecting on the character of the captain as having been wanting in honesty or a desire to do his duty to the owners. But, when we are enquiring whether he has exercised a sound and honest judgment in this matter, it may not be unimportant to see whether he has shrunk from meeting the difficulties of his position, whether he has displayed timidity and hesitation, and want of that energy and courage which generally distinguish the character of the most successful mariners of our country. Without imputing to him the slightest dereliction of duty so far as his employers were concerned, you have to consider did all that a sense of duty ought to have done from him. Now there are some remarkable features in this case—circumstances, even though there are no grounds to suspect or improper motives, might well give rise to suspicions that his conduct had not been proper.

The leak which first caused the difficulty was discovered on the 27th Dec., and the captain brought two surveyors on board to examine the vessel, and to advise as to the proper course, though it may be that it would not have been better to have a surveyor connected with engineering, who could have ascertained the state of the vessel, and recommended that the cargo should be removed to see the internal state of the ship. At that time, it is plain from the evidence that it was found out amiss in the ship except the hull was, for aught that then appeared, all right. The cargo began to be removed on the 28th, and up to that time all that was known of the condition of the vessel was that this was sprung. Now, it is material to see the state of the captain's mind at that time and what his conduct was. Before he was aware of the leak, it was amiss in the ship, on the 2nd Jan., if one of the witnesses is true, he spoke as if the vessel was condemned; and beyond all doubt on the 3rd, he wrote a letter to his owners, stating that he "feared the vessel must be condemned."

In short, it is plain that from the very beginning that which was ever present to his mind, and which may possibly have exhausted his energy, was the idea that the ship was condemned. On the 3rd Jan. he wrote to his owners. On the 4th he took a step and began to disconnect the engine, at that time he had no knowledge that the rivets were off and knew of nothing but that the vessel was sprung. Nevertheless, he began to disconnect the engine, which so much of the power of the vessel was dependent on; and still further, if we are to believe the evidence of two witnesses, he took at this time an unprecedented step. According to these witnesses he solicited two of the crew to refuse to proceed on their voyage. It is true he denies it; but one of the men that the captain asked to do so, says that he did so. No doubt a man who would sign a statement in such circumstances may not be a reliable witness. It does not appear that he had any conversation with the captain, and that is what he has never heard before of a captain asking the crew to refuse to proceed on their voyage, on the score of the vessel being unseaworthy? If that were really so, as if the captain had waited without waiting to ascertain the real facts, made up his mind to have the vessel condemned, and was seeking to secure some evidence of himself by obtaining this paper from the crew, that was on the 4th Jan., and from the captain went on taking the machinery and the entries in the log show that men were employed; and on the 10th Jan., a week after the first survey, on the second survey, on the 16th Jan., he recommended that the vessel must be hove down. How did he know that it was admitted now as a fact, that, so far as one of the plates was concerned, it had not been repaired; and the captain admitted that all along he knew that hole might be there, and he was "fearful of other leaks." These circumstances well worthy your consideration, and I think you will come to the conclusion that he was not a prudent man, and that he was pre-hasty, and that, instead of grappling with the facts, he yielded to them; but then these facts may assist you in your judgment as to whether he was right. Well, on the 16th Jan. there was the second survey; and before that time the captain had tried to obtain a tender to heave the vessel down; so that he acted as though, in his mind, there was no doubt that the vessel was unseaworthy, and must ultimately be condemned. Now, the question of abandonment always depends on what a prudent owner, uninsured, would have done under the circumstances. If a prudent owner, uninsured, would have abandoned the ship under such circumstances, then the abandonment will stand. Before you come to that conclusion you must consider the state of the vessel as she lay at anchor on and after the 27th Dec. There are two causes of unseaworthiness alleged—first, the hole in the plate; and secondly, the general state of the plates and rivets. It is necessary to consider them distinctly. As regards the hole, no doubt it made the vessel unseaworthy until repaired, and it would not have been prudent or proper to proceed to sea without its being repaired. Then we come to another and more difficult question, as to the state of the plates and rivets. This is material, not only as to unseaworthiness, but its cause; and whether it was sea damage, or wear and tear. Now, as to the state of the plates and rivets, there is an extraordinary contradiction of evidence—though, perhaps, not so striking out the witnesses who spoke to the state of the rivets as indicating straining or wrenching; because, so far as I am aware, there is only one witness—Gilley—who speaks to rivet-heads as having been wrenched off or bent. The first survey states nothing as to the rivets; the second, on the 16th Jan., states that (the cargo and engines having then been taken out) the surveyors were able to make a careful examination of the ship's bottom, and that, from the internal state of the plates and rivets, it was necessary to have the vessel hove down. They speak, you see, only vaguely of the "state of the rivets," and don't say whether it arose from the violence of the sea or from straining. In their evidence, one of them (Joss) stated that he found in the engine-room rivet-heads worn off, and several plates also worn; but he did not observe that any of the rivets had started, and though the hole was recent, "the state of the rivet-heads might have been going on for some time." The other surveyor (Salmon) stated that, in examining the neighbouring plates, they found a great many of the rivets started and bent. He is the first who states that; and it is observed that it was not stated by him until he came to England, and had found out what would be the value of such evidence in the case. There can be no doubt that if the rivets had started, the plate would be loose and let in water. He could not have meant to state that they were so, and did let in water, or he would surely have spoken positively of a fact so important. Beyond all doubt some of the rivets were worn and corroded; but the question is whether they were "started." Such being the evidence of Joss and Salmon, the evidence of the latter on that point is supported by Gilley, who says he saw the rivet-heads off as if wrenched off. He and Salmon are the only two witnesses in the case who speak to rivets being started, except the captain himself, who in his evidence states that he saw some "apparently started." His evidence goes further than that of the others, and if you believe him implicitly as to the general condition of the ship, there can be no doubt as to its general unseaworthiness, for he says that the iron plates and rivets in the bottom were injured, and some of the rivets off, and some of the plates "apparently started." That, no doubt, would be serious, but you see he does not, as Salmon and Gilley do, speak of rivet-heads being bent or wrenched off. He only says some of the plates were "apparently started." On the other hand, North, the chief officer, says no plates were loose, and no

LINDSAY AND OTHERS v. LEATHLEY.

[NISI PRIUS.]

rivets started, wrenched, or bent; and so says the stoker, who, however, may not have seen the engine-room when cleared of the engines. But it is strange that North should have failed to see all these loose plates and started rivets. Joss does not speak to them, you observe. And if such was the state of the plates and rivets, it is strange that it should have been omitted from the survey; and it is remarkable that in no letter to the owners does the captain mention that the plates and rivets were in such a state. Yet he wrote on the 16th Jan. as well as on the 3rd, and he had already intimated his conviction that the ship must be condemned. Yet he does not say one word as to the state of the plates and rivets, and speaks only of the hole! Nay, further, he made a protest on the 25th Jan., and afterwards an act of abandonment; and in neither did he make any mention of the state of the plates and rivets. Then the defts. strongly contend that there could have been no straining in the gales of Oct., because from that time till the vessel was abandoned the ship was quite dry, except the leak from the hole; and there was a great deal of evidence to show that the plates could not have been wrenched or loosened without the water being let in. There is one witness, and only one, who spoke to other leaks than from the hole, and he only in cross-examination. That was Salmon, who, being pressed as to the causes of abandonment, said at last that there were other leaks, having said nothing about it in his examination in chief. But in the log-book we may naturally expect to find reliable evidence, and on the 27th Dec., the very day the hole was discovered and stopped, the entry is, "In the course of half-an-hour all quite tight; the pumps sucked out dry, and found the vessel not making water in any other place." And I have looked into the log from that day to the end without discovering any trace of an excess of water in the ship. Added to which, there was a witness who stated that the vessel was dry, and required to be pumped only once a fortnight. If this be so, then it is for you to consider whether there could have been such straining and starting of the rivets as supposed. Where the plates have started one expects to find leaks; and I have looked carefully through the log-book to find any traces of any other leakage than from the hole, and have failed to do so. And it is a very remarkable fact that if there were other leaks no mention is made of them or of the places where they were found. It is true that the third survey speaks of "ascertained leaks in several places." But it is clear that Mr. Simpson had not ascertained them; for he says he took the state of the facts (except as to his own inspection of the hull), from the other surveyors. He does not mention them. And it is strange that if there were other leaks there should be no mention of them in the log-book, where everything of the kind is recorded, nor in the protest, nor in the act of abandonment, nor in the letters of the captain. It is plain the captain had discovered no others, for in cross-examination he said, "I knew the hole could be temporarily repaired, but I was fearful of other leaks." He would not have said he was "fearful" of other leaks if he had discovered them. And neither Joss nor Gilley say a word as to other leaks. Now, it is admitted by all the witnesses that, where there has been straining of the ship so as to cause starting of the plates and wrenching of the rivets, water will come in. The plt's. own witnesses said so. Thus, Mr. Simpson, a trustworthy witness, said, "Unless the plates leaked they could not have been much strained." So Mr. Gilmore,— "If the plates were wrenched and loosened, I should expect to find leakage." So Captain Benson and Mr. Bailey and Mr. Murdoch (Inspector of Machinery to the Royal Navy), and Captain Champion and Captain Aitken

(who for years commanded an iron steamer), and Mr. Grantham, the engineer—all concur that if the plates were started there must be leakage. Then, if there was no serious leakage, could there have been straining? And another argument against the fact of straining arises from the absence of all other indications of it. There is a great body of evidence to show whether if there were straining it would show itself in the bottom or in the upper works. Mr. Bailey says, in both. There seems to have been no such indication in the upper quarters. Mr. Simpson said a steamer would, if riding at the bows, strain at the "bits." So said Captain Benson; so Mr. Robinson, surveyor of the Peninsular Company; so Mr. Cook, engineer of the Royal Navy; so Mr. Grantham and Captain Aitken. It is for you to say, upon the evidence, whether you are satisfied that there was a straining of the steamer such as would cause the rivet-heads to be wrenched and plates loosened. Suppose you were so satisfied, then you would have to consider whether the unseaworthiness, by reason of the state of the rivets and plates, was such as to require the vessel to be hove down. This again depends upon the true state of the vessel. If there was all this straining and wrenching of plates and rivets, it would, of course, be proper to have the vessel examined. You must, I should think, be satisfied that the hole could have been repaired. If that were all, there were appliances on board for its repair—a forge, and iron, and three engineers; and there is no doubt that it would be repairable. But the state of the rivets and plates would be a different matter, if you were satisfied that the ship was unseaworthy in those respects. It is, therefore, extremely important to satisfy yourselves on that point. And even supposing that the state of the plates and rivets, so far as actually ascertained, was not such as to render the vessel unseaworthy, still you would have to consider whether that, so far as it was ascertained, raised a reasonable presumption of the existence of further mischief, such as would make it incumbent upon the captain not to adventure the lives of his crew and the safety of his cargo without having the vessel examined in order to ascertain her state. Here, again, the question depends upon what you believe to have been the appearances manifested in the vessel, prior to such examination. If you think that, though there was an absence of leakage and other signs of straining, yet that the rivets were wrenched and the plates loosened, then you would not consider the captain would have been justified in proceeding without such examination. On the other hand, if you think that there was not such a starting of the rivets and nothing which ought to have excited reasonable apprehensions, then there would be nothing to justify abandonment or require further examination. Now, upon that point there is evidence on both sides on which you must form your judgment. But one is struck with this, that no one seems to have been so far apprehensive at the time, either before or after the discovery of the leak, as to take the trouble to ascertain the fact whether there was any other leakage; and so far as appears, the vessel remained tight. It is for you to say whether you think that it was so essential to submit the vessel to a further examination that the only alternative (if it was impossible) must be entire abandonment. That is the important question. It may be that it was desirable; but was it so essential that, if it was found impossible, the state of the vessel was such that it must be sacrificed? That must depend upon your view of the state of the vessel as actually apparent, and the symptoms presented, and whether they were or were not such as to show, or to raise a fair presumption, that its state was such as to render further examination essential. It is not every idle fear that may fall upon the mind of a feeble or

l man which can justify him in throwing away sel; you must say whether, so far as could be tained, the state of the vessel was such as to general unseaworthiness, or raise such a nable presumption of it as to render it essential there should be a further examination of the al. If so, what was it the duty of the captain
? It appears that in Algoa Bay there was no no dock, no means available to heave the ship n, and it was said that the vessel could not be down there. That is for you to consider. If think that, considering the expense and risk, it ld not be desirable, then the question would still ain whether the only alternative was entire donment. That is the great question for you.

great difficulty I feel in the case is that it ed to be considered that the only alternative abandonment. It was said there was a chance sing the vessel. But even if so, was it not worth e to run some risk to save a vessel worth 000l? The question is whether, as there was a ice of saving her, and the only alternative was abandonment, the experiment ought not to have ried. What right had the captain to sacrifice vessel without giving the underwriters the on, at all events, of trying to save her? The on why the law requires notice of abandonment at they may have this option. And then, sup-ng you think that nothing could have been e at Algoa Bay, you will have to consider ther nothing could have been done at Simon's
. The startling fact is that nothing was done, nothing was tried to be done. Because a ain man wants 3000l. to heave the vessel down, ship is abandoned. There are two questions as Simon's Bay—Could the vessel have been hove and repaired there? and, if so, could she have got there? There is much evidence, on both s, on both these points. There was a ship there, ch was finished in September. Simon's Bay is rt which is always safe and secure, and it is a al depôt. It is only three days' voyage from oa Bay. It was summer, and the wind was lly favourable. Doubtless there are tempests that coast, but the weather cannot always be pestuous; and the captain could have chosen own time for the voyage. The difficulty I find hat nothing was done. Nothing was tried. It said no one suggested Simon's Bay. But captain knew of it, having been there himself; if you are of opinion that the ship could have got to Simon's Bay and could have been ired there, and ought to have been taken there, the captain do his duty to the owners? But sup-ng you should be of opinion that it was not aticable, was the only alternative abandonment?

it is the great question for you. As I said at the set, the question whether, so long as a ship ains a ship, the owner is at liberty to abandon and claim as for a total loss, depends upon ther, if he were uninsured, he would, in the rcise of that ordinary prudence which men ought ring to the conduct of their affairs, have abaned her. If in that state of things, if uninsured, would have thrown away a ship worth 14,000l.
taken 200l. for it, and that would have been a dent course to pursue—then the owners are itled to recover. Or, again, if the captain, acting behalf of uninsured owners, and acting as he did, ld be justified in abandoning, then they are ened to recover. But if an uninsured owner, in the rcise of ordinary prudence, would not have acted e did, or would not have approved his so acting, they are not entitled to recover. Now ask your-es, putting yourselves in the position of unind owners, what would you have done under the umstances? Would you have abandoned the el? Mr. Lindsay says he should have done so, for that he could have done no more. He, no doubt, believes so; but from long experience I know that the infirmity of human nature easily biasses men's minds; and the question is not whether he sincerely thinks he would have so acted, but whether you are satisfied that he would have done so. The captain admits that no one advised him to abandon. Mr.

Simpson proposed to add to his report a recommendation that he should not abandon without consulting the owners. Unhappily, Mr. Salmon interposed and prevented that most salutary advice, which, had it been given and taken, would no doubt have saved us all this litigation. In the face of such a recommendation the captain could hardly have ventured to abandon. Unfortunately Mr. Salmon interposed to prevent it, and you will consider how far that may detract from the value from his evidence. It was the most unfortunate incident in the history of this case. The captain had no advice from any one to abandon, and, though he could have had an answer from London in two months or ten weeks, he did not wait for it, but proceeded not only to abandon, but to sell. Now, even supposing he was justified in a ban-doning, was he justified in selling? The captain can only sell subject to these conditions—there must be an urgent necessity; and it must be for the interest of the parties. Where was the urgent necessity? What need of such hurry to sell? The ship lay at anchor in the summer, and could have lain there, and, indeed, did so for some months. But she was sold, and for the price of old iron. Suppose the captain had waited an answer from the underwriters, would they not have made some efforts to save a vessel, the hull of which was worth 13,000l? Unless you see that the sale was for the interest of the parties concerned, and urgently necessary, it was not justified. And if not, then, although there might be no bad motive, there was no total loss. It was not enough that the captain exercises an honest judgment. He must also exercise a sound judgment.
Not that it is required that he should be infallible.
He may be mistaken. So might the owners or underwriters. But the question is, whether, under the then existing circumstances, his judgment was fairly and reasonably sound; and whether men exercising ordinary prudence would have sold that vessel. If not, then the debt. was entitled to the verdict. It is no doubt important that insurances should be upheld; but the whole system of insurances, spreading over the large sphere of our commercial operations, depends upon good faith.
And, as the authority which the law vests in the captain of a merchant vessel is liable to be abused, its exercise must be held rigorously to those conditions which the law prescribes, and the captain must exercise a judgment reasonably sound for the interests of all who are concerned. Then, as to the other part of the question—whether the injuries arose from sea damage or "perils of the seas"—the theory suggested by the plts. of the blow from a piece of wreck, was negated by some of their own witnesses, while the counter theory of the underwriters, that the bilge water wore the rivets, was supported by some of the plt.'s witnesses, for instance, by Mr. Gladstone. Remember that the underwriters do not insure against all loss or damage, but only against perils of the sea, the sunken rock,
the dangerous sand, the storm which overwhelms, and the sea which swallows up. For these things they are liable, but not for natural decay and inevitable wear and tear. All things human wear away with use and time, and the unseaworthiness which entitles the owners to recover must have been caused by perils of the sea. So much, then, upon the question whether there has been a constructive total loss. Next as to the question of a partial loss from perils of the sea, or sea damage. Mr. Lind- say says that even if there was no constructive total loss, and his captain was bound to have taken some of the courses suggested to save the vessel, he is entitled to recover the expenses which they would have entailed, and he has given you his estimates on that head. I own I doubt whether, as in fact he did not take any of those courses, he is entitled to recover such expenses—the expenses of measures which he did not take. But that point of law may be reserved. Taking all the evidence into consideration, you are now to consider the question thus presented to you; first, as to total loss, and next as to partial loss. The great question is, whether the captain did rightly in abandoning this vessel, and still more in selling her without communicating with her insurers. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the question, for the reasons I have mentioned. Every man who sends a ship to sea places her in the power of her captain, and the captain is bound to exercise a sound as well as an honest judgment. And in this case, if you do not believe that he did so in abandoning and selling the steamer, you cannot find for the plaintiffs for a total loss. The Lord Chief Justice, in conclusion, handed the jury a written paper containing the questions for their consideration, which we give with the answers so far as they were given:—

I. Reference being had to what a prudent owner uninsured would have done, was the damage which the ship had sustained, and the circumstances in which she was placed, such as to justify the master in abandoning and selling her?—No.

Subordinate questions involved herein:—

1. Was the ship unseaworthy?

(a). As to the hole in plate?—Yes.

(b). In other respects and specifically as to plates and rivets?—Yes.

If so:—

2. Could she have been repaired in Algoa Bay so as to be fit for voyage to England?

(a). As to the hole?—Yes.

(b). If necessary as to the rivets?—Very doubtful.

3. If the ship was unseaworthy—but so far as the unseaworthiness was ascertained, capable of being repaired—was there a reasonable presumption of unseaworthiness in other respects, so as to make external examination of her bottom necessary?—Yes.

4. If so, was heaving down the proper course?—Yes.

5. If so, ought an attempt to have been made to heave the vessel down in Algoa Bay?—No.

6. If the ship could not have been hove down in Algoa Bay, so as to be examined, and, if necessary, repaired, ought diving apparatus to have been tried?—Yes.

7. If the ship could not be hove down in Algoa Bay, ought she to have been taken to Simon's Bay?—Not without consent of owners and underwriters.

Could she have been hove down, and, if necessary, repaired there?—Yes.

Could she have been made seaworthy at Algoa Bay for the voyage to Simon's Bay?—Yes.

Could she have been protected on the voyage so as to provide for the safety of the crew?—Yes, by convoy.

8. If all these questions answered in favour of plaintiffs,

(a) Was abandonment justified?—No.

(b) Would a prudent owner uninsured have abandoned?—No.

9. Was the sale justified as matter of urgent necessity; from inability to repair and proceed on the voyage; and also from the probability of still further loss from delay to the parties interested?—No.

Would the circumstances have properly admitted of delay while the captain communicated with the underwriters?—Yes.

II. Was the damage (a) either to the plate in question, or (b) to the other plates and rivets result of sea damage? or did either result from wear and tear and corrosion?—Answer as to (a): "From combined effects of wear and tear and sea damage."

III. Is the amount paid into court, 7 ps sufficient to make good the partial loss? 1. As to the injury actually found existing. 2. As to expenditure necessary for heaving down, etc., and if further sea damage ascertained, repaired.

If not, jury to say how much more would such partial loss.

When the jury had retired,

The Lord Chief Justice said there was no opinion, such an entire absence of evidence to justify the selling the vessel, that, in the event of a verdict for the plaintiffs for a total loss, the reserve leave to the defendants to move to reverse that point.

The jury were absent about two hours.

At a quarter to six the jury came into court and said that they were unable to agree on a question, viz., how much should be paid by the defendants as to a partial loss in addition to the sum already paid into court? They stated also, that they had to the fact that the captain should not have done the vessel without communicating with underwriters. They had not, however, specific answers to the questions submitted to them, and the Chief Justice accordingly requested them to retire again in order to give their replies to the questions, as well as to reconsider the question as to the amount the plaintiffs were entitled to for a partial loss.

At twenty minutes past six the jury returned, and the learned Judge read out the following questions to them, which they answered:—

I. Reference being had to what a prudent owner uninsured would have done, was the damage which the ship had sustained, and the circumstances in which she was placed, such as to justify the master in abandoning or selling her?

Which is divided into these subordinate questions:—

1. Was the ship unseaworthy?—

(a) As to the hole in the plate, the jury answered—Yes.

(b) In other respects and specifically as to plates and rivets,—Yes.

2. Could they have been repaired in Algoa Bay so as to be fit for voyage to England?—

(a) As to the hole,—Yes.

(b) (If necessary), as to the rivets, doubtful.

3. If the ship was unseaworthy, but, so far as the unseaworthiness was ascertained, capable of being repaired, was there a reasonable presumption of unseaworthiness in other respects so as to make external examination of her bottom necessary?—Very doubtful.

4. If so, was heaving down the proper course?—Yes.

5. If so, ought an attempt to have been made to heave down the vessel in Algoa Bay?—No.

6. If the ship could not have been hove down in Algoa Bay, so as to be examined, and, if necessary, repaired, ought diving apparatus to have been tried?—Yes.

7. If the ship could not be hove down in Algoa Bay, ought she to have been taken to Simon's Bay?—Not without assent of underwriters and owners.

Could she have been hove down and repaired there?—Yes.

Could she have been made seaworthy at Algoa Bay for the voyage to Simon's Bay?—Yes.

Could she have been protected on the voyage so as to provide for the safety of the crew?—By convoy.

these questions are in favour of plt., then the abandonment justified?—No.

Would a prudent owner uninsured have abandoned?

Is the sale justified, as matter of urgent necessity from inability to repair and proceed on, and also from the probability of still further delay?—No.

Are the circumstances have properly admitted while the captain communicated with the insurers?—Yes.

Is the damage either to the plate or the result of sea damage or wear and tear?—Combined.

What is the amount of the average loss, if it should be only an average loss?

On this last question, the jury could not agree and were again sent back. Before they retired a further discussion took place in the presence of the Chief Justice and the counsel as to the parties could not agree upon a sum to be paid upon as the amount of the average.

—We are willing, as before, to leave this matter to the average stater to settle.

Solicitor-General.—We have had an eight days' trial, and we wish to have the amount found.

Judge.—We think the amount had better be left to the average stater.

On the parties not agreeing, the jury again retired. On their return the parties again conferred and arrived at a final settlement of terms, so as to terminate the case without any of the law reserved being left open.

Solicitor-General said they had agreed that a bill should be withdrawn, and each party pay his own costs. Cotterill, the solicitors to the underwriters, agreeing to pay over to the plaintiffs the £1000. out of the sum of 5000l. paid into the court by the underwriters, the residue of that sum was paid over to the underwriters.

THE CHIEF JUSTICE observed that it was a case in which the parties had not agreed before.

—So we would, my Lord, but we could not. We had never before agreed had it not been for the intervention of the jury, so far as it was given. And the settlement has saved a long litigation, ending in the H. of L.

At the moment the settlement was agreed to the court was ready to deliver their verdict, which it was said would have been for 2500l., including the costs, and into court on all the policies.

ADMIRALTY COURT.

(IRELAND.)

Filed by WILLIAM CHAMNEY, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

THE MARYANNE.(a)

Salvage—Special agreement as to seamen's services—Ditto as to masters' services—The Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 182.

Agreements with the owners by the masters of a vessel as to a percentage on the earnings of the vessel by seamen as to increased wages, for foregoing services for salvage, will not be upheld by the Court of Admiralty, as being repugnant to general principle and judicial to the public interest, and as the effect of such agreements would be to take away from the salvors the motives to all enterprise and energy.

In the case, in which the derelict barque and cargo which sold for 2700l. was saved from total destruction, but saved without risk to life or limb, the Court considering it a case of meritorious salvage, although not of first-class merit, awarded to the salvors the sum of 1080l., or "two-fifths" of the value.

The Court, in distributing a sum awarded for salvage, will award very liberal remuneration to a steam-vessel specially built for and devoted to salvage services, inasmuch as she is not employed in general trade for the conveyance of goods and passengers, and depends entirely on her chances for public encouragement and support.

This was a cause of derelict salvage, instituted by the new Steam Tug Company (Limited), on behalf of themselves as owners of the steam-tug Resolute, 374 tons burden, and 200 horse power, and on behalf of the master and crew against the barque Maryanne, of Falmouth, 796 tons burden, and cargo, for salvage services rendered by their tug, who found her derelict in the Atlantic Ocean, and brought her and her cargo safely into the harbour of Cork. The property had become vested by operation of law in the Alliance Marine Insurance Company, as underwriters on ship and freight, and in the Glasgow Underwriters, and Underwriters' Association of Dublin, as the underwriters on cargo. The case had been closed at both sides and stood for judgment. But an application was by permission specially made in support of the claims of the master and crew of the steam-tug to be considered entitled to a salvage reward, notwithstanding the evidence in the cause, that the crew, by a special agreement as to the amount of their wages, and the master, by another special agreement on his part, to a certain percentage on the earnings of the steam-tug, had bound themselves to forego all salvage claims.

Drs. Townsend and Chatterton, Q.C., and William O'Brien, for the promovents.

Dr. Gibbon for the derelict; and Dr. Elrington for the master and crew.

KELLY, J.—The Court of Admiralty in cases of salvage, has uniformly refused to admit such agreements as are here relied on as barring the rights of the master or seamen to salvage, and held that it would be repugnant to general principle, and prejudicial to the public interest, if such a proposition could be legally maintained in cases of that description, as the effect of it would be to take away from actual salvors the motives to all enterprise and energy. The case of masters of vessels is still under the protection of these equitable decisions; that of the seamen, however, has since obtained an additional guarantee, as by the Merchant Shipping Act, sect. 182, it was expressly enacted that every stipulation on the part of a seaman to abandon any right he might have in the nature of salvage shall be wholly inoperative. Their claim in the present case must be therefore admitted. This is, confessedly, a case of salvage rendered to the barque Maryanne and her cargo, found abandoned at sea, and brought to port in safety by the salvors. The Resolute, a steam-tug, and her crew, who performed the service, are the property and in the employment of a company in Liverpool, who, seeking a new field of enterprise, have embarked capital to a large amount in building and equipping this and other vessels of a similar description, for the purpose of towing large vessels many miles out to or in from sea, and with the still more laudable purpose of going out to search for wrecks and vessels in order to bring them into port. The steam-tug which in the present case has performed this latter office is stated in the evidence to be 374 tons burthen, and as fitted up with disconnecting engines of 200 horse-power, but really effective to 500 horse-power, with two distinct

THE MARYANNE.

engines to work her windlass, with the whole of her deck aft left altogether clear for the operations of her towage, and furnished with Manilla hawsers of superior strength and manufacture, and cost a sum of 13,000/. Seeking neither for freight or passengers, and devoted exclusively to the useful purposes for which she had been so skilfully and powerfully constructed, this tug, having coaled and victualled at Cork, sailed from that port on the 7th Jan. last into the Atlantic in search of derelicts, her orders from Liverpool having been to that effect. Beating about without success until the 9th, she spoke a schooner, who informed her that a vessel without sails had been seen by her to the south-west. The tug, altering her course accordingly, at length, after the lapse of two days more, sighted the vessel on the morning of the 11th, about twenty miles off, one point on her port bow. On coming up the master of the tug boarded her, and found her to be the Maryanne, a fine barque, 796 tons, timber laden, and totally abandoned. She was sunk to the water's edge, her main deck, with most of her upper beams, broken, her bulwarks amidships and stanchions washed away, her rudder gone, her masts, rigging and spars all standing, but the sails blown away from her yards, her chain cables on board, but foul and in confusion, and her papers, instruments and valuables taken away. She was full of water, the sea rolling over her deck, and her cargo of timber, which was full to the deck, was kept down alone by a few beams which were still unbroken, and which barely held the ship together. There was neither binnacle, wheel, nor cabin furniture. The master ordered the engines of the steam-tug to be disconnected, and the tug to be brought to the starboard bow of the derelict, a hawser was hove in by means of a hauling line, and made fast round the foremast, there being apprehension that if it had been made fast round the windlass the strain would have pulled the bows out of her. The derelict being thus secured, the master returned to the tug and the towage began, it being then about midday of the 11th Jan., and the distance to Cork harbour, which he was anxious to make, about 325 miles. The hawser parted near midnight, but being made fast next morning by a shackle to a chain cable of the derelict, the service was carried on without interruption, day and night, until the evening of the 15th, when the harbour was reached, and on the next day she was brought up and anchored in safety in the upper part of the harbour. It was then ascertained that the Maryanne had sailed from Quebec on the 13th Nov. previous with a cargo of timber, bound for Grangemouth; but having met with storms and been disabled by the disasters which ensued, her master and crew, on the 11th Dec., took to their boats, and abandoning her to her fate, arrived themselves safely in Cork, from which they afterwards departed on other ventures—and she meanwhile floating about (her cargo being a buoyant one), was ultimately found by the salvors in this case, on the 11th Jan., a complete wreck, just two months after her leaving her port of departure. It appeared in the evidence in another branch of this case that the several insurances which had been effected on ship, cargo and vessel had been paid by the several underwriters concerned, as in a case of total abandonment, and that thus acquiring their interest, these parties now are defending this suit—a suit instituted on the part of the salvors in order to be awarded remuneration for their services. It is to be observed that a necessity having arisen to sell the ship and cargo, in order to ascertain their actual value, that has been done, and the net amount of sales now lodged in court abiding the decision in the case, is a sum of 2700/. It is conceded that the property which realised this sum was derelict, and was paid for by the underwriters as for a total loss; and it is also conceded that but for the salvors it would have been a total loss for ever. The general rule of the court of awarding to salvors in such cases a proportion varying from one-third to one-half of the value of the property is appealed to, the right of the court, however, to bend that rule so as to meet the various degrees of merit in each case, being admitted by both sides. Under such circumstances, it is right to observe that this was a perfectly voluntary service; that it was one also predetermined upon by a steam-tug of most superior build and equipment constructed for such occasions altogether, with crew engaged and paid and victualled for the express purpose, who cruised during a course of ten days in the western Atlantic, in a north latitude of 49 deg 22 min., in the month of January, at a distance from land between three and four hundred miles, and succeeded after a continuous labour by towage for four days and nights unceasingly in bringing into a harbour of safety a vessel of double her own burthen, and with a water-soaked cargo, although of great value. It is right also to observe that this was done notwithstanding the impediment arising to the towing vessel by the derelict being without a rudder, and that thereby she escaped the heavy gale which commenced to blow the very evening she entered the port, and which, had she encountered six hours earlier out at sea, must have caused her destruction, kept together as she was by a few beams only, and with nearly 300 tons of weighty ballast in her hold. Again, on the other hand, it must be borne in mind that, whilst the service was being performed, the weather was moderate, the sea flowing in a long swell, no risk to life or limb, the steam-tug's men on board their own vessel every night as usual, the days of actual labour four only, and the distance actually travelled less than 400 miles. With these views and counter-views, the court is of opinion that the salvage, although decidedly not of the first class of merit, is nevertheless meritorious, and considers it just to all parties to award two-fifths of the value—being the sum of 1080/.—as remuneration to the salvors. The question of the distribution of this sum is not to be determined, and here the peculiar circumstances of this case become as prominent as they are novel. In the early history of salvage the exertions of the salvor, as they constituted almost the entire service, so they monopolised the entire reward. Presently, as skill in navigating and using boats, as well as damage incurred in the use of them, by degrees put forward their claims for a share, courts of salvage began to consider them as in some, but in a very minute degree, entitled. Then, and lately too, came the stage, when a learned judge said: "We all know that formerly claims of owners of vessels to participate in salvage did not receive very favourable attention; but since then things are much changed—steamers are able to render important salvage services, in which the ship herself is the chief agent, and I, therefore, have departed from the former practice, and given adequate rewards to the owners of such vessels." This court may, using these expressions, say with reference to the present case, "things have much changed since then;" for this is not the case of a steam-vessel employed on owner's business with freight or passengers, risking the market for that freight, or the insurance on that voyage, should the master at his own peril deviate to help a vessel in distress, and that, too, but half provided for the purpose; but the case of a steam-tug, built and equipped in all points for such a purpose, and for nothing else—that her market, that her insurance, that her voyage, that the end and aim of her whole adventure, and of her owner's enterprise, is to render salvage services. Under such circumstances the steam-tug becomes not the chief actor only,

[IRELAND.]

THE PATRIOTTO.

[IRELAND.]

of, as to utility, almost the exclusive one. The Patro, for the first time, rank only in the subordinate class. It becomes then the duty of this court, as in the case referred to, to depart from the former practice, and to take care that the rewards given to owners of such a vessel be adequate. The court awards, out of the amount awarded, apportioned to the steam-tug company the sum of 800*l.*; the remainder it distributes as follows amongst the master, engineer, and crew, considering it right, however, to notice that although their conduct was negatively good, they during the progress of their service by means exhibited that skill and adroitness which is incumbent on them, and also called for under the circumstances:—To the master, 80*l.*; chief engineer, 70*l.*; chief mate, 30*l.*; second engineer, 15*l.*; Morris, a seaman, who showed most zeal, 12*l.*; 10 seamen, 8*l.* each, 16*l.*; five firemen, 8*l.* each, 40*l.*; boy, 2*l.*; total, 380*l.* The salvors are to have their costs.

Voyage—Materials—Kettle-money—Conduct-money—New hiring—Costs.

Three seamen sign ship's articles for a specified service, and before the voyage has concluded, the captain agrees to give one or more of them increased wages; the Court will not bind the owners by such an agreement; and will only make its decree for the wages properly payable under the ship's articles.

The Court will award kettle-money and costs to petitioners claiming for wages, and substantiating their claims; but will not give conduct-money in the case of a British registered ship.

A decree for materials will be made on funds in court retained by the sale of the ship, but the payment must be prior to the claims of the seamen for wages.

This was a suit for wages and materials. The petitioners claiming wages was filed by Giuseppe Giacomo, a master, Eugene Mattia, the mate, and nine seamen, the crew of the Maltese brigantine, Patriotto, which her on the proceeds of her sale, 410*l.*, then court, to recover wages due to them for their services on board of her. Their joint claims amounted to a sum of 276*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*, besides conduct-money, kettle-money and costs. By the ship's articles it appeared that this vessel, 215 tons burden, property of Vincenzo Capria, of Corfu, in the island of Malta, had been bound on a voyage on Constantinople to any ports in the United Kingdom or continent of Europe, calling at a port, required, for orders; from thence to any port in the Mediterranean; voyage not to exceed ten months. She sailed with a cargo of corn on the 18th Sept., arriving at Cork, which was subsequently arranged to be the port of discharge, on the 30th March following—last March. During the voyage she had been obliged to raise money on treasury at Constantinople, at Valetti and Cagliari. Her discharging her cargo and waiting further fees at Cork, whilst lying there she had been taxed and sued by the holders of the last treasury bond, who had in consequence obtained a decree of the court against her for its amount, 6*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, under which decree the vessel had on sold, the produce of that sale being then in the plying, and not yet applied. It was against that in the master and crew now claimed payment for their wages, as having a lien antecedent to all other demands. Upon the part of the mate and three of the seamen there was a claim also for extra wages from the 2nd Nov., the day the vessel left Malta. As it appeared from indorsements on the articles the mate had been re-engaged that day at a higher rate of wages, and the three seamen rated also at increased payments. The petition for materials was filed by John Christie, James Harris, and John Eccles, of the county and city of Cork, who had supplied stores of various kinds for the fitting out of the vessel, and meat and provisions for her crew when on board, during the months of April, May and June. The case was, by consent, heard videlicet.

Dr. Ehrington appeared for the master and seamen; and Dr. Townsend for the other petitioners. The owners did not appear by an advocate.

KELLY, J.—The petition of the material-men must be pronounced for, to the amount of 32*l.* 1*s.* 4*d.*, but all further directions as to its payment must, for the present, be deferred, until the exact amount of the funds, subject to the disposal of the court, be ascertained, and the prior charges also satisfied. The petition for wages, which stands on a different footing, as being a lien antecedent to all others, is now to be considered. The court is satisfied that the hiring and services of the master and crew of this vessel have been well proved, and no evidence has been offered in disproof. Had the petition merely prayed for payment, in accordance with the stipulated hiring, the decree of the court should go as of course. That is not the case, however, as the mate and three of the petitioners claim beyond that stipulated hiring. The allegation on their part is, that when the vessel was, during the course of her voyage, lying in Malta Harbour on the 31st Oct. last, the mate was re-engaged for the remainder of the voyage at a rate of wages much higher than that for which he had hired at the beginning of it, and that the master had consented to increase the wages of Bagelari, Esposito and Poesich, the other three claimants under this petition. Now, a claim of this nature, being in derogation of the original contract, requires to be examined into with scrupulous attention, as the circumstances of it must indeed be very exceptional to take it out of what has been and is the declared law, both of the Court of Admiralty and the common law courts. The ship's articles have an indorsement signed by the assistant-superintendent of the port, at Malta, that Mattia, the mate, had been discharged, and afterwards engaged upon the terms mentioned in the articles; but the court in looking at these terms finds them identical with those of the original hiring. That indorsement then does not support his claim. The master's evidence is next appealed to, and that evidence is, that the mate was not discharged, but reinstated at a salary of 4*l.* 4*s.* per month, instead of 3*l.* 12*s.*, the original hiring. Upon this admitted fact, namely, that the mate was not discharged before the fresh contract, the court will guide itself by the settled law. In Harris v. Carter, 3 Ell. & Bl. 559, where a plt. under such circumstances was nonsuited, Lord Campbell, C.J., was of opinion "that the nonsuit was proper, and ought not to be disturbed. Had the plt. (he said) been relieved from the obligation which he had contracted towards the shipowners, he might have entered into a fresh contract, and under some circumstances the captain might have had authority to bind the owners by entering into a fresh agreement on their behalf with him. Had there, for instance, been an entire change of the voyage, it might have been so, but here there were no circumstances of that kind. The voyage remained the same for which the men had shipped. There was no consideration for a promise to the plt., and the captain had no authority to bind the owners." He then concluded with saying: "It would be most mischievous to commerce if it were supposed that captains had power under such circumstances to bind their owners by a promise to pay more than was agreed for." Crompton, J. adds: "I should be very sorry to let it be supposed that there was the least doubt in this case." The mate's claim for additional wages must therefore fail. The evidence as to the claim of the three seamen calls for a decision upon a different principle. The indorsement on the articles states that the increase of wages to them was by consent of the master; but the master's testimony is, "that they would not sail otherwise—that they were imprisoned at first for refusing to go, and that then they consented when put on the increased rate." Now all the reasoning in the case just cited applies to this claim also; moreover, there is here strong evidence that what is called in the indorsement on the articles "a consent" was a consent under compulsion—the master thinking it a wiser choice of evils to comply with the demand of these men for higher wages than to hire others at a higher rate or to sail away short-handed. In The Araminta, 18 Jur. 793, the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty of England, when similar circumstances were under his consideration, said: "I strongly incline to the opinion that if there were a contract for any award beyond the wages stipulated for in the mariners' contract, it would not matter whether the contract were compulsory or voluntarily, it would in either case be illegal, and such was the effect of all the cases." Upon all these authorities, then, the Court considers the contracts, upon which the claim for extra wages are founded, to be illegal, and pronounces against them. The wages due, and to be allowed by the court, must be calculated in accordance with the several rates stipulated for in the ship's articles. For the several sums when so computed, together with kettle-money and costs, the petitioners shall have their decree; but the court refuses conduct-money, this being the case of a British registered ship. The decree was accordingly entered for 250*l.* 1*9s.* 6*d.*

Collision—Lights and look-out—The Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 296—Costs.

In a suit of collision, where the impugnants plead that it was caused by want of proper lights on board the promovee vessel and this plea is positively denied, the court will carefully examine the entire of the evidence, and decide the question upon the general accuracy and trustworthiness of the respective witnesses.

Where there is the risk of a collision, if two vessels continue on their respective courses when first seen, both vessels are bound to port helm under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 296, and if one of them ports in proper time, and the other neglects to do so, and a collision takes place, she will be held liable to make good all the damages caused by her default, and pay the costs of the suit.

The absence of a good look-out in hazy weather on board the impugnant vessel will go far to induce the court to hold her liable in a suit of collision.

This was a suit of collision instituted by the registered owners, the master and crew of the brig Nereid, of Belfast, 149 tons burthen, Joseph Ferry master, against the registered owners of steamer Semaphore, of Belfast, 380 tons John Campbell master, to recover compensation for injuries it was alleged they had severally in a collision which took place between vessels on the 4th Oct. last, in the Irish whereby the brig was sunk and totally lost as the petitioners alleged, to the gross and want of nautical skill of the captain of the steamship. The damages sought recovered amounted to a sum of *£*4000 which included the full value of both cargo, and the personal effects of the crew. The Court was assisted by Cayville, R.N. and Lieutenant Crosby, a nautical assessor, and the case was, by heard vis à voce. The facts appear full judgment of the court.

Drs. Todd, Townsend and Ebrington for the petitioners.—The case was one of total loss, and resp. were the sole cause of the collision gross negligence in not having a proper look-out the petitioners were entitled to be awarded the value of their respective losses. They cite

KELLY, J. (addressing the assessors) now my duty, after due consideration of evidence, to present to you the several circumstances of the case, which, upon a careful review, have been established, in order that you better enabled to assist me with your own judgment and experience respecting certain issues which my judgment must mainly rest upon. You have had the advantage of being during the entire progress of the trial that you will have but little difficulty in following me as I proceed. About five o'clock on the morning of the 4th of October a collision occurred in the Irish Sea, about 10 miles north of the Calf of Man, between the brig Nereid, of Belfast, a brig of 149 tons burthen, bound for Cardiff with a cargo of coal, and the steamer Semaphore, of Liverpool, an iron steamer, of 380 tons and twenty-nine guns, bound for Belfast with passengers and cargo. It was found that collision was damaging to both vessels. They came together nearly bow to bow, the bowsprit of the Nereid being broken off, the bowsprit of the Semaphore being carried right off, and her foretopmast carried right off; the Semaphore's starboard bow carried off the Nereid's stanchions, nightheads and past the luff of her starboard bow and board bow anchor. The water rushed in on both sides of the Nereid's stem after the collision and a hole was made in her starboard one foot from the stem, and about one foot from the bowsprit. The Semaphore, on the other hand, all bowsprit and all her foretopmast were nothing forward hurt, had received a fracture of one foot square over her topgallant masts, twelve or fourteen feet from the stem to the board bow, and was also stove in nearly a full of her starboard side, about fourteen or fifteen feet from her stem. She, however, succeeded in making her port of destination. The Nereid, in half an hour after the collision, filled and went to the bottom, and, with her cargo and effects, sustained a total loss. For some time, and immediately previous to the collision, the courses of the vessels had been, that of the Nereid S.S.W., and of the Semaphore N. by E., consequently they were upon opposite directions, and one point only between them. Upon this there is no controversy. The wind at the time was S. E. and fresh, proved by the masters of two sailing ships, and was conceded by the depts., and the Nereid going closed-hauled on her port tack about three and a half knots an hour. That is also admitted. On the other hand, the Semaphore, being a steamer, was going free about eleven knots an hour, according to the evidence of Captain Finlay, a competent witness, was steering admirably. It may be borne in mind, that at the hour named it was the master's watch in both vessels, and that the masters of both vessels were then on deck. The evidence of the master of the Nereid is as follows:—About half past four in the morning he descried at once, from the report of his look-out, a bright light about three or five miles off, one point on his port or weather bow. That light proved to be subsequently the bright masthead light of the steamer. Holding on his course, he, in about eight or ten minutes, made out a green light, the same bearing as the light on his port bow. He still kept his course waiting for the light, as, until he saw it, he could not know the steamer's course in order to shape his own. After about seven minutes he opened that red light broad on five points on his port bow, and about one mile off, and upon that at once gave orders to the man at the helm, beside whom he was standing, to keep the Nereid off, and to give her full. These orders were at once obeyed, and the Nereid, under the influence of her port helm, was put off half a point, being at the moment quarter of a mile distant from the Semaphore. He had, however, taken scarcely two or three steps along the starboard when he saw the green light open again, and the Semaphore coming right down on him. Seeing that a collision was then inevitable, he ordered his helm down to ease its effect, but as that was scarcely second before the Semaphore was close upon him, the Nereid did not alter her head at all. He ran forward to catch the Semaphore to save himself, but as he got to the windlass end of the deck he fell over the shock of the collision. The evidence of the man at the helm corroborates this statement, as also that of the other witnesses of the plot, and they are not contradicted. On the opposite side, the evidence of the master of the Semaphore is this:—He saw the Nereid when reported by his look-out, about one-fourth or one-third of a mile off, from one to two points on his starboard bow. She was sharp by the wind and seemed close-hauled, and her yards seemed to be at an angle. She was approaching him. He knew at once she was on his starboard one or two points, and made her out by his naked eye, and saw that she was approaching him across his bows. He did not port when he saw her, but was of opinion had he then ported he must have run every one on board her. He saw her one minute and a half before the collision; he was going about eleven knots, and the Nereid three and a half. He put his helm hard a-starboard and stopped the vessel; his vessel would fall off one or two points in a minute, and had time to fall off; the Nereid did before he put hard a-starboard. His second, agreeing in the rest of this evidence, states that the Semaphore starboarded before the Nereid ported; but Thompson, the look-out man, had the best opportunity of the three for observation, says: Agreeing with the master that when he reported her she was porting, going off to starboard, and when the signals were given she was going more off to starboard, and was porting. He further adds, that the Semaphore had paid off under her starboard helm. The man at the wheel corroborates this last fact; and it should be here observed, that in the 9th article of the defensive plea of the Semaphore, it was under the circumstances thus sworn to by each, that, in order to avoid a collision when both vessels saw what was likely to occur, the master of the Nereid ported and the master of the Semaphore put hard a-starboard. It is rather a singular fact that neither party challenges the truth of the other as to these circumstances. Your assistance will be, therefore, most necessary to determine where the error lay. Considering the evidence of the master of the Semaphore, that he first saw the Nereid about one-fourth or one-third of a mile off, approaching across his bows on his starboard bow one or two points, that seems to be the very moment of time when the master of the Nereid, according to his evidence, first saw the red light about a quarter of a mile off; and thus the evidence on both sides would agree in this, namely, that about one minute and a half occurred between that sighting and the collision, and that the two vessels were then one quarter of a mile asunder. There is established, then, by the evidence, this state of facts, that these two vessels, approaching each other from opposite directions, with but a point between them, and both conscious that they incurred the risk of collision, should they continue in those directions, that with common consent, they determined to do something to avoid that risk; and, accordingly, the one and the other starboarded. The Nereid ported after she had the Semaphore's red light broad four or five points on her port bow. The Semaphore starboarded after she had seen the Nereid port. I need scarcely mention to you that the law never did leave cases of this kind without some fixed rule to regulate them by. The Merchant Shipping Act has laid down the rule that in such cases both vessels should port so as to pass on the port side of each other, except circumstances existed to justify a departure from that rule; and that such circumstances did exist in this case is the defence, and, if proved, the justification of the Semaphore. The plea first put forward with that object by her, is that the Nereid did not port in time, and a very sufficient plea for that object, provided it be established by the evidence, and you should so advise me. Now, in examining that evidence, it is to be remembered that the Nereid was sailing from north, on a course S.S.W., and the Semaphore from the south, on a course N. by E. Referring again to the evidence of the master of the Semaphore—that he saw the Nereid about one-half or one-third of a mile off on his starboard bow; that she was approaching him; that in a few seconds she was approaching him across his bows; that he would fall off one or two points in a minute, and had time to fall off; that she ported before she starboarded; and to the evidence of the look-out, that when sighting the Nereid at first she was giving more port-helm and porting as she neared him, the court cannot discover how such a plea as that she ported too late can be maintained. Here it may be observed that the duty of all shipmasters is, under all circumstances, to do what is right, each on his own part, properly and fairly presuming that the other will do the same on his part. But how strongly contrasts with this plea the evidence of the master of the Nereid, in which he states his reason for not porting until the time he did, namely, that until he had opened the red light of the Semaphore he could not know her course, or decide upon his own, and that as soon as he had opened it he did so at once, and that sailing as he had been under the influence of port-helm, half a point more was quite sufficient to keep away. But again, it is not clear how this alleged delay could have prejudiced the Semaphore, as both the master and mate appear to have determined all through that they would not, under any circumstances, have ported the Semaphore, their evidence being that if both ships had ported when first sighted there would have been a collision. These matters I will, however, submit to your nautical judgment. Another and a very substantial ground of defence has been pleaded on the part of the Semaphore; that is, that the Nereid had not exhibited lights according to the statute, whereby the collision was occasioned, and she was disentitled on that account to sue in that or any court whatever. In regard of the fact here alleged, the presumption that a party upon whom a duty under a penalty was imposed had properly fulfilled that duty was urged on the part of the Nereid, but such a presumption cannot be urged if strong or sufficient evidence exist to rebut it. There exists, however, a strong probability against it, as it is scarcely likely that the master of the Nereid, looking as he was for at least fifteen minutes upon the Semaphore's lights as she approached, and knowing their vast importance, to enable him to ascertain her course and decide upon his own, it is unlikely that, at the same time, he should have forgotten or neglected to exhibit his own. Passing by altogether, without further observations, these mere preliminaries, I must assume the duty of examining the evidence itself which has been given in support and denial of this plea, perfectly conscious that with regard to that evidence I must act upon my own sole responsibility, performing, with regard to it, the duties of a juror. In support of it no fewer than eleven witnesses have been examined, five of whom were the master, second mate, and three seamen of the Semaphore, and six were passengers on board of her. Of these latter two only saw the Nereid, for the first time, one minute or immediately before the collision; the other four not until after it. Now, the state of the Semaphore at and after the collision is described by the second mate to have been one of great confusion, between the fears of the passengers—some of whom were females—and the dangerous appearance of the Semaphore herself, as she had filled in her fore compartment, and sunk down by the head above her hawse holes. At such a moment of time a steady or accurate examination of the Nereid's lights was neither likely, or to be expected; the Nereid herself, after passing off to leeward, momentarily filling and going down, and being herself a lower vessel in the water than the Semaphore. Accordingly, the evidence of these six witnesses, with one exception, is very general—the answer from each and all of them being the same—“they did not see the lights,” and “if there were any they must have seen them;” the exception, however, is a remarkable one—Captain Finlay, the master of an East Indiaman, then a passenger in the Semaphore. This gentleman admitted that “the red light of the Nereid might have been burning without his seeing it.” Now it is to be remembered that that was the light of the Nereid's portside. The master and crew of the Semaphore have given their evidence in precisely the same terms—they saw no lights—had there been lights they must have seen them. One of them, the second mate, refused to say that the Nereid had not lights. Of these witnesses, moreover, three only saw the Nereid before the collision, viz., the captain, the second mate, and the look-out; and for that reason their evidence, although like all the other testimony on this point of a negative character only, required minute examination; but such examination must be with reference to the accuracy and consistency of their evidence on other points of material importance; and if by such a test, the only one in my power, are found to be little worthy of dependence accuracy of observation or of statement, court can scarcely be called upon to altogether upon their observation or statement with regard to this question of the lights. I first, with regard to their evidence as to telegraph signals, the captain swore that he gave both these signals; the second mate swore that he himself, and not the captain, gave them; and the look-out swore that the captain gave the one and the mate the other. Next, with regard to their evidence as to the captain being on the bridge before and the time the Nereid was sighted, the captain swore that he was, the second mate that he was not, and the look-out contradicted the mate; and again, with regard to the look-out man, the captain swore that he knew at the time who was the man, and the mate swore that the captain asked him afterwards who the man was. These discrepancies tend to shake the credence which the court might otherwise be induced to give to the testimony of these men, and compelled it, in the exercise of a proper caution, to require corroborating evidence. Such, however, was not to be had; but, on the contrary, there was evidence on the part of the Nereid, full, positive and circumstantial, that she was provided with proper lights: that they were burning brightly and were previous to and after the collision; that they had been set up the night before at seven o'clock: that they had been burning at four o'clock the morning of the collision, and just about one hour before. The master of the Nereid described their place on the ship's sides with great particularity, and the lighting of the signal lantern and the green light when they were pulling off in their boat. The Nereid went down. Laidlaw, the mate, he was the man who lighted the signal lantern at that light; Parke, the steward, swore that he cleaned and trimmed it that morning on board before the collision; and Boyle, a passenger on board the Semaphore, deposed that he saw the red light on the Nereid. Here, then, were witnesses swearing to the same, as well as different particulars of a fact within their own knowledge, and who, upon other points of equal importance in the case, have sworn consistently with each other and without exaggeration, and corroborated, already observed in the leading points of it, by evidence on the part of the Semaphore. Mr. Taylor in his book on Evidence, observes, “That the question, in trials of fact, is not whether it is possible that testimony may be false, but whether there is sufficient probability of its truth—that whether the facts are proved by competent satisfactory evidence,” and he defines such evidence as being that amount of proof which generally satisfies an unprejudiced mind beyond reasonable doubt, so as to convince it that it would act upon conviction in matters of important personal interest. In applying such principles to the evidence adduced on the part of the Nereid, as compared with that on the part of the Semaphore, I can come to any other conclusion than that I have been satisfied by the former, beyond reasonable doubt, that the lights of the Nereid were exhibited by her before the occurrence of the collision in question. I consider, therefore, that the defendants have failed their proof in support of this ground of defence. There remains now but one matter more for consideration of the court—that alleged by the petitioners in their 22nd article, that a sufficient look-out had not been kept on board the Semaphore. According to the evidence of the captain of the Semaphore the place for look-out on board that vessel was on the fore-castle when in rivers, and on the bridge when in the open sea—giving as the reason that when hipped water forward. Now, the captain's vessel was set at half-past two o'clock he look-out in that watch was placed at fore-castle, and at about half-past four or passing the Calf of Man, was called up by the second mate, and stood on the deck of it about midships. The morning at and up to the time of the collision, was as dark and hazy, the evidence of the being that a vessel without lights could be a quarter of a mile off, and with lights two or three miles off was a more elevated position on the fore-castle. The look-out admitted that the vessel was lifted but little and lay mostly on the water so that he could see objects on the water as he looked under than over that haze; for such purpose the fore-castle, which was used to look out from, was a better place than the bridge, to which the mate had gone up. The captain states that he was on the bridge at the same time with the look-out and second mate; but the latter officer, as more than the captain, swore that the captain was not there, but had been there from the time the look-out came up until the collision, which was full minutes after. The mate admitted that he was not forward with the look-out, but on the bridge, and did not descry the Nereid look-out reported. The amount of this evidence, was, that the duty of the look-out at that very critical time entrusted to one here the evidence of Boyle, the passenger on the Semaphore, becomes of importance. As he had gone upon deck about one hour before the collision. He stated that at that time there was no one on the fore-castle, and no one on the bridge. The credit of this witness was set against the corroboration given by the second mate on another point, namely, that some time before the collision the captain called out to the look-out that he was on the bridge at the time of it. These details simply before you, I shall now give my opinion upon the following points:—

THE SEMAPHORE.

[IRELAND]

Considering the respective courses upon which the Nereid and the Semaphore were sailing on the night of the 4th Oct., the half-hour immediately before the collision, was there risk of collision if they continued in those courses, and if risk, what was their common duty in order to avoid it? Was the Nereid justified in delaying to open the red light of the starboard helm, or did that delay in any way contribute to the collision?

Was the Nereid when she saw the Semaphore steering down upon her with a starboard helm, in starboarding her own helm, or did she, in any way contribute to, or cause the collision?

Was there a sufficient look-out kept on the Semaphore previous to and after the collision?

Whether, within the time and distance reported to the Semaphore, the latter vessel had time sufficient to avoid the collision by adopting proper measures?

Was starboarding the Semaphore the duty to adopt under the circumstances, or should it have been done by her? and if so, Do you attribute the collision to the fault of both vessels, or of one only, and, if so, of which vessel, and on what grounds, giving your reasons.

THE JUDGE having retired with his assessors, after a absence of an hour and a half returned and announced that they had given the following answers to the questions proposed:

—We consider that there would have been no collision had both vessels continued on their respective courses as first seen, and under this belief we are convinced that both vessels should have ported.

To second—The Nereid was perfectly justified, and the delay of not porting could not, under the circumstances, contribute to or cause in any way the collision.

To third—We consider the Nereid was fully justified, to save herself as far as she could, in putting her helm to starboard, at that time the collision being inevitable.

To fourth—We are not satisfied that there was a vigilant or active look-out kept previous to and up to the time of the collision.

To fifth—We consider that there was sufficient room and time to avoid the collision had the steamer instantly ported on seeing the brig under the influence of her port helm.

To sixth—We consider that starboarding at the time of seeing the brig was erroneous, and we are convinced that it was the steamer's duty, for every reason, to have ported.

To seventh—We consider the Semaphore solely and wholly to blame for the collision, for the reasons assigned in all the foregoing answers.

Collision—Lights—The Merchant Shipping Act, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104—Appeal to Court of Delegates—Costs.

In a suit for collision to recover damages, as in the case of a total loss, the impugnant vessel will be held liable, if she ported her helm when she should, under all the circumstances, have starboarded, and if she was herself the cause of the collision, in not exhibiting coloured lights as required by the statute.

This was a cause of collision brought by the owners of the schooner, Sydney Jones, of Carnarvon, 79 tons register, Maurice Jones, master, against the brigantine Swan, of St. John's, Newfoundland, 170 tons burden, Jordon Pike, owner and master, under the following circumstances: On the 10th Nov. the Sydney Jones and four hands sailed from Portmadoc to Limerick, with a cargo of slates, and on the 17th of the month was, in the prosecution of her voyage, about six miles off Kinsale Head, steering W.N.W., the wind blowing fresh from S.W. At half past six o'clock that evening, the wind still blowing fresh and the night dark and rainy, she descried a bright light about half a mile to westward and two points on her weather bow, being at the time close-hauled on her port tack. The light continued to approach, and in a very short time crossing the bows of the schooner she was discovered to be the Swan, of St. John's, going free on her starboard tack, and steering a course E. and by S. She was on a voyage from St. John's to Waterford, with her master and sole owner and eight hands on board, and her cargo was salt, fish and herrings. The schooner, being close-hauled, continued on her course; and the Swan, crossing it, and appearing one point and a-half on the lee bow of the steamer, put her helm hard down, and luffing up in the wind four points, was coming down so close on the schooner, that the latter vessel, seeing a collision was inevitable, in order to deaden the weight of the blow, put her helm hard a-starboard. The consequence was, that immediately the jibboom and stem of the Swan struck the schooner on the starboard quarter, and did her considerable damage. The master and crew of the schooner abandoned her, and she was subsequently brought in by salvors to Cork. The damages claimed were made up of the direct damages, and the salvage and demurrage as consequential, and amounted to a sum of 566/. His Lordship was assisted by nautical assessors, and the case was, by consent, heard viva voce. The facts appear fully in the judgment of the court.

Drs. Townsend and Chatterton, Q.C., for the promovent.—The Swan was solely to blame for the collision in not having exhibited proper coloured lights, and should make good the loss sustained by the owners of the schooner. They cited

Drs. Gibbon and Ehrington for the impugnant.—The schooner was herself the entire cause of the collision in not putting her helm to port, and the want of coloured lights in the brigantine had nothing whatever to do with it. They cited

KELLY, J., addressing the assessors, said:—It will now be my duty briefly to direct your attention to those points of the case upon which an issue has been knit, as the consideration of them will be necessary in order to enable you to draw the proper conclusion, namely, as to which of those parties is in default, or whether both or neither is in default; for under any one of those shapes the result may present itself. The main facts of the case are stated without contradiction by either sides. The party promovent was steering W. N. W., and the impugnant E. by S., courses which are one point distant from each other. The wind was S. W. by S. The defts. going at a rate of six of six-and-a-half knots an hour, and the promovents about four knots an hour. The tonnage of the two vessels are also beyond dispute, the promovent vessel being 79 tons; and the deft. about 168 tons; and there were four hands in the former, the smaller vessel, and eight hands in the latter. These two actors in the scene are going on opposite courses, a point asunder, one vessel about double the size of the other, and one crew about double the number of the other: the wind being in this position, that the larger vessel was going what must be considered free, and the smaller vessel close hauled on the port tack: in fact, one was close hauled on the port tack, and the other free on the starboard tack. The point of distance from the land, was about six miles from the old head of Kinsale; and the time of collision is also pretty well ascertained. It was about six o'clock in the evening, upon a dark night, with small rain; but both sides agree that lights would be seen at a certain distance, and both vessels had lights. The party promovent had lights according to the present statutable regulations, namely, a green one on the starboard, and a red light on the port side. The other vessel, which is a colonial ship, had one light at the end of the bowsprit, a clear bright light, and it is in evidence in regard to this clear bright light, that it was lighted early in the evening. Regarding the coloured lights, there is strong evidence that they were lighted at half-past five o'clock; but, on the other hand, there is some evidence given of a contrary nature, to induce the court to suppose that these coloured lights were not lighted until immediately before the collision. However, it is not very material to come to any conclusion on that point, for the evidence is this, that a few minutes before the collision, the coloured lights were seen by the people of the Swan. The case as to the lights pretty well comes to this, that about ten minutes before the collision, the people of the Sydney Jones saw the light of the Swan; and by the admission of the captain of the Sydney Jones, his own coloured lights were not seen by the Swan for four or five minutes after. The mate of the Sydney Jones states, that it was four or five minutes before the collision, that the white light of the Swan passed the bow of the Sydney Jones, which bears out the evidence of the captain, who says, that four or five minutes passed before he saw the lights; we have therefore this remarkable fact put forward by the people of the Sydney Jones, that four minutes elapsed between the time they saw the Swan approaching, and the people of the Swan saw her, the Sydney Jones lights. We have the plt.'s vessel in this precise condition. She is on the port tack, close hauled, and going about four knots an hour, W. N. W., and seeing, according to the mate's evidence, about half to the quarter of a mile off a white light on her port bow. We have her in the condition of having seen the light ten minutes before the collision. She continues to see that light until in about four minutes when she sees it crossing her bow. We have it in evidence, that she bore on her course, close hauled, going at that rate, and doing it for the four minutes, in other words it may be said, she sees a vessel unmistakably approaching towards her, and unmistakably on the opposite course to that which she was on herself, and we have it in evidence, that from the first moment she saw her crossing her bow, she continued on her original course. Seeing her approaching thus, and there can be no reasonable doubt entertained that she must have seen her course, what did she do under the circumstances? It appears on the evidence, that she simply did nothing but hold on her course. The question then, at this first stage of the case, in which the Sydney Jones saw the Swan fast approaching, the latter not having seen her, is, what ought the Sydney Jones to have done? It appears on the pleadings and proof on her part, and was also relied on by her people, that under the circumstances, the old rule of the sea, namely, that a vessel going free should give way to a vessel close-hauled, the latter continuing her course, should be held to apply. This rule of the sea was relied on by the captain of the Sydney Jones, for we have it in evidence that he twice stated it to the master of the Swan, and that he considered himself justified in relying on that rule of seamanship. The question now is, under the circumstances, was it applicable, seeing a vessel approaching so that she was evidently nearing him and crossing his path more and more. Was it right that he should hold on, justifying himself by that rule, from any consequences which might arise or be legally upheld in holding on that course? It becomes my special duty to state when any such question of law arises, what the law is. That that had been the rule there can be no doubt, but from time to time that rule has been modified, and what has now become the law is to be found in the 296th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104). That section is as follows: "Whenever any ship, whether a steam or sailing ship, proceeding in one direction meets another ship, whether a steam or sailing ship, proceeding in another direction, so that if both ships were to continue their respective courses, they would pass so near as to involve any risk of collision, the helms of both ships shall be put to port, so as to pass on the port side of each other; and this rule shall be obeyed by all steamships and by all sailing ships, whether on the port or starboard tack, and whether close hauled or not, unless the circumstances of the case are such as to render a departure from that rule necessary, in order to avoid immediate danger; and subject also to the proviso that due regard be had to the dangers of navigation; and as regards sailing-ships on the starboard tack; close ed, to the keeping such ships under command." not denied, that if the circumstances of the case established this as a fact, that the Sydney Jones, steering W.N.W., saw the Swan approaching her, steering E. by S., and that those two vessels moving towards each other and continuing in opposite direction, by so continuing would be as near as to risk a collision, that then this law must be followed. That being the very class of case for which the law was made, it is binding under all such circumstances, save only one, and that is this, where a departure from it is necessary in order to avoid immediate danger, for then the law of self-preservation, or doing the best under the circumstances, is the course followed; and therefore I shall put it to you to say on the evidence, would these vessels have passed so near each other as the law of this statute contemplated? In the history of such cases in the Court of Admiralty, frequent attempts have been made to get out of the binding force of the rule, and to show that ships did their duty; but the firmness of the judges was called on to back the policy of the law for the preservation of life and property, and they persevered in holding it, except under circumstances of immediate danger, there should be an implicit obedience to the rule, which ought to be well known, and which I have no doubt is well known among seamen. If, under the circumstances in which the ships were placed, these vessels were bound to pass each other on the port side, you have it in evidence and pleading, and not denied but justified, that the Sydney Jones did not comply with this rule. The statute regulates the conduct of each vessel, and according to the statute it was the duty of the Sydney Jones to port, unless justified in not doing so by some immediate danger. Now, were there circumstances of such immediate danger to justify a non-compliance with this rule? You will consider the case from the evidence, and answer that question, and if you consider there were such circumstances of danger, we then have a justifiable departure from the rule resting on those circumstances. I am bound to state that, if you conceive implicitly that these two vessels, approaching so that they would meet, and have come into collision, could both have ported, such condition will involve heavy penalty on the Sydney Jones, as it would commit her in this court, for that is one effect of a non-compliance with the statute. That will be our first and most serious question, and it is a question of large moment, and goes to the whole of the case before the court, and involves the consideration whether, without the statutory cause, so wise a rule as this, so much observed upon by me, should be put aside. I am addressing gentlemen of long experience in a perilous profession, who are to assist with their opinions upon this point to keep me from going wrong, and enable me to give such a judgment that, while it satisfies the rights of the parties, will keep the law inviolate. Then comes the second part of the case, which belongs more peculiarly to the deff. The case of the deff. is this, that about four or five minutes before the collision he was right ahead of the Sydney Jones, and saw her red light and green light, saw her close-hauled, and crossed her course W.N.W. No ignorance is imputed for her crossing, or of her position, and it is stated that she was but a cable's length off in the leadings, and from fifty to sixty fathoms in the evidence. The difference between the witnesses on this part of the case is very little indeed. The evidence of the captain of the Sydney Jones and the witnesses on the other side made only a difference of forty or fifty yards in their respective accounts of the distance. Here the question of the look-out becomes material. There is but a minute's difference in time as to the seeing of the coloured lights.

Jones said that they could not be seen for four or five minutes, and the other witnesses said about four minutes. There is but a minute of difference, and it may be concluded that the ships were about fifty or sixty fathoms asunder at the time they both saw each other. At this the second stage of the case, where the Sydney Jones and the Swan saw each other, it will be for you to say on the evidence whether each vessel did that which was usual and proper. The Swan's evidence is this—that the look-out reported the coloured light of the Sydney Jones, and the distance of the two vessels; and the captain of the Swan, who had just gone below, hearing the confusion and order to starboard given, ran up and ordered the helm to port, and that although the boy at the wheel answered "starboard," he did not obey that order, but obeyed the order of the captain only. Now this evidence shows, that immediately the Sydney Jones was seen, the rule of the road was complied with by the Swan. Her evidence further states, that before that time the look-out of the Swan saw no light ahead of her or round her. The man who was on the look-out said he saw nothing, and the captain and his son, and the second mate, say that they saw nothing until the moment those lights appeared, and that then the order was given by the man on deck. Immediately they see the light, the captain made his appearance on deck, and gave the order to port, and that order alone is complied with. It will be for you to say whether that was a seaman-like and proper act under the circumstances. That that act was done, and done in that way, there is no evidence to contradict. The evidence of the Sydney Jones takes ten or twelve yards from the alleged distance, but differs nothing upon the question of time; and it will be for you to consider, and not for me to tell you, which way you should lean; and it will be a very difficult matter under the circumstances, where the two vessels were coming so close to each other, to do otherwise than suppose that the time given was, upon the average, the correct time, and that the correct distance was also given. All this time on board the Sydney Jones, it is clear that nothing was done but to alter her helm; then when the Swan was seen luffing up, it is beyond doubt that the helm of the Sydney Jones was put hard to starboard; it is admitted and justified, and said it was done to soften the blow, and prevent the mischief that was then inevitable, as much as possible. That the collision took place is beyond doubt, but whether from the Swan's stern or starboard bow, or how, is not of much consequence. The question for you is—was the act of the Sydney Jones at that moment, a necessary and seamanlike act? It was contended by the captain of the Swan, that if she held on, and had not starboarded, she would have gone clear, as he had ported. You will be the best judges of that, and should you be of opinion with Captain Pike, you will tell me so; but on that I must leave the conclusion altogether in your hands. You will be able from the distance to say, whether, if she continued her course after the Swan ported, she would have gone clear. It was pressed by one of yourselves on the captain, that if both vessels held their courses, they would have cleared? The question was put more than once, and he negatived it more than once, and said that nothing could have prevented a collision. An answer of that kind is for you, and my judgment must be in your hands. I cannot form so strong an opinion in my own mind, as to say that I should rely on that statement, and I therefore leave it with you. There is other evidence in the case, with which you have nothing to do. On the subject of abandonment I was referred to a case full of good sense, which I will read shortly for you. It is the case of the Linda, Swa. Adm. Rep. 306. In that case, just as in this, a vessel having suffered damages by collision, was abandoned by master and crew, and a question of the amount of salvage in consequence of that abandonment having arisen, the question also arose, was that abandonment justifiable. The learned judge is reported in that case as follows:—"He said he would require to be satisfied that the master had wilfully abandoned his vessel when he might have saved her; or that he had abandoned her through the want of ordinary nautical skill and resolution; but if there were extraordinary risk of life in remaining by her, or if it turned out to be a question of the want of judgment in the master, as to whether it was expedient to act in this way or that way, he should consider the collision to be the cause of the whole damage and expense incurred." And in the same case he says, "I consider the master and crew after the collision are not bound to incur extraordinary risk of life by remaining on board the vessel." You have it strongly urged at the bar, that risk of life would have been incurred if they had remained. Now by the evidence it was a lee shore, and all the spars were overboard, and it appears that the vessel was in such a position that he could not handle her; and it might be that he was exercising, under the circumstances, a very wise and humane precaution, to save the lives of his men, by taking them on board the Swan, even although there might be a want of judgment in it. It was also in evidence against that, that he was offered help. The captain of the Swan offered to lie by him, and it was said it was suggested to him to rig up a jury mast; but there does not appear to have been any very substantial offer, and you will consider under what head you will class this fact, and I will be guided by your opinion. The whole of the case comes to this, that on the evidence, you will say: first, whether you consider these two vessels had been so meeting each other, as to come within the construction of the statute; secondly, whether, as the Sydney Jones did not comply with the statute by porting her helm, there were any and what circumstances in the case, to justify her departure from the rule? Thirdly, what, under the circumstances of the case, was the duty of the Sydney Jones? Fourthly, after the Swan first sighted the Sydney Jones, was the porting her helm a proper and seamanlike act? Fifthly, to what cause do you attribute the collision? Sixthly and lastly, was the master of the Sydney Jones justified in abandoning his vessel?

THE ARBUTUS.

[Law]

KELLY, J., and his assessors then retired to his Lordship's chamber, and after a deliberation of upwards of two hours returned into court, when the learned judge read the several questions, and the answers given to them as follows:—

To first question—Yes. To second question—Yes. The bright light shown by the Swan, and seen by the Sydney Jones, was no indication whatever in itself of the course pursued by the Swan. The Sydney Jones could only surmise the course of the Swan by the alteration in the bearings of the light. That light indicated the passage of a vessel across the path of the Sydney Jones, and had the Sydney Jones borne away as the Act directs she would have placed herself in the way of a vessel that was fast getting out of her way. It was not possible for the Sydney Jones to ascertain, certainly, the course actually pursued by the Swan, until it was too late for the Sydney Jones to comply with the rule. To third question—Under the circumstances, it was the duty of the Sydney Jones to put her helm hard a-starboard, and thus by deadening the vessel's way, diminish the consequences of inevitable collision. To fourth question—No. We believe that if the first order of starboard given by the officers in charge of the deck had been complied with, the Swan would have passed to leeward clear of the Sydney Jones. To fifth question—The absence of coloured lights on board the Swan, and their being too late. To last question—We feel bound to remark that we were on the deck of the Sydney Jones at the time of the collision; all had equal opportunity of seeing the vessel, and the master was the first to order her to do so; and as he never returned to his vessel, although offered assistance, and that she was not leaky, we do not consider him justified in abandoning her without effort.

KELLY, J.—Having received the answer read, I pronounce the party of the Swan blame in the collision, and decree accordingly reserving the question of costs and damages for further information, disallowing so much damages in accordance with the finding, that the master of the Sydney Jones was not justified in abandoning his vessel, as were the result of the abandonment.

[There was an appeal to the Court of Appeal in this case, and the decision of the Court of Appeal was affirmed, but without costs.]

NOTE.—Since the judgment in this case, the statute law as to the rules for collision has been altered by "The Merchant Shipping Amendment" (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63). It is, however, considered of sufficient general importance to render its publication desirable.

Collision—Compulsory pilotage—Consequential damages—The Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 c. 104)—Sects. 296, 297, 340, 353, and 354.

A steam-ship which does not keep at her proper distance from a vessel which is passing or going in the channel, when coming down or going up, and which starboards her helm when she is ported, will, under ordinary circumstances, be liable, in a suit for collision, to pay both damages and costs.

Where a vessel has come into collision with another vessel, owing to the gross negligence of the crew of her, her owners will not be liable, in a suit for damages to the owners of the other vessel, if it appear that the vessel causing the collision was in charge of a duly licensed pilot at the time that the collision was by statute compulsory.

This was a suit of collision instituted by Brundrit and Whiteway, of Runcorn, in the County of Chester, in England, registered owners of the schooner Duke, of Runcorn, 120 tons, Samuel Owens, master, against the owners of the screw-steamer Arbutus, of Morecombe, Payton, master, to recover damages for alleged to have been sustained in a collision which took place between those vessels in Belfast on the 5th February last, owing, as the plaintiff alleged, to the gross negligence of the crew of the steamer, &c. The court was on the original hearing, by Lieutenant A. Touche, R.N., and Lieutenant Crosby, J., nautical assessors; and the case was heard by consent, visd voce. The facts appear from the judgments of the court.

KELLY, J.—(upon the original hearing, in addressing the assessors, said)—On Wednesday morning, the 5th of February last, between the hours of eleven and twelve o'clock, the weather being bright and clear, and the tide a little more than one quarter flood, a steam tug was proceeding up the Victoria Channel to the town of Belfast, with two vessels in tow about fifteen yards astern of her. One of them, the Duke, the petitioner in this cause of collision, a steamer of 120 tons, drawing nine feet three inches, a little on her port quarter; the other on her starboard, a one-masted flat named the Ellen, drawing seven feet; the wind was blowing a moderate breeze from W.N.W. to N.W., and there was a fresh in the water. Victoria Channel being a narrow one, the tug and her tow, complying with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, kept to the starboard or north side of it in going up, and nothing was in sight until the master of the tug observed the screw steamer Arbutus, the defendant in this cause, about half a mile a-head, coming down the channel rather on the north side of it, on her customary voyage from Belfast to Bordeaux, with passengers and goods. About the very same time, a smack, named the Nero, with a Belfast pilot on board, was standing over for the north shore on her port tack, but astern of the tug and her tow. The part of the channel in which the tug descried the Arbutus half a mile a-head is straight, and nothing was between them, both being, or nearly at, the north side of it, and approaching each other at a combined velocity of about ten miles an hour, their being a fresh, and the rate of the tug being between three and four, and that of the Arbutus five miles, an hour. In this state of things the master of the tug, according to his evidence, when the Arbutus was yet a half-mile distant, ported a little, and when she was a shorter distance—about thirty fathoms off—put his helm hard a-port, the Duke porting also, and hailed her to keep her own side. In less than a minute after porting, the tug, drawing four feet only, took the ground, and was on the ground, the Duke slantways astern of her under the influence of her port helm, when the Arbutus, then close abreast of them on her port side, clearing the tug, struck the Duke right amidships on her port side with her stem, striking four or five planks right down above and below the water, and doing her other damage. Under the force of that blow the Duke drove the Ellen, which was alongside of her, ashore, and was herself obliged to hoist canvas and run ashore also to avoid sinking in the deep water, as she had already begun to fill. For that collision the Duke puts the blame to the Arbutus in not having kept to her starboard side of mid-channel, in compliance with the statute, and in not having ported, as she should have done. The case of the Arbutus, not denying these facts, is, that the petitioners themselves were the cause of the collision, and for two reasons—first, for having ported when it was too late; next, for having ported when they should have continued on their course. With respect to the first, the evidence of Hutchinson, the pilot of the Arbutus, is, that he saw the tug and her tow right a-head about one mile and a quarter off, and the smack Nero further down, at the southward on her port tack, and heaving about on her starboard tack, laying pretty well up the cut; and that when he was between one-quarter and one half mile off the tug, she being right a-head, and the Nero standing on between the tug and the southern bank, he ordered his helm a-starboard, in order to pass to the north of the tug, as he had not room to pass to the south or at the port side of her, on account of the Nero; but that the tug coming on at full speed, when about one ship's length off, put her helm a-port, although he had waved to her to keep her course, and by so porting hove herself and her tow right over the Arbutus hawse, whereupon he ordered to reverse at full speed, but did not succeed in clearing them. Now, as already observed, the evidence of the master of the tug was, that immediately on seeing the Arbutus half a mile off, he ported a little, and then, when he was about thirty fathoms off, he put his helm hard a-port. The porting at the latter distance is here corroborated by Hutchinson, who said he was a ship's length off when the tug ported, the length of the Arbutus being 180 feet, which is just thirty fathoms. But the material point for corroboration is, did the master of the tug port when he was the half-mile off?—or, in other words, did he port before the Arbutus starboarded, as the latter was done only when the distance between them was between half and one-quarter of a mile. Now the evidence of James Mount, the man at the wheel of the Arbutus upon the occasion, leaves no doubt whatever upon the matter. It is this: "When the tug came close to us she ported, and he got orders to starboard. Then the tug put her helm hard a-port. That was the first and only order he got to starboard." With such evidence given by their own helmsman, it seems impossible that the Arbutus can maintain her plea that the tug ported too late, even if the Arbutus can succeed in proving that she herself was correct in having starboarded, her own witness having thus so positively sworn that the tug had ported before the Arbutus starboarded. Another point bearing on this part of the case is also to be observed upon. Holmes, the pilot of the Duke, has sworn that after he had ported her helm he hailed the Arbutus, then coming on under a starboard helm, to port and reverse, and that he then saw her bows go off a little to starboard, but not enough to clear the Duke, as she struck her in the waist a slanting blow. Now this is admitted most distinctly by Hutchinson, the pilot of the Arbutus, his evidence being that, "having starboarded two or three minutes before the collision, he was heading to the north side of the channel and had brought the tug on his starboard bow, and was keeping her on it when she ported; and he then told his mate to put his helm a-port and reverse—that she had not time to reverse, but that her head came to starboard under the port helm, and that was before the collision." Of course, then, there can be no doubt upon the point—an important and material one in its bearings upon the case—and, independently of other views of it, showing at the time the full consciousness of this pilot Hutchinson as to the proper course it was his duty to have pursued that morning. I will, however, ask your nautical opinion on all these circumstances. There now is to be considered the

THE ARBUTUS.

second plea of the Arbutus, namely, that the tug should not have ported, but have continued her course, as there was an unavoidable necessity for the Arbutus to keep to the north side of the channel, there being plenty of room for her, and to starboard her helm to escape the risk of running into the smack Nero, at the time beating up the channel, and that she was justified in so doing to give the tug and her tow greater room. Now this plea, which apparently assigns three distinct grounds for the course pursued by the Arbutus, is in regard of the first and last of them very untenable. If the object of the Arbutus had in reality been to give the tug greater room, she should have left to her the north side, where, according to her own admission, there was more room than to the southward; and that the more readily, because under clause 297 of the Merchant Shipping Act the northern was the proper side for the tug and the southern the proper side for the Arbutus, and under the 296th section of that Act the Arbutus was not justified in starboarding for such reason but should have ported and passed the tug upon the port side. The plea in question then is to be considered merely with reference to the averment, that there was an unavoidable necessity to escape the risk of running into the smack Nero. Unquestionably there was one point of time in the brief three or four minutes during which this most indefensible calamity was being inflicted, when, as the pilot and mate of the Arbutus both admitted, that they could have passed to southward of the tug in safety, and they assigned no reason whatever for not having then done so, and so arose the circumstances which followed. It will be borne in mind that the pilot of the Arbutus admitted he saw the Nero heaving about on her starboard tack when he first saw the tug. The pilot of the Nero deposes as follows:—"That he had gone as close to the north shore as he could go in order to have a long reach when he went round on that starboard tack, and that tacking under the stern of the tug, and going a-head of them, he stood across to the south to run out of the road; he then saw the Arbutus coming down five or six lengths of herself a-head of the tug, and rather on the north side. The Arbutus was three or four lengths off the Nero when the latter was in mid channel, standing right on to the south bank to keep clear of her—the channel there being 250 feet broad. The Nero was her own length a-head of the Arbutus when she passed her just going to run ashore to keep out of her way, and at that time there was 150 feet of water between her and the Arbutus, and that was before the collision. Immediately after running ashore he looked over to see what had happened, as he had seen the Arbutus heading right for the tug, or for the northward of her, and he saw the Arbutus backing astern from the Duke, but he had not seen the blow struck." The pilot of the Arbutus, so far from contradicting or denying, actually confirms that evidence, for he admits that when the Nero was abreast of the tug, and on his own starboard, there were 100 feet of water clear between the Nero and the tug, and that the Nero was still running to the southward, and more out of the way. Now, it was at that very juncture that the Arbutus, twenty feet only in beam, with such admitted as well as increasing sea-room between the tug and the Nero, starboarded to go to the northward of the tug, where, according to the mate's evidence, there was but sixty feet. I will ask your opinion, if these circumstances embodied an unavoidable necessity. The result of these latter portions of the evidence, when taken into consideration with the running ashore of the tug and her tow immediately before and after the collision, shows how close they must have been to it all along, and that was the evidence of the master of the Duke. It also strongly leads to more than surmise that the course adopted by the pilot of the Arbutus in selecting the northern side, was the carrying out of his predetermination, formed when he took charge of the vessel on the morning in question. I will now read the two sections of the Merchant Shipping Act already referred to, and begging you to keep them in mind, put the following questions:—

First—Was the tug with her tow justified in porting, or should she have continued her course?

Second—Did she port in time?

Third—Was the Arbutus justified by unavoidable or any necessity in starboarding and going north of the tug in order to escape the risk of collision with the Nero?

Fourth—Was there sufficient sea-room to pass southward of the tug at the time the smack Nero was standing over to southward when the Arbutus put her helm to starboard?

Fifth—What course should the Arbutus have pursued under all the circumstances?

Sixth—To what party do you attribute the blame of the collision, stating your reasons?

His Lordship and the assessors having retired to chamber to consider and confer, returned in an hour into court, when the following were the answers given to the several questions:—

To the first question—The tug was fully justified in porting, not only to keep on the proper side, but to avoid the risk of a collision.

To the second—We are quite satisfied that the tug did port in time.

To the third—The Arbutus was by no means justified, there being ample space to the southward of the tug for the Arbutus to pass without any risk of collision.

To the fourth—We are perfectly satisfied that the Arbutus had sufficient room to pass to the southward without risk or injury to the vessels on either side when she starboarded.

To the fifth—Having seen the vessels in good time and at a reasonable distance, and having had ample sea-room all through, the Arbutus should have kept to her proper side instead of starboarding.

And to the sixth—We attribute the blame of the collision solely to the Arbutus for not having kept to her proper side when coming down, and for starboarding when she should have ported.

KELLY, J.—Agreeing in all the opinions now expressed, and under all the circumstances of the case, I pronounce for the petitioners in the case, subject, however, to whatever conclusion I may arrive at upon the plea of exemption on the ground of compulsory pilotage, relied upon by the defendants, and yet to be the subject of argument.

The case was subsequently re-argued on the question of compulsory pilotage.

KELLY, J., in pronouncing judgment on that point said:—This was a cause of collision, in which proceedings were instituted on the part of the schooner Duke, of Runcorn, against the screw steamer the Arbutus, of Morecombe, to recover damages for injuries sustained by her in consequence of a collision between those vessels in Belfast Lough, on the 5th Feb. last. The court was assisted at the original hearing by assessors, and, being so advised, found that the blame of the collision was to be attributed solely to the person in charge of the Arbutus, for having erroneously put her helm to starboard; and further found, both on the admission of the petitioners themselves and on all the evidence, that the Arbutus, on the morning in question, was under the charge and management of a qualified pilot—that the helm had been starboarded by his order, the officers and crew acting merely in obedience thereto—and that the pilot alone was in fault. Under this state of circumstances the tion arose, and has been ably argued on both sides, whether or not, under the Belfast Harbour Act and the Merchant Shipping Act, as pleaded by the owners of the Arbutus, these owners are to be relieved of their liability to make good the loss so occasioned by the act and fault of their pilot, as these statutes made it compulsory upon them to employ a qualified pilot; and the latter one, in s. 338, expressly enacts "that no owner or master of any ship shall be answerable to any person for any loss or damage occasioned by the fault or incapacity of any qualified pilot acting in charge of such ship within any district where the employment of such pilot is compulsory by law." It has been considerably said that this statute should not be extended past its strict construction;

although founded on the principle of natural justice, that when masters are compellable to take persons on board, owners should not be responsible for the acts of strangers to whom they are forced to commit the management of their vessels, and for whom they have no control; yet it is at the same time to be remembered that it deprives of their remedy persons who have suffered injury. A court, therefore, ought to be well satisfied that the shipowner claiming the exemption has brought himself strictly within the several conditions imposed by the statute before any declaration of his being entitled thereto be made in his favour. These conditions are, that there was a qualified pilot on board at the time—that such pilot was solely in charge—that he was exclusively in fault, and that the district in which the collision occurred the employment of a pilot was compulsory by law. In the present case the court is spared the consideration of the three former requirements, having been parts of the finding already come to in this cause, and is to come to a conclusion upon the last named only, namely, whether the employment of the pilot was compulsory or not. The advocates for the petitioners, confining their arguments very properly to this question, urged in regard of it two objections, first, that the case of the Arbutus was deficient in substance for not having pleaded or proved in the first instance that the master was not himself a certified pilot, and that in consequence of that defect they should be debarred the plea of compulsory pilotage under the Merchant Shipping Act, and secondly, that under the Belfast Harbour Act pilotage was not compulsory at all. The sections of the Merchant Shipping Act under which the first objection is taken are sects. 340 and 353; the former enacting that "the master or mate of any ship may apply to any pilotage authority to be examined as to his capacity to pilot the ship of which he is master or mate, or any one or more ships belonging to the same owner; and, if found competent, a pilotage certificate may be granted to him, and such certificate shall enable him to pilot such ship within the specified district without incurring any penalties for the non-employment of a qualified pilot." And the latter (the 353rd), "that every master of an exempted ship navigating within any district, who, after a qualified pilot has offered to take charge of such ship, himself pilots such ship without possessing a pilotage certificate enabling him so to do, shall for every such offence incur a penalty double the amount of pilotage demandable for the conduct of such ship." Now, it is clear that under the former section a certified master incurs no penalties for the non-employment of a qualified pilot, and that therefore in such case pilotage is not compulsory; and that under the latter section an uncertificated master does incur the penalties, and that pilotage is compulsory. Such being the case, the objection is, that the plea of the defts., which simply averred "that the Arbutus was at the time under the charge of a qualified pilot," should have previously averred, as set out in the 353rd section, "that her own master did not then possess a pilotage certificate;" the intended and avowed object of the objection being, that in the absence of the latter the defts. had not entitled himself to plead or avail himself of the former averment—that is, of the immunity of compulsory pilotage. To this objection the defts. have argued, in reply, that they are not bound to prove a negative, and that it comes too late, and the court can well admit the reasonableness, and even the strength of this reply when it observes that the petitioners have laid no ground, by affidavit or otherwise, to induce a presumption that the master of the Arbutus had in his possession, at the time in question, a pilotage certificate, or that their own rights, as ascertained by the court in its finding on the original hearing, were likely to be defeated by the evasion of the defts. in pleading their case. No difficulty lay in the way of the petitioners, either in ascertaining the fact as to the pilotage certificate, the sections 337 and 349 of the Merchant Shipping Act having made ample provision for the registration and publication of the names of all persons licensed by any pilotage authorities to act as pilots. The court, however, guiding itself by the rules and practice of pleading, will examine whether the averment contended for by the petitioner ought not rather to have been their own reply to the plea of the defts. than part of that plea itself, being a new matter and in derogation of it. In the Agricola, 2 Wm. Rob. 10, where, as in this case, the petitioners merely denied that the Local and General Pilot Act under which the defts. pleaded their exemption, applied, the court said that their mere denial was defective, inasmuch as it was intended to deprive the owners of the Agricola of their exemption under the statute, upon the ground that the pilot was voluntarily and not compulsorily taken on board; it should have been expressly pleaded by them, together with the reasons. This case was further strengthened by a much later one, the Killarney, Lush. 202. In the Killarney the petitioners sought to deprive the defts. of their plea of exemption on the ground of compulsory pilotage, by showing that their master had himself a pilotage certificate. And how did they proceed? By formal pleading, and by raising that issue in their reply to the plea of the defts. Such is the course then which, in the opinion of this court, the petitioners here should also have adopted, and not have sought to raise a question of serious importance and of first impression—not even upon motion—not upon notice even, but on a mere surmise long after the trial of the cause, and not until after the argument upon the question at issue had been fully opened by the defts.'s advocates. The Court therefore overrules the objection, remitting the defts. to the full benefit of their plea under that 333rd section. There is now for consideration the objection raised to the Belfast Harbour Act, namely, that under it pilotage is not compulsory. Two sections of this Act—101 and 104—contain the enactments referred to in support of this objection. By the former the master or owner of vessels coming into or going out of the port, harbour, or river of Belfast, shall, for every such vessel, pay as and for pilotage on entering or on leaving a certain rate or sum fixed by a schedule referred to in the Act; and by the latter it is enacted that in case any master or owner who is required by the Act to employ a pilot shall refuse to take on board and employ any such who should offer his services, such master or owner shall pay double pilotage over and above any penalty he may be liable to. Now, the argument is, that as the latter clause inflicts the penalty only on such recusant masters and owners as are required by the Act to employ pilots, and as in the only other clause on the subject—the 101st—the compulsion is merely to pay pilotage, not to employ pilots, the penalty falls to the ground, and there can be no compulsion. But the full reading of the section (101st) will set this argument in its proper light; that reading in full, and not as the argument had it, in part only, “that every master and owner of a vessel, on its entering or leaving the said port, shall pay to the commissioners of the harbour, as and for pilotage thereof, a rate or sum proportioned to the tonnage of the vessel, and the class of pilot employed by such vessel;” thus in precise words making compulsory, through the commissioners of the harbour, the payment of pilotage for each vessel to those pilots only who were employed by it—compelling them to pay those whom they were required under the Act to employ—for under the Act the whole class of pilots were created and regulated, and to them was exclusively committed the pilotage of the harbour. In Cuthbert v. Sidbotham, 4 Mau. & Sel., weaker expressions were considered compulsory—the words of the Liverpool Act, the subject of that decision, being simply that, if no pilot be taken pilotage shall be paid; and in The Maria, 1 Wm. Rob. 95, the Court says, “Is not making the neglect to take a pilot punishable with payment of the pilotage itself a compulsion upon the owners?” Suppose the statute had mentioned ten times that amount, the difference would be only in the degree of compulsion, but not in the compulsion itself. To these may be added The Mulrim, which was before this court and in which the very same question was raised upon the Waterford Harbour Act, identical in its pilotage clauses with the Belfast Act; and the court, after a very learned argument, decided in favour of the pilotage being compulsory. Under these reasonings the second objection of the petitioners must then be disallowed; and the court being satisfied that the defendants have fully established their case and claim of exemption under the 388th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, dismiss them from further attendance on this suit, but without costs.

Salvage—Rate of compensation—Remots damage to salving vessel.

Where a vessel, being ignorant of her whereabouts, had struck a shoal, but got off and came to anchor, and a steamer coming by gave her information of her position and attempted to tow her to a place of safety, but the hawser breaking no further attempt to tow was made, but the steamer guided the vessel out to sea clear of all shoals, being with her about five hours:

Held, that the steamer was entitled to salvage.

Where the steamer being thus delayed, arrived in the subsequent prosecution of her voyage at a dangerous place about low water, which, but for that delay, she would probably have reached at about high water and have passed in safety, but it being low water she struck a rock and was very seriously injured:

Held, that such damage was too remote to be considered as an element in estimating the amount of salvage.

The vessel saved being worth $22,500 with a cargo worth $100,000, the saving vessel being worth $100,000 with a cargo worth $400,000, the peril not being imminent, and the risk and labour of the salving small:

Held, that the salvors should recover $5000 as salvage, together with $280, the amount of damage occasioned to the steamer by coming in collision with the ship while attempting to tow her in tow.

The facts of the case are fully set forth in the judgments.

SHIPMAN, J.—This is a libel for salvage brought by the owners of the steamship Saxon against the sailing ship Cornelius Grinnell, for services rendered to the latter by the Saxon, near Five Fathom Bank, to the eastward of Cape May, on the 3rd April 1863. Two questions are raised on the pleadings and proofs: 1. Whether the services rendered come within the rule of compensation applicable to salvage rewards; and 2. If so, what amount shall be allowed. The peculiar character of the case will be best presented by a somewhat detailed statement of the facts which appear proved by the evidence. The New York and London packet ship, Cornelius Grinnell, of New York, valued for the purposes of this case at not less than $22,500, having on board cargo of the value of at least $100,000, with a large number of passengers and a full crew, left London for New York on the 18th March 1863. On Saturday, the 2nd of April, at about 10 o'clock a.m., she hove to in a severe gale of wind, her master supposing that he was off Fire Island, south of Long Island. The ship lay to till the next morning at 4 o'clock, her head being kept east south-east, the gale continuing severe. After 4 o'clock she ran in west south-west, as it was then supposed towards New York. Between 12 and 1 o'clock she made the land, which was then thought to be New Jersey shore. She was then headed off to the south-east, and in half or three quarters of an hour struck in shoal water. She then wore ship to the westward, and immediately anchored in five and half fathoms of water. She lay here, with her head to the wind, which was blowing fresh from the north-east, accompanied with rain, for about an hour, her officers being ignorant of their position, when the steamship Saxon, owned by the libellants and running regularly between Philadelphia and Boston, was discovered passing on her trip to Boston. The captain of the Grinnell immediately set signals of distress, and the Saxon lay down for him. When within hailing distance, Captain Spencer, of the Grinnell, inquired of the master of the Saxon if he could tell him where he was. The latter replied that he was on Five Fathom Bank, off Cape May. Captain Spencer then told him that he had struck on a shoal, had a considerable number of passengers on board, and asked him if he would take him to a port of safety. Captain Mathews, of the Saxon, replied that he would try. Thereupon, after the proper orders, the Grinnell's cable was slipped, and the Saxon took hawser from her for the purpose of taking her in tow. In attempting to get the ship off before the wind, under her jib and fore-topmast, the hawser broke, from inevitable accident, and without fault on the part of either ship. The hawser parted near the Grinnell's knight heads, and though every effort was made to haul it on the steamer, it got foul of her screw, though her engines were stopped as soon as they could be. Some twenty or thirty fathoms of it were found on the screw after she reached Boston. After the hawser parted, the captain of the Saxon ordered the Grinnell to make sail on follow him, which was done, the two ships standing rards the mouth of Delaware Bay. After sailing for six miles, the steamer stopped her engines to the Grinnell come up, when Captain Mathews told the master of the Grinnell that he should have got another hawser to him before night, as it would be ebb tide before they reached the mouth of the bay, and he could not get him to a safe anchorage without it. Captain Spencer then asked him if he could not take him to sea. The captain of the Saxon said he could, and thereupon the steamer led the way, and the Grinnell followed out to sea clear of the shoals, when the Grinnell, on notice from the captain of the Saxon that she was all clear, hauled up her course for New York. The Saxon went on her way to Boston. The ships parted about 8 o'clock, on day evening, April 3, having been together about five hours. When the Grinnell arrived in New York, she was found to be in good condition, damage having been suffered in the gale. While getting the hawser fast, the sea running high, the Grinnell in pitching, as the Saxon came across her bow, came down on her, staving the boat of the steamer, carrying away her rail, and cutting a hole in the deck. This damage to the Saxon was repaired for $260. Beyond this, and the winding of the screw about the screw, the Saxon received no injury while engaged in rendering assistance to the Grinnell. Before, however, her arrival at Boston, she suffered serious injury to repair which, including her detention during the repairs, cost her owners more than $2500. The weather continued stormy after she left the Grinnell, and, the evening of the day after, she encountered a heavy gale. She kept her best steam on, and arrived at Pollock Rip, in her usual route, at about 5 o'clock Tuesday morning, about an hour before dead low water. In attempting to cross the Rip, the steamer struck, and was very badly injured, and had to be towed to Boston. Had she not been detained by the services rendered the Grinnell, she would undoubtedly have reached the Rip at about high water, and passed over it in safety. The Saxon was a valuable steamer, worth over $100,000 and had a cargo on board valued at $400,000. To the south and west of Five Fathom Bank, where the Grinnell lay, are shoals, some of which are said not to be laid down in the charts, and as the wind and current were blowing in a south-westerly direction, if the Grinnell had parted her chains, she would have been in considerable danger of being wrecked, especially if the gale had increased to a point of great severity. In case of such increase of the gale, she would have been in some danger of parting her cable had she not been rescued. The Saxon was the only regular steam-packet which was due at that point about that time, though Government transports occasionally passed up and down the coast in that vicinity. Upon these facts the two questions already referred to arise, which have been elaborately discussed by counsel, and they are obviously, as heretofore stated: 1. Were the services rendered by the Saxon to the Grinnell salvage services, and therefore entitled to salvage compensation? 2. If they were salvage services, what compensation is the Saxon entitled to? Upon the first point, the court is satisfied that the service rendered was in the nature of salvage. The Grinnell was saved, by the timely intervention of the Saxon, from a position of considerable peril. She was at anchor in the neighbourhood of dangerous shoals, upon which there was at least some danger of her drifting, in the event of the parting of her cables. One severe gale had just been encountered, which had driven her into the position of danger, where she then lay; and though the storm had lulled, it was not entirely over. The sea was high and the wind fresh; and another severe gale visited the coast within a few days after she was taken out to sea by the Saxon.

The evidence is not entirely clear as to the degree of severity of the succeeding gale at Five Fathom Bank, but, judging from the ordinary range of such storms, it is fair to conclude, from the evidence, that it was felt in considerable violence at this point. It is true the Grinnell might have ridden out this gale, but the captain was ignorant of his position, and the pilots who cruise the waters in that vicinity were thirty miles away, at Delaware Breakwater, and not likely to reach the neighbourhood of Five Fathom Bank in such weather. No one can certainly determine whether or not she would have ridden out the gale in safety, and though Captain Spencer thinks she would, as her ground tackle was strong, still it must be conceded that there was more or less danger in her lying there and trusting to the experiment. It is quite evident that Captain Spencer considered his ship in great danger, and was therefore anxious that the Saxon should take him to a port of safety. It is true that he now says his fears at that time were based upon the supposition that his ship was leaking badly, which turned out to be an error. Still I think it is clear that the ship was in real and unusual danger, independent of the fact whether she was leaking badly or not. The services of the Saxon were therefore, in the judgment of the court, salvage services, and come entirely within the rule laid down by Dr. Lushington in the case of the Charlotte, 3 Wm. Rob. 71, where he says: "According to the principles which are recognised in this court in questions of this description, all services rendered at sea to a vessel in danger or distress are salvage services. It is not necessary, I conceive, that the distress should be actual or immediate, or that the danger should be imminent and absolute. It will be sufficient if, at the time the assistance is rendered, the ship has encountered any damage or misfortune which might possibly expose her to destruction if the services were not rendered." This doctrine is accepted and enforced by the Admiralty Courts in this country. Curtis, J., in the case of Henessey et al. v. The Ship Versailles and Cargo, 1 Curt. R. 358, gives a brief and clear definition of salvage: "The relief of property," he remarks, "from imminent peril of the sea, by voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligations to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property, constitutes a technical case of salvage." Many other authorities to the same effect might be cited, and in view of the general rule, when considered with reference to the particular cases from which it has been deduced, I cannot doubt but that the present case is covered by it. It only remains to consider the amount of compensation to be awarded. We are met on the threshold of this branch of the case with the claim that the court, in fixing the amount to be awarded, should consider the damage suffered by the Saxon in striking on Pollock Rip. It is not claimed that the entire amount of this damage should be included in the award, but it is insisted that the Saxon, by the delay of five hours while aiding the Grinnell, arrived at Pollock Rip so much later, and at low water, by which her risk in crossing was increased, and in consequence of which she met with the accident and suffered great damage. And it is clear that the Saxon would have arrived at the Rip at high water, and therefore, in all probability, have passed over in safety, had it not been for her delay in aiding the Grinnell. In a certain popular and remote sense, when she undertook to get the Grinnell out of danger at Five Fathom Bank, she incurred whatever risks such a delay might subject her to. She took the risk of encountering another storm, which she might escape if she avoided the delay. Whatever increased dangers might arise during the time which her detention in this salvage service at Five Fathom Bank might prolong her voyage, were all, in one sense, hazarded by her in staying by the Grinnell. But these remote and uncertain dangers do not, in the eye of the law, enhance her merits, and thus increase her reward. Though she had been totally wrecked by another gale, which she would have wholly escaped but for her delay of five hours in this service, I apprehend that such a disaster could not be allowed to enhance the salvage compensation. All such dangers were contingent, and the damages which might result from them must be considered, in the language of the law, as remote, having no logical or legal connection with the transaction upon which the libel is founded. We come, then, to the simple question of the amount of compensation due to the Saxon for the services rendered at Five Fathom Bank. The elements to be considered in solving this question are well understood. The only difficulty is as to their application. The general rule as to compensation is that it should be liberal. In determining what is liberal, we are to consider "the value of the property saved; the degree of the peril from which it was delivered; the risk of the property, and especially of the persons of the salvors; the severity and duration of their labour; the promptness of their interposition; and the skill exhibited: (1 Curt. R. 361.) So far as the value of the property saved is concerned, it was considerable; admitted, for the purposes of this case, to be $22,500 for the ship, and $100,000 for the cargo. As to the degree of peril from which the ship and cargo were delivered, it is more difficult to determine. It was sufficient to constitute it a case of salvage, but was not that imminent peril which often menaces the certain destruction of vessels on a lee shore. As the wind and sea were at the time of her rescue, she was not in a condition of great peril. To what degree the gale increased soon after her escape from that point is not clear. So far as the risk of the property or persons of the salvors is concerned, there is no unusual ground of merit. There was, comparatively, very little risk to either. The labours of the salvors were neither severe nor long, and though their services were promptly rendered, there was nothing in the exigencies of the case to call for very great skill. On the whole, I think I shall be following the spirit of the rule which calls for liberal rewards in salvage cases, by adjudging $5000 as the proper sum. Had it not been for the untoward disaster at Pollock Rip, I think the salvors themselves would have regarded this as a liberal reward. To this sum, however, I will add $260, the amount of the damage which Captain Mathews stated that the Saxon suffered by being struck by the Grinnell. Let a decree be entered for the libellants for the sum of $5260, with costs.

THE ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE.

Marine insurance—Open policy—Appropriation—Declaration.

The H. Marine Insurance Company, established abroad, from their course of business not knowing at the time of issuing certain policies what might turn out to be the amount of risk on any particular ship, effected with the defts. in London, through the plts., their agents, open policies of insurance to cover any excess beyond 5000l. in which they might be interested in any one ship. The ships were described in these open policies,

"First-class ship or ships as may be declared plts. from time to time, as they were advised. Calcutta agent of the H. Company, made deck of the amounts and names of the ships which the company had insured beyond 5000l. to the defts. indorsements were thereof made on the defts. As one of such policies was on the point of being exhausted, a fresh one was entered into, and an amendment made of it on the back, e. g. "to follow succeed policy No. day of ." On 1 March 1860, there remained 5000l. unappropriated on the open policy of March 31, 1859; and on 1 news was received in London, both by plts. and defts., that the R. G. ship had been lost; but it was so that the H. Company had any interest in the goods on board of her. The plts. appropriated the 5000l. on other vessels than the R. G. on the 17th March on the 19th March effected another open policy for the defts. for 10,000l., "to follow that of March 1859." On the 21st March 1860, the plts. gave notice from the Calcutta agent that the H. Company insured the R. G., and that the R. G. was to be covered under the defts.' open policy, and that particulars would be sent by the mail. The plts. immediately notified to the defts. that a declaration of insurance in excess of 5000l. on the cargo of the R. G. had been made on the policy of the 19th March 1860; the 26th March, having then received particulars, made an indorsement accordingly on the back of the policy, and gave notice to the defts. :

Held, that it not being known on the 19th March that the H. Company had any risk on goods on board the R. G., the appropriation of that risk and the making of the policy were sufficient to entitle them to recover on the policy of the 19th March for the excess beyond 5000l.
Per Cockburn, C. J. and Shee, J., that if it had been known to both plts. and defts. it would have made no difference.

Special case.—The action was brought to 2715l. upon a policy of marine insurance effected by the plts. with the defts. on goods insured at 7900l. in respect of the cargo of the ship Red Gauntlet in the following circumstances.

The plts. are the London agents of the Honourable Marine Insurance Company, who have a branch agent at Calcutta, with general authority to write policies on their behalf.

The course of the company's business at Calcutta is as follows. Merchants there, intending to consignments of merchandise, &c., to the Kingdom, apply to the agent there for the purpose of effecting assurances some time before the goods are actually shipped or even the name of the ship is known, or the precise quantity or part of the merchandise is defined, and if the application is accepted, a slip, naming the risk accepted in terms, but without naming the ship or specifying the particulars of the merchandise, is delivered to the assured, and as soon as the particular is determined on, a formal policy of insurance is then drawn up to be upon the whole amount of merchandise consigned by that particular slip, and delivered to the assured. The quantity of merchandise is covered by such policy, and remains uncertain until the same is actually shipped.

Under these circumstances the said company does not know, at the time of issuing a policy of insurance as above mentioned, what may prove to be the amount of risk taken by the company on any particular ship, and not deeming it expedient to take upon themselves risks to a greater amount than 5000l. upon any one ship, the plts., as agents in London, effect on their behalf, with the defts. and others, open policies of insurance to cover the several amounts, if any, which the said company may have taken in excess of 5000l. upon any one ship. The maximum amount of value to be insured on any one ship is 5000l.

On the same day the following telegram arrived in London by the Red Sea and India Telegraph, having been despatched from Calcutta six days previously:

Submarine Telegraph Company in connection with the British and Irish Magnetic Telegraph Company.—Foreign,
 No. 684. No. 2452. Number of words, twenty.—At 6-27 on Friday 16th March 1860, received the following message from Malta, dated 15th, time, 8 p.m.:

"To Lloyd's, London.

"Ship Red Gauntlet, bound to London, burnt and stranded;
 some cargo will be saved. Calcutta, March 10. 16.3.22 a.m.
 Lloyd, Calcutta."

This telegram on the same day was known to the plts. and defts.

On the 17th March 1860, the plts. in accordance with the course of business hereinbefore described, appropriated the remaining 5000*l.* upon the above-mentioned policy of March 31st 1859, to insurances in excess of 5000*l.* upon the ships City of Manchester 2000*l.*, Blenheim 2000*l.* and Agamemnon 1000*l.*; and on the same day the plts. effected with the defts. three specific policies on behalf of the Hong Kong Insurance Company—one on goods per City of Manchester for 3000*l.*, another on goods per Agamemnon for 4000*l.*, and a third on goods per Blenheim for 2000*l.*, parts of the risks in respect of the cargoes of those ships having already been placed upon the open policy just appropriated as above mentioned.

On March 19, 1860, the plts. effected a further policy for 10,000*l.* to follow the policy of March 31, 1859, which was expressed to be as follows: "being on goods free of average, &c., to follow and succeed policy No. 7529/80, dated 31st March 1859, warranted to be shipped on or before the 31st Dec.
 1860."

The plts., in the mode that had been previously pursued when the prior policies were effected, indorsed on the policy No. 7529/80 the following memorandum, "10,000*l.* to follow 17th March at 30/" as instructions for the said policy of the 19th March 1860, and the defts. initialled the memorandum as an acceptance of the risk.

On the 21st March 1860 the plts. in due course received from the Calcutta agent of the Hong Kong Insurance Company the following instructions despatched from Calcutta on the 15th Feb. 1860:—
 "In our next by regular mail you will find particulars for insurances under our open policies for Red Gauntlet and Surrey."

This was the first intimation received in England of any insurance by the Hong Kong Insurance Company upon Red Gauntlet. The plts., immediately upon receipt of these instructions from Calcutta, notified to the defts. that the declaration of insurance in excess of 5000*l.* on the cargo of the Red Gauntlet would be made upon the last-mentioned policy when the particulars were received. Their right to declare in respect of Red Gauntlet was, however, disputed, and on the 26th March, the plts.
 having received advices from Calcutta that the Hong Kong Insurance Company, as the fact was, had taken risks upon the cargo of the said ship Red Gauntlet to the amount of 4738*l.* in excess of 5000*l.* upon that one ship, indorsed a declaration of that amount, per Red Gauntlet, on the back of the policy of the 19th March 1860, and gave notice of the same to the defts. The defts. refused to accept or acknowledge such declaration, upon the ground that the burning of the Red Gauntlet was known to both parties before the policy was effected or applied for. The plts. thereupon wrote opposite the declaration per the Red Gauntlet the words "in dispute," and after doing so, declared other risks upon the said policy to the full amount, which were initialled by the defts., as will appear upon reference to the copy of the said policy annexed, but the words
 "in dispute" were not noticed by the defts.

The plts., on the 24th March 1860, before the last-mentioned policy was exhausted, and while

Q. B.] GLEDSTANES AND OTHERS v. CORPORATION OF ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE. [Q. B.]

there remained upwards of 5000*l.* unappropriated upon it, effected a further policy with the defts. for 20,000*l.* to follow the said policy of the 19th March 1860, and a memorandum was indorsed on the said policy of 19th March 1860 as follows: "20,000*l.* to follow 25th March," such date being a mistake for the 24th March.

Similar policies have been from time to time effected during the currency of the preceding policy, and there remains upon the last of such policies an amount unappropriated more than sufficient to cover the amount for the Red Gauntlet.

The interest of the Hong Kong Insurance Company and the validity of the insurances are admitted as well as the loss, and that the goods were shipped on board the said ship, and that all warranties and conditions were complied with except so far as the same may otherwise appear on this case, and it is agreed that the amount to be recovered by the plts. (if any) shall be settled by an arbitrator to be named by the parties.

Lush, Q. C. (Hannen with him) for the plts.—The policy was an open policy to cover all risks which the Hong Kong Company might take in excess of 5000*l.* The policy attached as soon as the risk commenced in Calcutta. It ran upon all the vessels insured by the plts.' principals in the order that the risk attached. It did not depend on any appropriation to any particular vessel. It is not necessary, however, for the plts. to contend that length, but only that the policy attached as soon as it was appropriated to the risk. Then, as soon as it was known that there was an excess beyond 5000*l.* on any particular ship, it was the practice, and they were bound, to notify it to the defts.; but that was not a condition precedent to the policy attaching: (Harman v. Kingston, 3 Camp. 150.) Here, as soon as it was known that there was an excess beyond 5000*l.* insured on the Red Gauntlet, the defts. were told that the plts. were to put on the Red Gauntlet, and when they received full particulars they forwarded them to the defts.

Bovill, Q. C. (Watkin Williams with him) contra.—It is a mistake to assume that these policies were all one continuous policy. On the 17th March the plts. had consumed all the existing policies, and they had run off. The next policy was on the 19th March, and the memorandum indorsed on it, "to follow the 17th March," meant to follow the policy which was consumed on the 17th March. Then, when the policy of the 19th March was effected, it was known that the vessel was lost, and the policy could not attach. Secondly, the policy was to cover the excess beyond 5000*l.* taken "on any one ship as may be declared." A declaration was therefore necessary, because the policy was not on all the ships, and as soon as, but not until, the ship was declared, did the policy attach. Until the particular ship was declared, there was nothing on which the policy could attach.

Lush in reply.—Here there was no knowledge of the loss of that which was the subject of insurance at the time this policy was effected; all that was known was that the vessel was lost, but not that the Hong Kong Company had any interest beyond 5000*l.* on the goods on board: (Mead v. Davison, 3 A. & E. 303.) The argument that the policy does not attach until the declaration is made practically comes to this, that the defts. do not insure any of the plts.' ships that do not arrive safely, because some time, about six weeks, must elapse between the appropriation at Calcutta and the declaration in England. In no case is declaration a condition precedent to a policy attaching:

1 Arnould on Insurance, 175.

Cockburn, C. J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the plts. The first point for our consideration is, whether there is any sufficient policy to cover the loss incurred. It is true that the policy which was appropriated to the risk by the assured on the goods on board the Red Gauntlet was posterior in point of time to the risk; but I think we must take it that the policy was made in anticipation of a risk to be afterwards appropriated and declared. When we look at the course of dealing, we see that it was intended that the plts.' principals, the Hong Kong Company, should always be covered by insuring with the defts. any risk they might take in excess of 5000*l.* on goods in any particular ship. Mr. Bovill did not attempt to deny that if the policy in question had been effected on the 16th March instead of on the 19th, it would have been sufficient to entitle the Hong Kong Company to recover, although made after the appropriation. But then he contended that, although that might be so, yet the policy is vitiated because the ship, the Red Gauntlet, was, to the knowledge of both parties, lost at the time the policy was made. This argument is capable of two answers. First, the answer given by Mr. Lush is a satisfactory one, viz., that even if the agent at Calcutta had known of the loss, and although it was not known as a matter of common knowledge there, this would not have vitiated the policy, because the loss of the ship was not the risk insured, but the excess beyond 5000*l.* which the plts. might have on goods in any particular vessel. Now when this policy was effected, it was not known that the Hong Kong Company had any particular interest in the goods on board of the Red Gauntlet, and therefore the plts. had no knowledge of the loss that was covered by the policy. Be that as it may, here the loss of the Red Gauntlet was common knowledge to both parties, and, in the absence of authority to the contrary, I, for one, should hold that if an underwriter chooses to insure, with the knowledge common to both the insurers and the insured, of the loss of the thing insured, he is not the party to say that the insurance is to go for nothing. He may have had good reasons for taking the risk. I think, therefore, that there is nothing in the circumstance of the loss of the ship to vitiate the insurance. That being so, then comes the question whether the declaration here having been made subsequent to the loss is good. The policy gives the assured the right to appropriate it to any particular ship, but such appropriation must be declared to the defts. Now Mr. Bovill contends that, until the declaration is made, the policy does not attach. To put that construction upon it would be to frustrate the intention of the parties altogether. The risk intended to be protected was any excess beyond 5000*l.* on goods in any particular vessel which the Hong Kong Company might have insured. But whether the Hong Kong Company would have an excess in any particular vessel would not be known until the loading was complete and the vessel about to sail, and the fact of such excess could not be communicated from Calcutta to the plts. for about six weeks afterwards, and in the meantime the vessel would have started on her voyage. Could it ever have been intended that the ship for so much of her voyage was to be unprotected by this insurance? I think most certainly that that was not what was meant by declaring the vessel. But there are two other constructions which may be put on the meaning of declaring the vessel equally favourable to the plts. It may be said that, looking at all the circumstances, all that could be meant by the appropriation was, that the insured, by some overt act from which they could not recede, should fix the vessel on which the policy was to attach, and that when they had once done

[ADM.]

1, although the fact might not come until a later date to the knowledge of the underwriters, then was done which the policy required. It is not, ever, necessary to go that length; it is enough to say that it is sufficient if the declaration be made at the first convenient occasion. By this condition the underwriters are protected, because, if there is any attempt to reappropriate after a particular vessel has already been declared, it will be a breach of the underwriters. In some shape or other appropriation must be so made that the vessel is, in the interval between appropriation and declaration, be covered by the policy. Every object of the policy is settled that the parties to the policy are to be declared at the reasonably earliest opportunity. I am glad to find that our view accords with that laid down in Mr. Arnould's treatise on marine insurance. On these grounds I think our judgment must be for the plaintiffs.

MONTGOMERY J.—I am of the same opinion. The construction is, that this policy was intended to cover the former one between these parties, and the object was to cover the excess beyond 5000*l.* on the Hong Kong Company might insure in any particular ship. They show that it was intended to keep on renewing this arrangement from time to time. It was intended to give the plaintiffs all rights under the new policies which they had under their former policies. The main question in the case is, whether this policy attached, and whether a declaration was made in time. I do not agree with that part of Mr. Lush's argument in which he said that it was meant that the risk should attach on all the ships in their order; but I think that when the risk was appropriated to any particular ship by the company abroad, the policy attached. Whether that is so or not, I think the appropriation here was communicated in good time. Lord Chief Justice has pointed out during the argument that the whole voyage would not be covered by the construction contended for by Mr. Mill. I take what was intended to be this: "You apply the policy to any risk you please, but must be bound by the appropriation you make and communicate to us in London. In one sense, a positive condition, and it means that the appropriation is to be declared in London according to the instructions from abroad." I adopt Lord Mansfield's view that the naming of what it is which the policy is to attach is a power given to the assured, and that it may be exercised at any time so long as there is no fraud. There is nothing to show that that power was taken away when a declaration was made. The plaintiffs therefore are entitled to judgment.

MELLOR, J.—I am of the same opinion. The object of the contract was, on the part of the defendants, to protect themselves against a double appropriation of the risk, and, on the part of the Hong Kong Company, to protect themselves against any excess beyond 5000*l.* insured by them in any particular ship. The loss of the ship was the risk insured against, but the excess beyond the 5000*l.*, and in that view the knowledge of the loss of the ship is not material. I entirely agree in what my brothers have said, and I will not dwell over the same ground again.

HEX, J.—I am of the same opinion. The defendants' contract of the 19th March, have undertaken to insure the excess of risk above 5000*l.*, which the Hong Kong Company may have on goods in any particular ship. The Red Gauntlet, which had been insured by the Hong Kong Company for a risk of 5000*l.*, was one of that class of ships. On the plain meaning of the words of the contract, the excess of risk on the Red Gauntlet would be within the contract. At the time the policy of the 19th March was effected, it was known to both parties that the Red Gauntlet was lost, but it was not known that the Red Gauntlet was one of the ships which had been insured by the Hong Kong Company. To vitiate the policy there must be knowledge that the risk insured against was terminated. It was not known that any risk on the ship Red Gauntlet had been taken by the Hong Kong Company. Then it was said by Mr. Bovill that the ship was not declared, and that therefore the policy did not attach. The contract is, that the defendants will insure, and the plaintiffs engage to declare the ship. That can only mean that the assured is to declare in what ship the Hong Kong Company have a risk exceeding 5000*l.* The appropriation is the thing done in Calcutta. The taking of the risk and the policy attached upon the appropriation. The declaration is of an appropriation made abroad. The defendants could not, in my opinion, have defeated the policy if they had known that the risk insured against, as well as the ship, had been lost.

Damages—Wrongful detention.

A vessel wrongfully arrested in a cause of damage was, after sentence in the damage suit, detained for twelve days, the plaintiff intimating his intention of appealing against the sentence:

Held, that the plaintiff must pay damages for the twelve days' detention.

This was a cause of damage in which the vessel was arrested on Aug. 15, and continued in arrest until Nov. 26, when the cause was tried and dismissed with costs. Upon application on behalf of the plaintiff the Court ordered the vessel to remain in arrest, as the plaintiff declared his intention to appeal against the sentence. After twelve days, however, he gave notice of his intention to abandon the appeal, and the vessel was accordingly released.

Deane, Q. C., for the defendant, now moved to condemn the plaintiff in damages occasioned by the wrongful detention.

Clarkson contra.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This case is indeed one of great hardship to the defendant, as his vessel has been several months under arrest for alleged misconduct, of which he has been proved to be innocent. I do not remember an application like the present to have been hitherto made, but I think it right that the plaintiff should pay for the damages occasioned by the twelve days' wrongful detention.

The parties being unable to agree as to the amount of loss incurred,

The Court ordered that the matter be referred to the registrar and merchants to report thereon.

Liability for damage—Vessel and freight insufficient—Admiralty Court Act 1861, sect. 15.If the value of the deft.'s vessel and freight be not equal to the damage done, the plt. may, after judgment, obtain a monition against the deft. personally to satisfy the deficiency.Quære, whether a personal action can be combined with a real action already commenced.

The plt. in this cause, Mr. Henry Tensdale, owner of the steam-tug Emperor, sued for damages occasioned by a collision between that vessel and the brig Zephyr. The action was entered for 700*l.*, and the Zephyr was arrested. The Zephyr being a vessel of eighty-nine tons, the liability of her owners, as limited by the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, to st. per ton, would extend to 712*l.* if damage to that amount were proved. Her full value was, however, found to be only 400*l.*, for which bail was given. This last sum being all that could be recovered by the present proceedings in rem,

Deane, Q.C., on behalf of the plt., now moved the court for leave to amend the præcipe to institute the cause by inserting therein the names of the owners of the Zephyr, so as to make them personally defts., and for a citation in personam against them. The application is novel, but unless some remedy of the nature prayed be given, the plt. would have no alternative but to commence another action in this court, or one of the courts of common law, for any sum to which he might be entitled over and above the 400*l.*

Clarkson contra.—The application is both novel and improper. The plt. has no right to assume what we deny, viz., that the damage done exceeds the amount for which bail has already been given.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—I have only known of one instance in which a personal action has been grafted on a suit in rem. There is some difficulty in altering the præcipe as prayed, and such a course appears to the court unnecessary, inasmuch as the 15th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, gives the court power to effect the object with which the motion has been made. That section (a) puts decrees of the Court of Admiralty upon the same footing as judgments in the Superior Courts of common law, and gives a remedy as well against the ships and goods arrested as against the person of the judgment-creditor. If, therefore, the occasion should arise, a monition might issue to compel the owners of the Zephyr to pay the amount of damages not covered by the bail bond.

Motion rejected

(a) The following is the section referred to. All decrees and orders of the High Court of Admiralty, whereby any sum of money, or any costs, charges, or expenses shall be payable to any person, shall have the same effect as judgments in the Superior Courts of common law, and the persons to whom any such moneys or costs, charges, or expenses, shall be payable, shall be deemed judgment-creditors, and all powers of enforcing judgments possessed by the Superior Courts of common law, or any judge thereof, with respect to matters depending in the same courts, as well against the ships and goods arrested as against the person of the judgment-debtor, shall be possessed by the said Court of Admiralty with respect to matters therein depending, and all remedies at common law possessed by judgment-creditors shall be in like manner possessed by persons to whom any moneys, costs, charges, or expenses are by such orders or decrees of the said Court of Admiralty directed to be paid.

Possession—Sale in a foreign port—Dissent of the master.Seemle, if an extreme necessity existed for the sale of a British vessel at a foreign port, the British vice-consul at the port might, if the master neglected to sell, sanction the sale, which would then be valid notwithstanding the absence of the master's consent.

The facts of this case sufficiently appear from the judgment.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the pls.;

Deane, Q. C. and V. Lushington for the defts.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This British ship of eighty-five tons was sold at Terceira on the 31st Jan. 1861 without the direct authority of the owners. She passed into the hands of the purchasers, and was sold again, and since such sale she has come into this country, and is arrested by the former owners, who allege that the sale was illegal and did not divest their title. The law upon this question is, I apprehend, entirely settled, and I am not about to discuss it. The sale is valid, if a prudent sale and under an existing necessity, for, assuming that the sale was with the master's consent, and to be for the benefit of his owners, it would nevertheless not be valid unless there existed a necessity for the sale. The first inquiry therefore is, was there the necessity? But there is also a subordinate question. Was the sale effected with the consent of the master, against his consent, or did he remain neuter? It would be rather a startling proposition that such a sale could be valid against the consent of the master; but I am not prepared to say that under circumstances it might not be so: an overruling necessity admits of no law. No one can say what may be the circumstances which will constitute a case of necessity, some, however, may be stated: First, that the ship cannot, save at a ruinous cost, be repaired in the place where she is; secondly, that even if the repairs can be done at a cost not destructive to the interests of the owners, the master has not the means of so doing without a delay equally injurious to his owners; thirdly, that if he has such means he must be without the power of reasonable communication with his owners, i.e. such means of giving them notice as would not expose their property to imminent risk in the meantime, for I think it cannot be successfully maintained that imminent risk of a total loss should be incurred on the bare possibility of an ultimate repair of the ship. [The Court then examined the evidence in the cause, and held that, upon the facts of the case, there existed such a necessity as justified the sale. The Court then proceeded.] It now becomes necessary to consider the conduct of the master with reference to this sale. Mr. Read swears that the master consented to the sale; the master on the contrary swears that he objected to it. The master also swears that he was carried to the hospital and was under medical treatment for five weeks, three of which he was bedridden; but it clearly appears from the evidence, especially that of the lodging-house keeper, that he never was in the hospital at all. But what was the conduct of Mr. Read? Now, Mr. Read was, and had been for many years, vice-consul at Terceira, and it was his duty to render assistance to British vessels in distress, and especially where the master and mate were so seriously injured as they themselves represented. Mr. Read states the steps he took in the on of his duty. He advised that a survey be made of the vessel, and that there should be as well as Portuguese surveyors. The states that the vessel is entirely without without bulwarks, with her sides smashed, without bowsprit, her foremast and main-jack broken and nearly all her rigging and that all these damages proceeding from acts of the gale on the 26th inst., are of such re that the vessel cannot repair at Terceira, to insufficient resources. Now, I have not one word of argument calculated to convince that this is not a correct survey; and this being ch is the more probable statement, that of ad, that the master assented to the sale of sel, or the master's representation to the y? What did the master propose to do, to find money, how to do the repairs? What be done in the interval? There is no intimation that he said one word upon these matters, appears to me contrary to all probability that tain should declare an intention of pursuing er course. But I will assume for a moment e captain might not have given his consent, at considering the state in which the master te were, Mr. Read had acted in carrying out without authority from the master. Then Mr. Read would have been justified, and I he sale would have been valid if a case of necessity were proved, for it never can be d that the law would require the property of subjects to be sacrificed without reasonable Looking at all the facts of the case, and at the law, as I understand it to be, I think r result is, that the plts. who have entered to obtain possession of the vessel from won who derived his title from the sale succeed. I hold that the sale was valid, and dismiss this action with costs.

Re THE EXTRADITION OF JOHN C. BENNETT (under the Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, for the killing or maiming of John West on the high seas, on board a British barque).

Extradition—Murder on the high seas.

Under the Extradition Treaty between Great Britain and the United States a person charged with murder on the high seas on board a British vessel must be given up when claimed by Great Britain.

Murder on the high seas on board a British vessel is not committed within the jurisdiction of the United States, though the vessel comes into a port of the United States.

Whether evidence of justification of the killing can be received in proceedings under the treaty (Quere).

The case of Ternan and others, before the Q. B. (10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499), commented on and approved.

The accused, John C. Bennett, was brought before the Commissioner on a claim of extradition, he being charged with the murder of one John West on board the British brig Raymond, while on the high seas, bound to the port of New York. The evidence left no doubt of the killing.

After the evidence was closed the prisoner's counsel urged his discharge on the authority of a recent case decided by the Court of Q. B. (Re Ternan and others, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 499)

For the British Government F. F. Marbury; for the prisoner H. S. Smith.

The Commissioner rendered the following decision:—Assuming that the case presented comes within the treaty of the 9th Aug. 1842, between the United States and Great Britain, I am clearly of the opinion that the facts developed on the examination would warrant me in committing the accused for extradition under the treaty. The evidence received, to my mind, is clear and uncontradicted that the accused, through violence, caused the death of the coloured man West on board the British brig Raymond, whilst on the high seas, and no successful attempt on the part of the accused has been made to justify the act. Even admitting that evidence of justification could be legally received—of which, however, under the treaty I have great doubt—it is not for me to determine what effect it might or might not have upon the mind of a jury on a final hearing or trial for murder. Under the treaty I am only to determine the question of probable cause. The simple question here to be decided is, whether there is sufficient probable cause to justify his return for trial to the country within whose jurisdiction

the crime is charged to have been committed. The question, however, is raised as to whether this case does not come within the principles of law laid down in a recent case under the treaty, decided in the Court of Q. B., in the matter of Ternan and others, prisoners in the gaol of Liverpool, who were discharged by that court upon a writ of habeas corpus issued on their behalf. It is contended that the principles involved in that case are analogous to those arising in the case under consideration. It appears that the prisoners in the case referred to were arrested and detained under the treaty as pirates, and their extradition demanded by our Government. The opinions of the learned justices of the court in that case are certainly entitled to very great respect and consideration, and though their decisions are not absolutely binding upon me in determining the case under consideration, I should certainly feel bound to give great weight to their unbiassed adjudication upon the principles of law therein passed upon, were the same questions involved in the case before me; but upon a careful analysis of the decision rendered in that case, I am at a loss to discover wherein the principles therein enunciated are in the least applicable, or can in any wise govern or control the present case. The learned justices of the Q. B., in that case, as I understand it, decided that the crimes for which extradition can be demanded under the treaty must have been committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of the power which demands the extradition; while crimes committed within the concurrent jurisdiction of both powers are not covered by the treaty—that the crime with which the prisoners in the case before them were charged was piracy by the law of nations, which is punishable wherever the offender may be found, and was not, therefore, committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States; that the piracy which is especially named in the treaty is not piracy by the law of nations, but that other class of offences which are declared to be piracy by statute. Admitting, therefore, the full force and correctness of the decision in the Court of Q. B., I am unable to determine wherein the principles therein determined can in any way change the interpretation which has been universally given by our courts and Government to the treaty in cases of murder on the high seas. It cannot, in my judgment, be legally claimed that murder on the high seas, when committed on board a British vessel, is within the concurrent jurisdiction of both the United States and Great Britain, and unless that position can be sustained, the assumed analogy most certainly falls. In the case under consideration the crime charged and proved is murder on the high seas, on board the British brig Raymond, and I have not been able to find any adjudication, either in this country or in England, holding that there is a concurrent jurisdiction in such cases; all of the authorities upon this point agree, and I am compelled, therefore, to determine that the crime charged was committed within the exclusive jurisdiction of Great Britain. It has always been the policy of this Government to place the most liberal construction upon all her treaty stipulations with foreign states; and whenever it has been clearly established that a crime has been committed against a foreign state, which comes within our treaty stipulations, we have ever shown a readiness to surrender the criminal to justice—and justice certainly can be as fairly and impartially administered in the country within whose exclusive jurisdiction the offence has been committed, as within the asylum or country to which he may have fled. Ever sensitive as our Government is to the protection of its own citizens, it never will, I trust, assume, against treaty stipulations, to become the guardian and protector of escaped and fleeing criminals, when legally demanded. Assuming the truth of the position of the counsel for accused, that the British Government did, in that case, unfairly and illegally intervene to prevent the extradition of criminals when demanded by our Government, I cannot see that it would follow by any process of reasoning, or on any principle of law or justice (except it be that of retaliation), that we should be swerved from that high and honourable position as a nation which we have ever maintained, in carrying out treaty stipulations toward foreign Governments. I am, however, most happy to say that upon a careful examination of the case decided in the Court of Q. B. I am unable to discover any disposition upon the part of the learned justices delivering the opinions to render any interpretation of the treaty inconsistent with their heretofore high legal standing, or with that of the opinions of our ablest jurists. Applying, therefore the principles announced in that case to the one under consideration, I am not at a loss to determine as to the right or duty of granting the certificate. I shall therefore grant the certificate of extradition, and in the meantime the accused must stand committed to await the action of the Executive in the matter.

HAMILTON E. TOWLE v. THE GREAT EASTERN.

Salvage—Passenger—Ordinary and extraordinary duties.

A passenger can render salvage services to the vessel on board which he is a passenger, though his relation of passenger still continues:

But such services must be of an extraordinary character, and beyond the line of his duty, to render him a salvor.

Pumping and aiding in working a ship by usual and well-known means, would not be extraordinary services.

The Great Eastern, having disabled her paddle-wheels, and broken her rudder shaft in a gale, lay in the trough of the sea for about thirty-six hours, during which time the officers of the ship had endeavoured in vain to repair the damage. The libellant, a passenger on board, then, with the consent of the captain of the ship, undertook to put in execution a plan which he had devised for steering the ship himself, superintended the work, and succeeded in remedying the difficulty, so that the vessel was brought out of the trough of the sea, and came into port in safety:

Held, that these services were extraordinary services for which the court would award salvage compensation to him.

The vessel was valued at least at $500,000. The time occupied in rigging the libellant's apparatus was about twenty-four hours.

Held, that the case is novel, and but little light can be obtained from precedents, in fixing the amount of compensation. On the whole case $15,000 awarded.

Cases of The Branston, 2 Hagg. 3, and The Vrede, 1 Lush. 322, discussed.

The facts of the case need not be separately stated, as they are fully set forth in the opinion.

For libellant were, G. F. Curtis and Hall; and for claimants Eratts, Southmayd and Choate.

SHIPMAN, J.—On the 10th Sept., 1861, the steamship Great Eastern left Liverpool for New York, with about four hundred passengers and a considerable cargo, together with about four hundred persons as officers and crew, including engineers, firemen, servants, &c. She was, as is well known, the largest ship that ever floated the sea, and was of great value. Her original cost was very large, but owing to her great draft of water and unwieldy proportions, which limited in many directions her general usefulness as an instrument of commercial enterprise, it is difficult to state her exact value at the time the events occurred upon which this suit is founded. But from the evidence before this court, it is safe to conclude that she was at that time worth more than half-a-million of dollars. Beyond this, her value is not important for the purposes of this case. Among her passengers on this voyage was the libellant in this suit. On Thursday, the 12th Sept., two days after the ship left Liverpool, and about two hundred and eighty miles west of Cape Clear, she encountered a heavy storm, which did great damage to, and finally swept away, her paddle-wheels and several of her boats. Her screw, or propeller, however, remained substantially uninjured, and by this she could make very good headway, when under steam. During the evening or night of the 12th, she fell off into the trough of the sea, and rolled with such violence as to carry from side to side of the ship all the moveable objects on her decks and in her cabins. Much of her furniture was broken up and destroyed, several of her crew and passengers injured, and a great part of the luggage of the latter was drenched and crushed into a mass of worthless rubbish. The immense size of the ship rendered her motions, when rolling in the trough of a heavy sea, much more dangerous and destructive than those of a ship of ordinary dimensions. During the night it was discovered that her rudder-shaft, which was large, and of wrought iron, had been twisted off below all the points of connection with the steering gear. The ship, therefore, lay helpless in the trough of the sea, rolling heavily with every swell. Her sails were blown away in a subsequent attempt to control her movements by them, and no means were left by which her head could be brought up, and her position on the sea changed. She was as unmanageable as if her rudder had been entirely gone. The only way, therefore, to get any control of the motions of the ship, was to secure some kind of efficient steering-gear by attaching it to the rudder-shaft below the point of fracture, and connecting it with the wheel. This was a work of considerable danger, and of great difficulty. It was, however, finally done, and the ship was again got under control, taken out of the trough of the sea, and steered safely back to port. The libellant claims that he devised and executed the plan of this new steering-gear, and the means by which it was made available, and that the ship was thus saved from great peril chiefly through his instrumentality. To recover compensation, in the nature of salvage, for this service, he has brought this suit. Before passing to the questions of law which have been raised and discussed on this trial, I will state the facts which I hold to be proved by the evidence. In doing this I shall not detail the evidence further than may be necessary to enable me to state my own conclusions. 1. The ship was brought into a condition of great peril by the breaking of her rudder-shaft in the afternoon, or during the night, of the 12th. In consequence of this accident she fell off into the trough of the sea and there lay in a helpless condition. The storm was very violent during Thursday night, but began to abate on Friday morning, and had, in the main, ceased on Saturday evening. But the ground-swell continued, and kept the ship rolling more or less until about five o'clock on Sunday evening, when her head was brought up, and she was started on her course. During all this time she lay drifting on the waves, every attempt to get control of her rudder, or rig other steering apparatus, having failed. It requires no argument, and little evidence beyond what the common history of the sea furnishes, to prove that this immense and unwieldy ship, on the ocean, nearly three hundred miles from land, with eight hundred souls on board, in this disabled and helpless condition, was in great danger and exposed to numerous perils. 2. Between Friday morning and Saturday afternoon the officers of the ship had made repeated attempts to get control of her motions. It is not necessary to detail these experiments. It is sufficient to say that they all proved fruitless. Finally, the chief engineer commenced unscrewing a large nut on the rudder shaft. This nut was on that part of the shaft which was below the upper deck, and in an apartment on the deck below at the stern of the ship. This apartment has been termed, in this case, the steerage-deck. The rudder-shaft passed up through it. On the shaft within this steerage-deck was the frustum of a ribbed iron cone, through the centre of which the shaft passed. The base of this cone rested on iron balls, the balls running in a circular groove sunk in an iron plate fastened to the deck, which constituted the floor of the apartment. The cone was fastened to the shaft firmly by appropriate means, so that they revolved together, as if one piece of iron. On the rudder shaft, at the top of the cone, was a large nut, the one already referred to, which was screwed down firmly on the head of the cone. This nut, it will thus be seen, kept the cone down to its proper position, so that the base was made to traverse on the balls, and the cone and nut formed, together, a head or collar which contributed to support the weight of the rudder and shaft. The rudder shaft had broken off at or near the top of this nut. The last attempted experiment of the chief engineer was to unscrew this nut, with the design to secure, if possible, a tiller up on the end of the broken shaft, and thus, with the aid of the wheel in the steerage deck, to steer the ship. He had partly unscrewed the nut, though it was a work of considerable difficulty, as the nut and shaft turned by every blow of the sea on the rudder blade, when the libellant learned the fact. The latter regarded the nut as a very important means of supporting the rudder and the shaft, and looked upon its removal with alarm, on the ground that, if this support were removed, it might lead to a total loss of the rudder. He communicated his fears to the captain of the ship, and the engineer was ordered to desist. It is impossible to tell what would have been the result of this experiment, had it been carried out, although by unscrewing the nut an inch the rudder fell half that distance; but it appears from the testimony of one of the witnesses that the engineer did not expect to be able to fit the tiller to the end of the broken shaft under three or four days. The captain seemed now to have lost confidence in the chief engineer's ability to restore the control of the rudder. His own efforts had failed. Attempts had been made to secure control by winding chains round the cone on the shaft and connecting them with tackles fixed to the ship's sides, to be worked by men at each end. This failed. A spar was rigged over the stern of the ship as a temporary means of steering, and that also failed. Sails had been hoisted to change her position, but had been blown to pieces. It is evident, from the testimony, that after the captain had arrested the unscrewing of the nut, both he and his officers had exhausted their expedients for getting control of the rudder so as to steer the ship, and bring her up out of the trough of the swell. The situation of the ship and the persons on board of her was now such as might well alarm the most accomplished and intrepid navigator, and lead him to welcome any aid which gave any hope of relief, especially when it proposed no experiment which could involve the ship in new dangers. 3. The libellant is a civil and mechanical engineer, regularly educated for his profession, and, prior to taking passage in this ship, had had considerable experience in responsible stations, both at home and abroad, where high professional skill was required. He had not been an indifferent spectator of such of the various attempts as he had seen made to get the ship under control prior to the commencement of the unscrewing of the nut. He had revolved a plan in his own mind, drawn a sketch of it, had shown it to the chief engineer, who had treated it with rudeness, which is not surprising, when we remember that in every profession men are apt to be impatient of outside interference in times of perplexity and danger. The captain, however, having exhausted his own expedients and those of his officers, and evidently alarmed for the safety of the ship, decided that the libellant should try his. He put a sufficient number of men at his disposal, and the libellant entered upon his work. He had already matured his plan, and after ascertaining by calculations the necessary strength of the materials which he knew he could use, he felt confident that his plan was secure from danger or failure. He proceeded to the steerage deck with the men detailed to work under his directions. This was about five o'clock on Saturday afternoon. There is some conflict in the evidence as to who superintended the operation of screwing the nut back again; but, on the whole evidence, I think the weight of it sustains the statement of Mr. Towle himself that he did. I will not here detail the progress of the libellant's labours. It is sufficient to state that, after three hours' labour, he succeeded in screwing the nut back to its place, and having obtained from the forward part of the ship an immense chain, weighing about sixty pounds to the link, which was let down into the steerage deck through a hole cut in the upper deck by his directions, he succeeded in winding round the cone on the rudder shaft a sufficient portion of this chain to constitute a cylinder or drum, and thus secured a leverage obtainable in no other way. The ends of the chain were then extended from the cylinder to two strong posts or bitts which came up through this deck. A turn was taken round each of these bitts, and the ends of the large chain were then connected with tackles fastened to the respective sides of the ship for taking up the slack and easing the strain on the wheel used immediately for steering. Smaller chains connected the wheel with the large chain before described, and the size of the shackles making the connections were arranged so that in the event of a break it would not occur in the great chain or its lashings, but in the smaller or connecting chains or shackles. The links of the large chain composing the cylinder were lashed to each other, and to the base of the cone, by smaller chains which were passed through the holes in its base. The alternate links of the large chain, on the inner coil, sank in between the ribs of the cone, and thus tended to prevent slipping and to diminish the strain on the lashings. The smaller chains connecting with the wheel were fastened to the large chain composing the cylinder and extending to and around the deck-bitts, at a point between the bitts and the cylinder, so that, in the event of the breaking of the smaller chains, the rudder would still be held in position by the large chain, as the latter was wound round the bitts by one turn, and the ends secured to tackles fastened to the sides of the ship and manned for the purpose of taking up the slack and easing away, as the rudder-shaft was turned one way or the other by the movement of the wheel. This is a brief and general outline of the plan devised and executed by this libellant for rescuing this ship from her perilous situation. It is difficult to make the description of the arrangement clear without drawings and illustrations addressed to the eye. This arrangement was completed during Saturday night and Sunday, and at five o'clock p.m. on Sunday the ship was brought up to the sea and put on her course. 4. The labour of the libellant, both manual and mental, during the execution of his plan, was very considerable—so much so as to reduce him at one time to a state of great exhaustion. It was attended with some danger, owing to the size of the chain, and the spanner with which the nut was screwed back. The large chain weighed 60lbs. to the link, and the spanner or wrench weighed 130lbs. The latter was suspended from the upper deck by ropes or chains, and used by holding it to the nut, securing it to the latter by a pin, to prevent it from slipping, and then a blow of the sea on the rudder-blade drove round the shaft, and brought the nut down on the thread. As the cone turned with the shaft, the constant swell of the sea kept both in motion, which increased the difficulty of lashing the links of the large chain, and made it a more or less dangerous work. 5. While the libellant was engaged in perfecting his plan for steering the ship, Capt. Walker, who was in command of the Great Eastern, and his officers were also at work in connecting a large chain to the rudder, by passing it round the latter and securing it at the outer edge of the rudder blade by a shackle, and then bringing one end over the larboard and the other over the starboard quarter of the ship, and securing them on deck. The object of this arrangement was also to aid in steering the ship, by manning the ends of the chain on deck, so that the rudder could be moved either way, as either end of the chain might be hauled on. How much this contrivance was used it is difficult to determine exactly, from the evidence. I am satisfied, however, that it was greatly inferior, and subordinate, both in its use and capacities, to that arranged by the libellant in the steerage-deck. That the latter was the efficient and principal means by which this great ship, with her valuable cargo and priceless freight of human lives, was saved from a condition of peril, I cannot doubt in view of the evidence. Well might Capt. Walker exhibit a lively sense of gratitude toward the libellant, as the evidence discloses that he did, when the success of the latter's plan was demonstrated by trial. In view of these facts, and the well-settled rules of law applicable to salvage claims, had the libellant fallen in with this ship thus at sea, disabled, and at the mercy of the winds and waves, and had gone from his own vessel on board of her, and rendered these services, I should feel no hesitation in pronouncing him a salvor, and entitled to a liberal reward. It is well said by Dr. Lushington, in the case of the Charlotte, 3 Wm. Rob. 71, that "According to the principles which are recognised in this court, in questions of this description, all services rendered at sea, to a vessel in danger or distress, are salvage services. It is not necessary, I conceive, that the distress should be actual or immediate, or that the danger should be imminent and absolute; it will be sufficient if, at the time the assistance is rendered, the ship has encountered any damage or misfortune, which might possibly expose her to destruction if the service were not rendered." This doctrine has been repeatedly sanctioned by the courts of the United States, and very recently by this tribunal: (Hennessey v. The ship Versailles, 1 Curt. R. 355; Williamson v. The brig Alphonso, Ib. 378; Winser v. The Cornelius Grinnell, MSS.) In the case last cited Curtis, J. remarks: "It has been strongly urged that both the peril and the service were too slight to bring the case within the technical definition of salvage; but I am not of this opinion. The relief of property from an impending peril of the sea, by the voluntary exertions of those who are under no legal obligation to render assistance, and the consequent ultimate safety of the property, constitute a state of salvage. It may be a case of more or less merit, according to the degree of peril in which the property was and the danger and difficulty of relieving it. But these circumstances affect the degree of the service, not its nature." The authorities are abundant and decisive on this point: (The Independence, 2 Curt. R. 352-353; The Reward, 1 Wm. Rob. 174.) I come now to the consideration of much the most important question in this case, and one upon which the authorities are not very numerous, and, as I view them, not decisive. The claimants insist that, even if the elements of a salvage service were otherwise found in the case, yet the libellant is precluded from salvage compensation on the ground that, during the whole period of peril and of the performance of the service rendered, he was a passenger. The very able argument of the advocate for the claimants proceeds upon the ground that the connection of the libellant with the ship as passenger was not dissolved prior to the performance of the service, and that, as the relation of passenger imposed upon him the duty of aiding in the relief of the ship from the common peril in which he was involved with the rest on board, the law does not recognise him as a salvor. If this point is well taken, it is a complete answer to the libellant's claim for salvage compensation. The principal cases relied on to support this position are The Branston, 2 Hagg. 3, and The Vrede, 1 Lush. 322. The report of the case in 2 Hagg. is in these words: "This brig, homeward bound, got into distress, and a lieutenant of the royal navy, a passenger on board, contributed his assistance and claimed to be remunerated. By the Court: Where there is a common danger, it is the duty of every one on board the vessel to give all the services he can, and more particularly this is the duty of one whose ordinary pursuits enable him to render most effectual service. No case has been cited where such a claim by a passenger has been established, though a passenger is not bound like a mariner to remain on board, but may take the first opportunity of escaping from the ship and saving his own life. I reject the claim." The facts in the case of the Vrede, decided by Dr. Lushington, are reported as follows: "The plts. were twenty emigrant passengers on board the Dutch bark Vrede, suing for alleged salvage services to that vessel and her cargo, after she had received damage from a collision. The collision took place about five o'clock a.m. of the 27th Nov. 1859, off the South Foreland, and the Vrede sustained great damage, and began to make water rapidly. The plts. manned the pumps and kept working them. At seven o'clock a steam-tug took the vessel in tow. The passengers continued to work the pumps, and about noon the vessel was safely brought into Ramsgate harbour. The petition alleged that the plts. might have left the Vrede in the boats or in the steam-tug, but remained on board to work the pumps at the request of the master, and that but for their services the Vrede must have foundered and been lost with her cargo. The answer admitted the facts generally, except as to the extent of the Vrede's danger." Dr. Lushington, after remarking that, although passengers must have often rendered services at sea, yet, except the cases of the Branston and the Salacia, no claim had ever before been prosecuted in the Admiralty Court for salvage, and that this fact was sufficient to put the court on its guard against readily allowing the claim, says: "It is true, as the counsel for the plts. have urged to-day, that a pilot or master or ship's crew may sue as salvors in certain circumstances, and so I say that in certain circumstances passengers may also sue as salvors. But it is equally clear that it is only extraordinary circumstances, in the strict sense, which can justify a claim for salvage from persons so related to the ship as the first class of persons I have named. A master cannot be a salvor so long as he is performing his duties as master under his contract; nor can a mariner until his contract is at an end; nor can a steam-tug under a contract to tow make a title, unless, unforeseen dangers arising, she performs different services from those stipulated for in the original contract. With respect to a passenger, there is no engagement on his part to perform any service, but there is a contract between him and the shipowner, that for a certain money payment the ship shall carry him and his property to the place of destination. To a certain extent, therefore, he is bound up with the ship." Dr. Lushington then proceeds to comment upon the case of Newman v. Walters, 3 Bos. & Pull. Rep., and to distinguish the one before him from it. He says, "The circumstances are not the same or nearly the same." After considering the case of the Florence, 16 Jur. 572, and 20 Eng. L. & Eq. 607, where salvage had been awarded to a mate and seaman for services rendered their own ship, by them, after they had been separated from it, he adds: "That case again is no authority to-day. I say, that in circumstances such as these, passengers could not claim as salvors. Here the passengers were never separated from the ship, and their only service consisted in pumping. They pumped first, as they themselves admit, to save their own lives and property. For such efforts in a time of common danger they were not entitled to salvage, by the authority of the Branston. Then the steamer comes up and takes the vessel in tow. I am of opinion that all danger then ceased, whatever danger might have been. The tug and the pilot-cutter were present; the water was smooth and the weather fine, and a harbour at no great distance. The passengers might, if they chose, have left the ship, but they remained on board and continued working at the pumps. I cannot consider the ship to have been in any danger of sinking, and I think I should be furnishing an evil example, if I encouraged suits of this description. I pronounce against the claim of the plts., but without costs." It is obvious that the language of Dr. Lushington in this case of the Vrede is very guarded. There must have been a reason for this, and it is important to understand the extent to which his decision has carried the law, for I should hesitate long before I should pronounce judgment in conflict with the opinion of this eminent jurist. In order to arrive at a correct conclusion on this point, we must notice the scope of the Branston as an authority. The latter case is a very simple one. The report is brief, and all that appears from it is that the libellant, a lieutenant of the Royal Navy, "contributed his assistance while the vessel in which he was a passenger was in distress." What the nature of that assistance was, or under what particular circumstances it was rendered, does not appear. I conclude that the service rendered was of the ordinary character, and consisted in assisting in working the brig in those ordinary ways well known to seamen. I can draw no other inference from the case, and upon such a state of facts I think it very clear that any court would have rejected the claim. In the case of the Vrede, the services rendered were also of the ordinary kind, and consisted solely in pumping. I understand it to be a well-known rule that passengers are bound to render all such ordinary aid to the ship when she is in distress. They are bound to man the pumps, the windlass, and the ropes, and to assist in working the ship in all ways known to seamen, as far as they may be able. The line of their duty extends, at least, thus far. But the question now before the court is, whether there are not extraordinary services which a passenger may render, that extend beyond the line of his duty, and which may entitle

HAMILTON E. TOWLE v. THE GREAT EASTERN.

HAMILTON E. TOWLE v. THE GREAT EASTERN.

him to salvage compensation. That this question is not decided in the negative by the Branston or the Vrede is, I think, clear. It has been strenuously urged on the argument, that no services that a passenger can render to avert a common danger, while his relation as passenger continues, can exceed the limit of his duty. This doctrine certainly is not laid down in the Branston nor in the Vrede; for in the latter case the learned judge, in the vital part of his opinion, is careful to say: "Here the passengers were never separated from the ship, and their only service consisted in pumping." Surely, if he intended to lay down the rule that the passengers must in all cases be first separated from the ship before they can become salvors, he would have so declared in terms. The point is so sharp and decisive as to admit of no ambiguity in the language of a judicial opinion. I include in the term separation from the ship, both actual personal disconnection therefrom, and a severance of their ordinary relations as passengers, though they may still remain on the vessel. That there has been, for a long time, a general impression, that a passenger may become a salvor by rendering extraordinary services on board of his own ship, the language of decided cases and text writers abundantly shows. I am aware that this impression can, in many instances, be traced to the influence of Newman v. Walters, but I think it equally true that it has derived strength from sound principles. In the case of Newman v. Walters, the ship had struck on a shoal, and the captain and part of the crew had deserted her. The plt. took command of her and brought her safe into port. The jury gave him a verdict, and on a motion for a new trial Lord Alvanley, C. J., remarks: "Without entering into the distinctions respecting the duties incumbent on a passenger in particular cases, I think that if he goes beyond those duties he is entitled to a reward in the same manner as any other person. In this case the plt. did not act as a passenger when he took upon himself the direction of the ship; he did more than was required of him in that situation; and having saved the ship by his exertions, is entitled to retain his verdict in this action." Language substantially like this is used in various decided cases and by text writers. In several instances the doctrine is discussed and applied to cases where the capacity of a pilot to become a salvor was in question, but this strengthens the principle when applied to passengers: (Hope and others v. the brig Dido, 2 Paine C. C. Rep. 243; Leu v. the ship Alexander, Ib. 470, 471; Hobart v. Drogan, 10 Pet. Rep. 108; Abbott on Shipping, p. 560; note 1 of Story & Perkins; Marvin on Wrecks and Salvage, ss. 140 and 149; Le Tigre, 3 Wash. C. C. R. 567.) The learned author of Marvin on Wrecks and Salvage, p. 160, remarks: "It is agreed, too, that seamen may, while their legal connection with the ship still subsists, earn salvage for services rendered to ship or cargo, exceeding the line of their duty. But there is great difficulty in defining that line, and determining what services are within and what beyond it. No such determination can be made beforehand, and each case must be determined by its circumstances." In the Neptune Lord Stowell says: "I will not say that in the infinite range of possible events that may happen in the intercourse of men, circumstances might not present themselves that might induce the court to open itself to their claim of a persona standi in judicio." The authorities cited show that officers and crew, pilots and passengers may all become salvors when they perform services to the ship in distress, beyond the line of their duty. The duties of passengers are much more circumscribed than those of sailors or pilots; and it would seem that all the law imposes upon them is to assist in the ordinary manual labour of working and pumping the ship, under the direction of those in command of her. If they assume extraordinary responsibilities, and devise original and independent means by which the ship is saved, after her officers have proved themselves powerless, I see no reason, and know of no authority, that can prohibit them from being considered as salvors. I think it follows, from the principles laid down by the authorities, first, that a passenger on board a ship can render salvage service to that ship when in distress at sea; secondly, that in order to do this he need not be first personally disconnected from the ship; but thirdly, that these services, in order to constitute him a salvor, must be of an extraordinary character, and beyond the line of his duty, and not mere ordinary services, such as pumping and aiding in working the ship by usual and well-known means. That the services of the libellant in the present case were of an unusual character cannot be denied. After the officers of the ship had exhausted their means of getting control of the rudder, he devised, and with the aid of a large number of men put under his directions by the captain executed, a plan which, in the judgment of this court, was the efficient means of rescuing this great vessel from peril. The whole work of accomplishing this result was intrusted to him and to his directions. If it is said that he got his main idea of the plan he carried out, from witnessing an experiment of the engineer, which I doubt; still the effort of that officer had entirely failed, and was an abandoned experiment. The merit of the libellant in overcoming the obstacles which had proved insurmountable to the engineer, is, in my judgment, enhanced rather than diminished by the unsuccessful effort of the latter. That the service rendered by the libellant was a very difficult one, is proved by the fact that the able and experienced officers of this ship had failed to accomplish the result which he finally secured. They had spent two days of fruitless effort, though stimulated by motives as powerful as can be addressed to the minds of men. It required no little moral courage for this libellant to interpose to arrest the unscrewing of the nut on the rudder-shaft, and then assume the responsibility of a new and different experiment, which would consume precious time, and might thus produce appalling consequences. Had he failed, the consequences to him would have been injurious and humiliating. The whole circumstances of the case are so extraordinary as to leave no doubt in my mind that the services which he performed were wholly beyond his duty as a passenger, and therefore entitled him to salvage compensation. In fixing the amount of compensation, it must be considered that, though the service was one of conspicuous merit, and the amount of property saved large, yet the personal danger encountered by the libellant was not very great; and the only things contributed by him were personal skill and labour. He supplied no materials and risked no property, though his labours were protracted and exhausting. On the other hand, he rescued the ship from great peril by his own ingenuity, courage and skill. That the peril of the ship was great, and her position critical in the judgment of her commander, is evident from the fact that he intrusted to this stranger a work, upon the success of which her salvation depended, and which for nearly two days had utterly baffled him and his engineers. The case is so novel a one, in all its leading features, that little light can be derived from precedents, to guide me in fixing the amount to be awarded; but I have concluded, on the whole, to allow fifteen thousand dollars. Let a decree be entered for the libellant for that amount with costs.

COLLINS v. LAMPORT.

[CHAN.]

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY.

Reported by THOMAS BROOKMAN and JAMES R. DAVISON, Esqrs. Barristers-at-Law.

Dec. 8 and 9, 1864.

(Before the LORD CHANCELLOR (Westbury.)

COLLINS v. LAMPORT.

Mortgages of a ship—Rights of mortgagor—Power of mortgagor to contract—Merchant Shipping Act 1854, ss. 70, 71.

R., the owner of a ship, having mortgaged the same to the defts., contracted with L. for the sale of the ship to him, and before R. became finally bound by the contract, L. entered into a charter-party with the plts. It was held to be established on the evidence that the plts., though dealing with L., had knowledge of the fact of his imperfect title, and of R.'s ownership.

Before the vessel started on her voyage, R. stopped payment, whereupon the defts., the mortgagees, took steps towards selling the ship. It appearing that the terms of the charter-party would not damage the security, an injunction to restrain any dealings with the ship inconsistent with the terms of the charter-party, was granted at the suit of the plts.

The effect of the Merchant Shipping Act upon the status of the mortgagee of a ship is as follows: It first declares that the mortgagee is not the owner; then that the mortgagor has not ceased to be the owner; then that the mortgagor shall be the owner, save so far as may be necessary for making the ship an available security for the mortgage-debt.

Hence the mortgagor of a ship remaining in possession has full power to enter into contracts with respect to the ship, provided they do not impair the security; but the mortgagee may at any time enter into the benefit of such contracts by giving notice of his having required payment of his debt.

This was an appeal motion.

The bill was filed by Phineas Davis Collins and William Aubrey Chandler, carrying on business under the firm of "P. D. Collins and Co.," as merchants, at 35, Seething-lane, against William James Lamport, George Holt, Philip Henry Holt, Edwin Spencer Roberts, Thomas Luccock, and (by amendment) James Webb, for an injunction against the defts. Lamport, G. Holt, P. H. Holt and Webb, to restrain dealings with a ship.

The plts.' case was that, early in September last, Thomas Ellis, a ship-broker, called upon the plts., and asked them if they would charter a ship which he had in view, and what rate of freight they would give. The plts. informed Ellis of their rate of freight, and handed him a form of charter-party. On the 10th Sept. Ellis sent to the plts. a charter-party of the ship Maria, then lying in the Thames, signed by the deft. Luccock as master of the ship. The charter-party stipulated that the plts. should give their acceptance for 75*l.* on account of the freight, and a further acceptance for 260*l.* on the sailing of the vessel.

The plts., surprised at the largeness of the required advance, made inquiry of Ellis, who explained that Luccock was negotiating the purchase of the ship from the deft. Roberts, who was the owner, and that the required acceptances were wanted to be delivered to the owner towards payment of the purchase-money. The plts. made no objection, but, in order to secure themselves, stipulated that Roberts, as owner, should confirm the transaction. This was agreed to, and Roberts, on the 12th Sept., addressed the following letter to the plts.:

Gentlemen,—In conformity with Captain Luccock's wish, I hereby undertake that, in consideration of your giving him your acceptances for 75*l.* here dated the 12th Sept., and one for 260*l.*, when the vessel be loaded at Newcastle, that I will not in any way interfere or permit any interference emanating from me to prevent her leaving London for Shields, or Shields to Seville, and that should she not proceed on her voyage from Newcastle, that I will return you your acceptance for 75*l.*

E. B. ROBERTS.

The plts. thereupon executed the charter-party, of the same date, whereby it was agreed that the ship should proceed to the Tyne or Middlesborough, as the plts.' agent might appoint, and there load, and being so loaded should proceed to Seville and deliver her cargo, agreeable to bills of lading, and having again loaded there or at one or two ports in Portugal, should return to England, or to the continent between Havre and Hamburg. Amongst other provisions was one that the master was to sign bills of lading or re-charter for more or less freight without prejudice to the charter-party.

On the execution of the charter-party the acceptance for 75*l.* was given.

In pursuance of the charter-party the ship Maria was sent to Newcastle, and there commenced loading. Whilst this was going on, on the 1st Oct. 1864, Roberts stopped payment. Thereupon Lamport, G. Holt and P. H. Holt, partners in the firm of Lamport and Holt, took possession of the ship as mortgagees for 800*l.* Roberts had discounted the acceptance for 75*l.*

The bill prayed that the defts. Lamport and Holt might be restrained from dealing with the ship in any way inconsistent with the charterparty, and from selling the ship without giving to the purchaser notice of the charter-party, and that the same might be specifically performed. The bill also prayed other alternative relief.

Since the bill was filed the defts., as alleged, had sold, or had agreed to sell, the ship to Webb.

Kindersley, V.C., on the 20th Oct. last, refused the motion for an injunction with costs.

From this order the plts. now appealed.

Glasse, Q.C. and T. H. Terrell for the plts.—The mortgagor is entitled to make contracts with respect to the ship. It would be impossible in all cases to search the various registers and procure the concurrence of the mortgagee. There is nothing to show that a charter-party entered into by the mortgagor, before the mortgagee has taken possession, is not binding on the mortgagee:

The European and Australian Royal Mail Company v. The Royal Mail Steam Packet Company, 4 H. & J. 676;

Marriott v. The Anchor Reversionary Company, 8 De J. F. & J. 177; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 500.

Baily, Q.C. and S. Osler for the mortgagees.—A mortgagee cannot absolutely dispose of the ship under the 71st section, if he is obliged to sell subject to the charter-party. The effect of the Merchant Shipping Act is to give the mortgagee a clear title, free from the engagements of the mortgagor:

The European Company v. The Royal Company (ship);

Dean v. McGin, 4 Bing. 45;

Dickinson v. Kirbhen, 8 E. & B. 789.

W. F. Robinson for Webb.

Glasse, Q.C. in reply.

SECS. 70 AND 71 OF THE MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT 1854 ARE AS FOLLOWS:

SECT. 70. A mortgagee shall not by reason of his mortgage be deemed to be the owner of a ship, or any share therein, nor shall the mortgagor be deemed to have ceased to be owner of such mortgaged ship or share, except in so far as may be necessary for making such ship or share available as a security for the mortgage-debt.

SECT. 71. Every registered mortgagee shall have power absolutely to dispose of the ship or share in respect of which he is registered, and to give effectual receipts for the purchase-money; but if there are more persons than one registered as mortgagees of the same ship or share, no subsequent mortgage shall, except under the order of some court capable of taking cognizance of such matters, sell such ship or share without the concurrence of every prior mortgagee.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I will tell you how the case strikes me at present; but I may probably deem it requisite to reserve the further consideration of the point of law which arises. The first question to be looked at is one of fact; because, unless we arrive at the conclusion that there was a valid contract, as between Roberts, the mortgagor, and the plts., it will be unnecessary to consider the operation of the mortgage, or the legal status of the mortgagee. With regard to the purchaser pendente lite, I have placed him in the same boat with the mortgagee, and in speaking of the mortgagee, therefore, I include the purchaser, because the purchaser's case must of necessity be the case of the mortgagee as already made in the suit. Now, to determine the first question, whether there was a good charter-party, a good valid contract between Roberts and the plts., that is to say, binding Roberts by the contract made by Luccock, the facts appear to be these: The ship had been mortgaged by Roberts, the original owner, to Messrs. Lamport and Holt; Roberts was desirous of selling the vessel; he intended to send her round to Newcastle or into the river Tyne for that purpose; whilst he was minded so to do, Ellis, a broker, comes to him and tells him that he knows of a person who would be willing to purchase the ship and give him 1000*l.* That person was Luccock. Luccock is brought into communication with Roberts, and terms of sale, subsequently reduced into writing, were agreed upon between them. It appears from that instrument that Luccock, before he proposed finally to bind himself by the contract, had actually treated with the plts. for chartering the ship to them, and this renders that circumstance apparent, that in the contract between Luccock and Roberts for the purchase of the ship, which was made on the 12th Sept., being the day of the date of the charter-party, the deposit to be paid by Luccock to Roberts is the sum of 75*l.*, which is there mentioned as the sum that Luccock was to receive from the plts. who had agreed to become the charterers of the vessel. What therefore is abundantly clear is this: that the intended position of the plts. as charterers of the vessel through the medium of a contract with Luccock, was perfectly well known to Roberts at the time when he entered into that agreement for the sale of the vessel to Luccock. Now the agreement itself would, in point of fact, give confirmation to the contract that Luccock had made, for it would have been impossible for Roberts, receiving through Luccock the money to be paid on the charter-party by the plts., to have afterwards turned round and repudiated that charter-party. But it is plain from the facts of the case that Roberts knew perfectly well that Luccock depended upon the charter-party for the means, or partly for the means, of completing his purchase. This also appears; that the charterers, namely, the plts., observing the singularity of the term, that they were to pay down at once 75*l.*, and being aware, as appears from the internal evidence, of the facts, of the position in which Luccock stood relatively to Roberts, were not content with dealing with Luccock alone, and it is clear that they required the adherence in a direct form of Roberts to the treaty which they had made with Luccock. It is quite plain, therefore, that Roberts placed Luccock, by what he did and agreed to, in a position of concluding a valid charter-party by his authority, no matter what might become of the contract to purchase between him and Luccock; and even, therefore, if that contract should fall to the ground (an event which was not anticipated, but which was supposed to be possible), the dealing of Luccock with the plts., to which Roberts adhered, and of which Roberts partially received the fruit and benefit, would be a dealing binding Roberts, no matter whether Luccock did or did not ultimately acquire the status of becoming owner of the vessel, the subject of the charter-party. Now this appears—I throw aside the affidavits, the swearing by the one party that he did not know this, and the swearing by the other party that he did know it, because I derive the conclusions of the knowledge of the parties from that, about which there can be no mistake, the evidentia rei from the internal evidence afforded by the facts themselves. 75*l.*, therefore, is paid over to Roberts, as being the first instalment of the freight money payable under the charter-party, and then the charterers, anticipating the possibility of Luccock's title failing, require from Roberts this engagement. The engagement is (it being contained in a letter by Roberts to the plts., the charterers): "In conformity with Capt. Luccock's wish, I hereby undertake that in consideration of of your giving me your acceptance for 75*l.*" (here dated the 12th Sept.), "and one for 260*l.* when the vessel be loaded at Newcastle" (terms taken out of the charter-party), "that I will not in any way interfere or permit any interference emanating from me to prevent her leaving London for Shields, or Shields to Seville." Now, what is the meaning of those words? Why, that Roberts distinctly says, for these considerations I will permit the vessel to be navigated and dealt with in conformity with the terms of the charter-party—for these things which are extracted and expressed in the letter are the very terms contained in the charter-party. The letter must be read, therefore, as if Roberts had written, "Your engagement with Luccock is an engagement with a man who is not yet complete owner of the vessel, and who, therefore, has no legal capacity to enter into the contract with you; but inasmuch as I am to receive the first fruits of the contract in the shape of the 75*l.* and of the 260*l.*, I will not interfere with your right to have the benefit of the contract and the performance of the contract, and if anything happens to annul this engagement between Luccock and you so that the ship shall not proceed on her voyage from Newcastle, then I return you the 75*l.*" Well, but when the facts are known, nothing can be more demonstrative of what was the real position of the parties. I care not whether Roberts gave antecedent authority to Luccock, or whether it be that Luccock having negotiated these terms, Roberts afterwards accepted and ratified them, and interposed his authority and right as still remaining owner of the vessel to the extent of assuring the plts. that they should have the benefit of the contract. In that state of the circumstances (and I have taken them from the admissions of both sides, founding my conclusions merely upon what the circumstances themselves abundantly prove) it is impossible to deny that the contract made, as I take it to have been made, between the plt. and Luccock, in the expectation that Luccock would become the owner, was a contract afterwards accepted, ratified and confirmed by Roberts, and Roberts is as much bound by it as if Roberts' name had been written in the charter-party instead of the name of Luccock. If that be so, the material point in the case is determined, and determined in a manner which I think the parties will find proceeds upon a view of the facts of the case, which it is impossible to contradict as not being the correct view. We then come to the question whether this transaction, admitting it to have that legal character which I have ascribed to it, still admits of being overreached, controlled and set aside by the authority of the mortgagees? Now Mr. Baily was desirous

COLLINS v. LAMPORT.

of introducing the case of the mortgagees by a statement that the ship anterior to this charter-party was already a ship destined for sale, and not, therefore, at liberty to be let. But, upon an examination of that, it turns out that there was no agreement whatever between the mortgagor and mortgagees that the ship should be sold and should not be chartered. All that does come out is the simple fact that the mortgagor was desirous of selling her, and had an intention to that effect, which having been carried into operation by the agreement with Luccock, the mortgagor, finding it necessary for the purposes of the purchaser that the purchaser should be at liberty at once to charter the ship, accedes to that being done. He was under no contract or agreement with the mortgagee other than that contained in the mortgage, that deprived him, by virtue of any agreement, of the right so to deal with his vessel: unless indeed there be in the mortgage, by virtue of the clauses in the statute, a power in the mortgagee ad libitum at any time to arrest everything that has been done by the mortgagor, and to take possession of the ship, stripping her entirely of any contract, of any engagement, to which she had been previously subjected by the mortgagor. Now the inconvenience of such a construction of the statute is palpable. The injustice of such a construction of the statute is also palpable. First, the inconvenience. No mortgagor could deal with his vessel in the ordinary way. Every operation would be incumbered by the necessity of resorting to the mortgagee for his concurrence or approbation. The circumstance of the mortgage, the position of the mortgagor, and the examination of the contract, all these things would, of necessity, cause infinite difficulty, delay, expense, and inconvenience in the transaction of ordinary mercantile business. I could not possibly attribute to the Legislature in passing this statute anything like an intention to introduce a different course of dealing from that which hitherto had always been adopted. But the true history of this enactment no doubt is, that which was adverted to by Mr. Osler and by Mr. Robinson. Antecedently, by reason of the earlier statutes, the mortgagee, the moment a mortgage was made and registered, became, in the eye of the law, the owner of the property, and the result was that the law was in the habit of regarding the mortgagor as standing in the capacity of quasi agent to the mortgagee, and the mortgagee frequently found himself bound either by the contracts of the mortgagor, or, at all events, by the necessary expenditure and outgoings of the vessel. That was a very serious injury and inconvenience to mortgagees, and it interposed considerable difficulty in the way of mortgagors getting money upon this species of security. Then the Legislature interposed by declaring a general principle. That principle, in its declaration, exactly fitted the ratio decidendi in the cases that had produced the inconvenience. The principle that was declared in opposition to the reasons of those cases was, that the mortgagor should be deemed and regarded as the owner of the vessel. First, there is a negative declaration that the mortgagee shall not, by reason of his mortgage, be deemed to be the owner. Then there is an affirmative that the mortgagor shall not be deemed to have ceased to be the owner; he shall continue to be the owner. The mortgagor, therefore, continues the owner; but it was necessary, of course, or at least in the prudent, cautious way in which Acts of Parliament are framed it was deemed necessary by the framer of the clause, to add these words in declaring in what position the mortgagor shall stand, namely, that he shall be the owner, save so far as may be necessary for making the ship or share available as a security for the mortgage-debt. As long, therefore, as the dealings of the mortgagor with the ship are consistent with the sufficiency of the mortgagee's security, so long as those dealings do not materially prejudice and detract from or impair the sufficiency of the security of the vessel as comprised in the mortgage, so long is there parliamentary authority given to the mortgagor to act in all respects as owner of the vessel; and if he has authority to act as owner, he has of necessity authority to enter into all those contracts touching the disposition of the ship which may be necessary for enabling him to get the full value and the full benefit of his property. Whenever a mortgagee is in a position to show that the act of the mortgagor prejudices or injures his security, then, I apprehend, the parliamentary declaration that the mortgagor shall be deemed the owner ceases to have any binding effect as against the mortgagee, and the mortgagee is in a position to claim and exercise the full benefit of the rights given to him by his mortgage. But, subject to that qualification, every contract entered into by the mortgagor remaining in possession is a contract which derives validity from the declaration of his continuing to be the owner. At the same time, it is a contract into the benefit of which the mortgagee may at any time enter, by giving notice to the party who is to pay the mortgagor under that contract that he requires the payment to be made to him, the mortgagee. I think that would be a reasonable interpretation, which would make the law with regard to this description of property in a great measure analogous to the law as it exists with regard to mortgages of real estate. But, as I am told this point is somewhat a novel one, and at present is not touched by any decision, I should not like to give any absolute and final opinion upon that point without further examination. If that is the view that I shall adhere to of the true interpretation of the statute, then it will be sufficient to say in this case, that nothing has been done, attempted to be alleged, or proved by the mortgagees, whereby this charter-party, if permitted to be carried into execution, is a charter-party that will at all prejudicially affect the sufficiency of their security. Therefore, if I adhere to that view of the statute, I should by no means allow the mortgagees to interfere with the execution of this charter-party, and I should grant an injunction in these terms: namely, to restrain the debts, the mortgagees, and the purchaser their assignee, from dealing with the ship in any way inconsistent with, or which may interfere with, or prevent the execution of the charter-party, and there let the order stop. I will consider the point and look at the different cases to which the counsel, to whom I am much obliged, have referred me, and I will mention it again in a day or two; but if I see no reason to change my opinion as to the construction of the statute, if I do not come to the conclusion that the mortgagee has a right to step in and arrest and stop all that has been done, then it will be considered that I am of opinion that this is a good charter-party made by the authority and by virtue of the ownership of Roberts; and that it is a charter-party, therefore, binding on Roberts and those claiming under him, binding the mortgagees, and binding the purchaser pendente lite, inasmuch as it is a charter-party that has not been shown to me in any way whatever to be prejudicial to the sufficiency of the security.

Dec. 9.—THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—I have again considered this case in regard to the relative positions of the mortgagor and mortgagee, and I see no reason to alter my opinion. Under the statute, so long as the mortgagee of the ship does not take possession, the mortgagor, as the registered owner of the ship, retains all the rights and privileges of ownership, and all contracts made by him are valid so long as

Dec. 20 and Jan. 11.

STRAKER v. EWING.

Injunction—Bill of Lading—Costs.

The plts. sold and shipped goods for the deflt. E., to be paid for on delivery. The goods were delivered, but were not paid for. The bill of lading of the goods was made out in the name of F. and Co., the shippers, as agents, without saying for whom. E. was in fact acting as agent in this transaction for the deflt. N., to whom he was indebted. The plts. filed a bill against E., F. and Co., and N., alleging, but failing to prove, that E. was insolvent; charging, but not proving, that N. had fraudulently adopted the mode of obtaining the goods in question, and praying that F. and Co. might be restrained from parting with the bills of lading, and that the defts., or some of them, might be ordered to pay for the goods and the costs of the suit. By arrangement between the parties an interim injunction which had been granted until the hearing had been dissolved:

Held, that the bill must be dismissed with costs:

Held, also, that the rule that the costs of a suit follow the event means, not the result of any act of the parties to the suit, but the decision of the court in it.

This was an injunction suit, of which the facts were very shortly these:—

The plts. were coal merchants and coke manufacturers. They entered into a contract with the deflt. Ewing for the supply of a cargo of coke to be sent to the East India, and to be paid for on delivery on board ship. The coke was duly shipped and delivered, but it was not paid for on delivery. The bill of lading was made out in the name of Messrs. Fraser, Bond and Co. as shippers, and was stated to be delivered to them "as agents," but it was not stated for whom they were agents. The deflt. Ewing was in fact acting as agent for the deflt. Nasmyth, to whom he was indebted, and whose solicitors forthwith gave notice to Fraser, Bond and Co. to deliver up to him the bill of lading, on payment of any balance due on account between Ewing and him. The plts. agents in Liverpool then gave notice to them not to deliver the bill of lading to any one but the plts. The plts. then filed the bill in this suit against Ewing, Nasmyth, and Fraser, Bond and Co., alleging that Ewing had become insolvent, and charging that Nasmyth had adopted the aforesaid mode of obtaining the coke, in order that a debt previously due from Ewing to him might so be satisfied, while the plts. were to be left to recover from him so much of the price as they could. The bill prayed that Fraser, Bond and Co. might be restrained from parting with the bill of lading, and that the defts. or some of them might be decreed either to pay the price of the coke or deliver it up to the plts. Some time since an injunction had been obtained, but by a compromise or an agreement between the parties it was dissolved, upon payment into court of the price of the coke, with interest at 5 per cent. from the day of delivery.

The main question now to be decided was as to the costs of the suit.

Argued, Q. C. and F. E. Key appeared for the plts.

Disputedly, Q. C. and Lindley for the deflt. Ewing.

Stevens for the deflt. Nasmyth.

New Brunswick and Canada Railway and Land Company v. Hughes, 9 H. of L. Cas. 711; 6 L. T. Rep. N. S. 109.

Jan. 11.—The Master of the ROLLS.—Although the main object of this suit was obtained by an interlocutory injunction, which was afterwards dissolved by an arrangement between the parties, I am bound to consider the suit as if it were now the hearing of the cause. The plts. maintained that, as the result of the suit had been virtually in their favour, they were entitled to their costs under the ordinary rule that the costs should follow the event. The defts. contended that, if this were to be treated as the hearing of the cause, the bill ought to be dismissed with costs, and that the injunction which was obtained was an abuse of the process of the court. There seems to me to be no evidence to show that Fraser, Bond and Co. held the bill of lading as agents for the plts. The proper course for the parties to have pursued was this: the plts. being the sellers, and Ewing the buyer, Fraser, Bond and Co. ought to have indorsed the bill of lading to him, on receiving from him an indemnity against the consequences of so doing. The plts. ought to have applied to Ewing for payment, and if he had refused, to have brought an action against him. Instead of that, without demanding payment from Ewing at all, they filed the present bill. I regard this case simply as one of goods sold and delivered, and I think that if the court interfered in such cases it would cause very great litigation. When the coke was delivered, all the plts. property in it, and all their lien for the price, were gone. The delivery was, as they stated in their bill, complete; and, accordingly, no question could remain as to their right of stoppage in transitu. If a seller is not paid for his goods, his only remedy is by action at law. He cannot seize the goods in the hands of the purchaser, or of any one else; and precisely the same rights attach to a bill of lading as to goods sold and delivered. The plts. might have refused to deliver the coke until they were paid; but, having delivered it, they had no remedy except by an action at law. They, however, filed the bill in this suit without even asking Ewing for payment, relying on the representation of Fraser, Bond and Co. that he was unable to pay. They alleged by the bill that he was insolvent, and charged that he had obtained the coke by a fraudulent contrivance. There is not a tittle of evidence of his insolvency. They only say they think he might have been insolvent, because he left Liverpool. The charge of insolvency against a trader is a serious one. The other is a still graver one, and it is not only not proved, but entirely disproved, both by the oaths of the defts. and by the whole character and all the details of the transaction. The court always has seriously visited, and always will seriously visit, a charge of fraud when it is made but not proved. If the rule is to be applied in a more stringent way in one case than in another, it is when the interposition of the court is rested on the alleged fraud. Even if this case had been one of stoppage in transitu, the remedy would have been at law, and this court could not have interfered, unless there had been some unusual circumstances in the case. Hence the charge of fraud became necessary to sustain the bill. Treating this, then, as the hearing of the cause, and as if the plts. had not been paid, the case fails in every respect. The bill must be dismissed. The plts., however, argued that the general rule of the court was to make the costs follow the event, and that, as the event of the suit had turned virtually in their favour, they ought to have the benefit of that rule. But, in my opinion there is an obvious fallacy in their reasoning. The "event" intended by the rule is an event produced by the decision of the court, and not one resulting from the acts of the parties. I have been treating this as if there had not been any compromise or agreement between the parties. But if there had been, in fact, no such compromise or agreement, the bill in this suit must have been dismissed. The rule which the plts. claim to have applied in their favour is, in reality, adverse to them, and I must decide accordingly.

MOROCCO LAND AND TRADING COMPANY v. FRY.

THE MOROCCO LAND AND TRADING COMPANY (LIMITED) v. FRY.

Specific performance—Underwriters' "slip"—Agreement to execute—Policy of marine insurance—Suppression of facts—Unstamped agreement.

The plts. (who were owners of a ship's cargo) alleged that by the custom of underwriters, before a policy of marine insurance was effected, a paper called a "slip" was offered by way of memorandum to the underwriters, and subscriptions were taken upon it; and that such slip, and the proposals on which it was founded, were regarded and usually acted upon by both parties as a valid contract. Plts. having by their agent offered such a slip to the deft. and other underwriters, and obtained their signatures thereto, filed a bill for specific performance of the alleged agreement to grant a policy.

The "slip" or agreement was not stamped, and the plts., though alleging that it could not be proceeded on at law on that account, refused to stamp it, but claimed the relief of the court on the unstamped instrument.

It appearing in evidence that the agent of the plts., in dealing with the deft.'s broker, had suppressed a material fact, namely, that the ship was about to be navigated, not, as they supposed, by the master, but by the mate:

Held, that this suppression of fact was a sufficient ground to induce the court to withhold its discretionary power of decreeing specific performance.

A fortiori, when the agreement sought to be enforced was an instrument which was not in itself a contract that could be sued upon at law, but merely an agreement to execute such a contract as could be proceeded upon at law.

This bill was filed for the specific performance of an alleged contract by the deft., John Gurney Fry, to execute a valid policy of insurance, duly stamped, of a ship's cargo belonging to the plts., the Morocco Land Trading Company (Limited), according to the terms contained on a paper writing called "a slip."

The plts. were a limited company registered under the Act of 1862, and in Oct. 1863, with the intention of sending a cargo of merchandise to Morocco, they chartered a vessel called the Arthur Leary, of which one Captain Augustus Collingridge was master, to carry the cargo to Gibraltar, calling on the way at Lisbon, and they appointed Captain Collingridge as their trading agent to manage the adventure. The cargo, consisting of machinery, hardware, casks and other articles, the value of which was estimated at about 2300*l.*, was duly shipped through the Custom-house at London, on board the said vessel, by Mr. Thomas Sharer, a shipbroker. As soon as it was all on board and the vessel ready to proceed on her voyage, Captain Collingridge, as the plts.' agent, saw Mr. H. Skinner, of the firm of Skinner and Co., London, insurance-brokers, for the purpose of insuring the cargo. It was, however, considered more regular that the insurance should be effected through Mr. Thomas Sharer, who had shipped the cargo for the plts., and accordingly Captain Collingridge instructed Mr. Sharer to effect an insurance on the cargo, on behalf of the plts., for 2262*l.* In pursuance of such instructions Mr. Sharer wrote to Messrs. H. Skinner and Co. a letter to the following effect:

London, Oct. 31, 1863.

Messrs. H. Skinner.

Dear Sirs,—Please insure against total loss only, for my account, cash next settlement day, cargo per Arthur Leary as under: London, Gibraltar, leave to call at Lisbon; ship safe at Gravesend and going uninsured. (Then followed items amounting in the whole to 2262*l.*)

(Signed)

THOMAS SHARER.

On receiving this letter, Messrs. Skinner proceeded to effect an insurance on the cargo with underwriters in the usual manner, and informed Mr. Sharer that, on Monday the 2nd Nov., they had arranged with certain underwriters for the same to the extent of 1700*l.* Mr. Sharer, however, on the 31st Oct. had already sent a telegram to Capt. Collingridge to the effect that the insurance was proceeding. On the 1st Nov. the vessel sailed down the Thames, anchored at the Nore on the 2nd Nov., and proceeded on her voyage on the 3rd.

On the 2nd Nov. a paper in writing called "a slip" was delivered to Messrs. Skinner on behalf of the plts. It was as follows:

The signature "Fry and R." signified that the deft. John Gurney Fry and another person named Rigge had accepted insurance for 100*l.* each.

On the 3rd Nov. the vessel arrived in the Downs, and Capt. Collingridge there received notice that the "slip" had been received from the underwriters, and, relying on such "slip" as forming a valid contract by the deft. and the other underwriters to insure the plts.' cargo, he left the vessel (but, as the plts. alleged, without their knowledge) in the temporary charge of his mate, intending to rejoin it on its arrival at Lisbon. On the 6th Nov. the vessel proceeded on her voyage, under the command of the mate, who was duly authorised by certificate to act as master. On the 7th Nov. Capt. Collingridge, on behalf of the plts., tendered to Messrs. Skinner and Co., on behalf of the deft. and the other underwriters, the premiums on the insurance, and demanded the policy; but Skinner and Co. refused to take the premiums, or to give any assurance that the policy would be granted, and requested that the matter might stand over until the 9th Nov. Capt. Collingridge, as alleged, did not consent to such proposal; but, as he could not alter the determination of Messrs. Skinner and Co., he went to Mr. Sharer and instructed him to tender the amount of the premiums on behalf of the plts., and demand the policy on their behalf. This was accordingly done, but with the same result. On the night of the 7th Nov. 1863 the vessel was wrecked (as the plts. alleged, in a gale of wind) in the Channel, and the cargo and ship were totally lost.

The plts. immediately informed the deft. and the other underwriters of the loss, and, through Skinner and Co., requested them to execute a valid policy of insurance, duly stamped, according to the terms of the slip, again offering to pay the premiums; but the deft. and the other underwriters refused to comply with such request. Subsequently the plts. tendered a stamped policy of insurance and the premium according to the terms contained in the slip; but the deft. refused to accept or execute the same.

The case of the deft. (the underwriter whose name happened to stand first on the slip, and who represented the rest) was, that the slip was void as evidence of a binding contract against him under the provisions of the Stamp Act of the 35 Geo. 3, c. 68. He further denied all knowledge that the alleged assurance was on account of the plts. He further said that his agent had appended his (deft.'s) initials to the slip on the faith of Capt. Collingridge having the charge of the vessel on her voyage out; instead of which, Capt. Collingridge, without acquainting the deft.'s broker of the fact, left the vessel in the Downs, and allowed her to proceed on her voyage under the care of the mate.

There was a further case of an improper attempt on the part of Capt. Collingridge to send the ship to sea without being properly manned, and that he went from Gravesend to the Downs for the purpose only of evading the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, and enabling him, if necessary, to contend, in fraud of the underwriters, that no objection could be raised to the validity of the insurance on the ground of illegality or unseaworthiness arising from non-compliance with the Act.

Deft. further denied that the ship was lost in a gale of wind, but said she was lost in consequence of her deviating from her course from the incompetency of those on board to navigate her; and in support of this, a report, made in answer to an inquiry specially directed by the Board of Trade as to the loss of the ship, was referred to. Deft. also denied that the cargo was totally lost.

On these grounds he denied that there was a contract, either binding at law or enforceable in equity; and that the loss of the ship arose from the misconduct of the master, against which he never intended to insure.

The plt.'s evidence was directed to the establishment of the fact that, by the custom of trade in the business of marine insurance, before a policy is effected, a slip of paper by way of memorandum of the proposal of insurance is offered to the underwriters in the form set forth above, and that subscriptions are then taken upon it until the requisite number is obtained, and such slip and the proposals on which it is founded are regarded by both parties as a valid and binding contract in writing. The parties underwriting on a ship would consequently within a few days afterwards have to give to the insured a valid stamped policy of insurance, according to the terms mentioned on the slip; and it was not an uncommon practice among shipowners and merchants to allow their ships and goods to go to sea on the faith of such slips, and before the policies were made out and delivered. If the vessels were lost before the execution of the policies, the underwriters who were parties to the slip were universally regarded as bound to execute a policy. It was also said that the custom at Lloyd's, on its being known there that a ship which had been insured by a slip had arrived safely at her port of destination before a stamped policy was actually issued, frequently was for the underwriters to claim and receive from the brokers without issuing the policy at all.

Malins, Q. C. and Bury, for the plts.—The effect of the "slip" was that it was really an agreement to execute a valid policy at the usual time, viz. the next settling day. Had the slip been stamped, it would have enabled the plts. to have sued on it at law; and they now asked that this defect might be remedied, and that it might be stamped as an agreement to grant a valid policy. It was the custom and understanding among brokers to consider such a document as a contract to deliver a policy. Difficulties might arise when they had obtained the policy, but at present the plts. were debarred by the Stamp Act, 35 Geo. 3, c. 68, s. 14, from taking legal measures. Several of the common law judges in similar cases, had referred to the court of equity as the proper tribunal to afford that relief which they now asked. They cited

The VICE-CHANCELLOR.—In this case the jurisdiction of the court is invoked by the plts. on the principle of specific performance. Now if there be one rule of this court more settled than another it is this, that in exercising its discretionary jurisdiction in decreeing specific performance, the court always has regard to the conduct of the parties concerned. The plts., on the ground that this slip is not a valid contract at law, ask that it may be treated as such in equity, and that this court shall interfere and compel the deft. to execute such an instrument as will enable the plts. to sue at law. This is a most extraordinary claim. No authority has been cited for the proposition that the court will compel a deft. to execute an instrument comprising numerous provisions, and which if and when executed would form a contract. It has been said that a lease is an instrument of this description, and that the court would compel a person to execute an agreement for a lease containing covenants of which the parties were to have the benefit at law. But an agreement for a lease is an instrument of an entirely different kind to that under discussion. The purpose of a lease is to make the property of the lessor the property of the lessee on certain defined terms. There are always a number of subsidiary covenants, to be entered into upon the occasion of a lease, and the court, instead of settling all the minute points that may arise, directs the execution of the lease. What analogy can there be between a case where there is the foundation of the right to a valid contract, and a case like the present, where there is no contract, but the court is asked to make one? In this case the agent of the plts., who was also master of the ship, applied to the defts. for the purpose of taking the preliminary steps to effect the intended insurance. On the 2nd Nov. the master of the vessel having made an arrangement by which the care of the ship was to be handed over to the mate, suppressed this fact from the broker who acted on his behalf in procuring the execution of the slip. Now, the suppression of a fact which might have affected the conduct of the parties to an alleged contract, is always considered by this court as a ground for withholding its aid to a decree for the specific performance of a contract, and, a fortiori, for refusing that aid where the instrument in question is not an agreement which could be sued upon at law. The principle involved in this case is of so much importance, that I cannot too carefully follow the established authorities on the subject. The plts. have come into this court seeking specific performance, and on this subject Lord Redesdale, in delivering judgment in Hurnett v. Yeilding, 2 Sch. & Lef. 554, said: "These cases show what were the grounds on which courts of equity first interfered, but they have continually held that the party who comes into equity for specific performance must come with perfect propriety of conduct; otherwise they will leave him to his remedy at law." And again in the same page: "There is also another ground on which courts of equity refuse to enforce specific execution of agreements; that is, when from the circumstances it is doubtful whether the party meant to contract to the extent that he is sought to be charged." Now, applying the principle here laid down to the present case, I do not think that the court can say that if the deft.'s agent had been told that the mate of the Arthur Leary was to have charge of the vessel, his conduct would not have been different. I should have been content to have left the decision of the case on these grounds alone; but there are other objections, one of which I cannot help mentioning. It has been argued for the plts. that the slip, though to a certain extent an imperfect instrument, was one well recognised and acted on by insurance brokers; and that it only wanted a stamp to make it effectual; that being, as it was said, the only objection to it. The court was asked not to order it to be stamped (for that might be done by either party without the aid of the court); but to make the deft. execute a contract in order to enable the plts. to sue at law upon that contract. It was further said that proceedings at law could not be taken upon the slip because it was not stamped, and this court was asked to give the plts. an opportunity of bringing the question before a court of law. For this purpose the authority of Xenos v. Wickham, 14 C. B., N. S., 452, was read, which stated that the only objection to the validity of the slip at law was its want of a stamp. If this is the case it is quite in the power of plts., on paying the penalty, to have the slip stamped; and the doctrines, both of the courts of law and equity, are precisely similar on this point. Upon the whole case I consider that the plts. have failed to establish any grounds for equitable relief, and I must, therefore, dismiss their bill with costs.

STRAKER v. HARTLAND.

Merchant shipping—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 514—25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 54—Collision—Limit of liability—Interest on damages—Time at which damages due.

It is the settled practice of the Court of Admiralty to allow interest upon damages recovered in respect of a collision at sea, in the case of a vessel in ballast, from the date of the collision.

The same rule will be followed by this court in suits instituted under the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 514.

A vessel proceeding homewards in ballast was run down by a steamer. The owners of the latter filed their bill, asking the protection of the court under the provisions of the above-mentioned Act:

Held, that they ought to pay into court, not only the amount of damages for which they had been held liable by a judgment of the Admiralty Court, but also interest at 4 per cent. from the date of the collision.

Motion for decree.

The bill in this suit was filed by the owners of the steamship Joseph Straker, on the 26th Oct. 1864, under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, sect. 514 of which empowers the owners of ships, in any case where liability has been incurred by them in respect of losses or damages at sea, and several claims are made or apprehended in respect of such liability, to take proceedings in the Court of Ch., or other competent court, for the purpose of determining the amount of liability, of distributing such amount rateably among the claimants, and of putting a stop to all other actions or suits in relation to the same subject-matter.

On the 26th Sept. 1863 a collision took place between the Joseph Straker and the deft.'s barque Karla, sailing in ballast from Antwerp to Cardiff.

By a decree of the Court of Admiralty of the 23rd Dec. 1863, confirmed by the judgment of the Privy Council of the 11th July 1864, the present plts. were held to be liable for the amount of damage thus occasioned. By the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 54, it is provided that when any loss is caused by reason of improper navigation of a ship without the actual fault or privity of its owners, they shall be answerable in respect of such loss to ships or goods to an aggregate amount not exceeding 8*l.* per ton of their ship's tonnage, calculated in the case of steamships on the gross tonnage without deduction on account of engine-room. So calculated, the amount for which the owners of the Joseph Straker were liable was 5711*l.*; the ship was arrested by virtue of the proceedings in the Admiralty Court, and the plts., to release it, gave bail to this amount; they now, therefore, desired to pay that sum, together with the costs of the proceedings in the Admiralty Court, into court, alleging that other persons unknown to them claimed to share in the amount of damages for goods on board the Karla, and that they were threatened with actions on this account, which the Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to restrain, nor to apportion the damages amongst the parties claiming.

The question to be discussed however was, whether the defts. were entitled to any interest on the sum of 5711*l.*, and if so, from what date.

Rolt, Q. C. and Druce for the plts.—By the Act of 1854, in the case of a claim in respect of loss of goods only, the limit of liability has been fixed by decision of this court; it is not to exceed the value of the ship: (Nixon v. Roberts, 1 J. & H. 739; 4 L. T. Rep. N. S. 679.) By the Amendment Act 1862, this limit is altered, in like cases, to the amount of 8*l.* per ton. In cases decided under the former Act, the value of the ship, as fixing the liability of the owners, was held to be ascertained at the date of the collision:

African Steam Ship Company v. Swanzy, 2 K. & J. 660;

Leycester v. Logan, 4 K. & J. 725.

There is nothing in the later Act to alter this rule, therefore the amount of 8*l.* per ton is the "aggregate amount to be paid in respect of loss of goods," irrespectively of the time of payment. Admitting that some question might arise if there had been unnecessary delay in filing the bill, until that was done the amount could not be paid in, and the Act looks to that time to fix the limit of liability. They also cited Re Hadfield's Patent Cask and Package Company, 9 Jur. N. S. 997; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 917, as supporting their view of the case.

Sir H. Cairns, Q.C. and Dickinson for the defts.—The claim of interest is quite apart from the question of damages. We admit that the latter is fixed by the Act; as to the former the point is, what are the terms on which a party is to have the benefit of the protection of this court? The Act 53 Geo. 3, c. 159, first introduced the principle of limiting the liability of owners to the value of the ship by means of which the loss was occasioned, and under this and the later Act the point which generally arose was, when should that value be ascertained? The court will not look with the same eye upon parties who come at once for indemnity, and those who delay the payment of a debt for purposes of their own security. As the Karla was in ballast, interest ought to run from the date of the collision: (The Dundee, 2 Hagg. 137.) When a vessel was earning freight interest was allowed from the date at which the voyage, but for the collision, would probably have terminated:

The Amalia, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 826.

Rolt, Q.C. in reply.—Our liability was not ascertained until after the decision of the Court of Admiralty. After that there was no delay in coming to this court. The Court of Chancery is not bound by the decision of the Court of Admiralty.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR said:—It is quite clear on which side justice lies. Here is a debt due on which, if it be not paid, interest would be allowed in the shape of damages; the difficulty, no doubt, is in fixing parties with interest where there is no express contract to pay it. The Court of Admiralty says very truly, that interest is not given by way of indemnification for a loss, but because the loss was not paid for at the proper time. Under the old law the debt accrued at the date of the collision, and was then limited only by the value of the ship and freight; under that law the practice of the Court of Admiralty was to consider that interest ran upon the estimated value, taken at the time when the vessel would probably have arrived at its destination (because up to that time freight was calculated to make up for interest) down to the time of payment. Then the Legislature introduced the limitation of liability (and this I consider to include both ship and freight) to 8/ per ton; but the question still remains, on what day does the liability begin? Surely, if the debt is not paid on that day, then interest begins to run. There is a further difficulty, that this is a question of tort and not of contract, and it is hard to see how to give interest for a tort; but if you find that interest has for a long series of years been allowed by a given court—and this appears to be the result of the researches made by the Court of Admiralty in the case of the Amalia—then this becomes a settled rule of law, and will be followed by this court. I must also follow the rule laid down by the Court of Admiralty, in considering the next question, namely, when did the money become due? This I take to be at the date of the collision, and therefore, in accordance with that rule, I must order the payment of interest on the amount of damage from that date at the rate of 4 per cent.

CARR AND ANOTHER v. ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE CORPORATION.

SAME v. MONTEFIORE.

Practice—Entering up judgment—Money paid into court —Deducting from amount awarded.

In an action on a sea policy, the plt. declared for a loss by perils of the sea, and also for the return of the premiums. The defts. paid the premiums into court, which plt. took out; but the defts. failed in showing that the plt. was not entitled to recover on the policy. Afterwards the amount of the loss was adjusted, and the judgment of the court having by agreement been entered for a lump sum to enable the parties to take the opinion of the Ex. Ch., as to the right of the plt. to recover, it was Held, that the plt. was only entitled to sign judgment for such an amount as, added to the sum paid into court, would make up the amount adjusted.

Rules nisi calling on the plts. to show cause why the judgment rolls should not be amended by reducing the amount for which the judgment was entered to the sum found by the arbitrator minus the amount paid into court.

These were actions upon a policy of marine insurance underwritten by the defts. The declarations contained a count for loss by perils of the sea, and also the common counts for the return of the premiums paid.

To the counts for the loss the defts. pleaded that the vessel insured was unseaworthy at the time. And in respect of the other counts the defts. paid into court the amount of the premiums paid, which the plt. took out of court in satisfaction of the demand in those counts.

At the trial, the defence of unseaworthiness was abandoned, and also the claim for a total loss by the plts., and a case was afterwards stated for the opinion of this court as to whether the plts. were entitled to recover for average loss, and it was agreed that the amount of damages should be settled by an arbitrator.

This Court gave judgment in favour of the plts., and to enable the parties to take the opinion of a court of error, it was agreed that the judgment should be entered up for the plts. for 4000/., for which amount the judgment was signed. The arbitrator found the amount of the loss was 2082/., which, being reduced by the amount paid into court, left a balance of 1775/ 10s.

Milward showed cause.—The plts. had a right to shape their case in two ways: either to treat the policy as a valid one and sue upon it for the loss sustained; and in case the policy should be held void in its inception, to sue for a return of the premiums paid. So also the defts. had a right to elect, and having elected to return the premiums which they paid into court, they have no right to ask now, because they have beaten on the other ground, to have the amount of loss reduced by their amount, and to have them treated as part payment. This was money recovered by a legal proceeding, and it cannot be recovered back again by the other side:

Marriot v. Hampton, 2 Sm. L. C. 325.

Watkin Williams and Arthur Cohen in support of the rules.—The plt. is not entitled to recover both upon the policy and for the return of the premiums. No doubt the common way of declaring for a long time has been as in the present case, but it has never been attempted by insurers to retain the money paid into court, as well as the whole amount of the loss. In cases at Nisi Prius, juries no doubt have taken into consideration the money so paid into court, and allowed it in the amount of damages they have awarded. Insurance is a contract of indemnity, and all that the insurer is entitled to is to be indemnified against the loss. And as the judgment must be amended, this court is asked not to allow it to be so amended as to enable the plts. to recover more than they are entitled to under their contract:

Cur. adv. vult.

CHROMFORD, J.—In these cases, the plts. having declared on policies of insurances with counts for money had and received, the defts. paid the amount of the premiums into court on the latter counts, pleading to the count on the policies, so as to raise amongst other defences that of unseaworthiness. The plts. took the money out of court in satisfaction of the claim under the counts for money had and received. At the trial, the defence of unseaworthiness having failed, or having been abandoned, a special case was stated for the opinion of the court, which was afterwards taken into the Ex. Ch., and in both courts it was held that the plts. were entitled to recover as for an average loss. The amount of the average loss was referred to and ascertained by an arbitrator; but this not being done before the argument of the case, a nominal judgment for 4000*l.* was entered up, for the purpose of taking the case into error. The plts. now seek to enter up judgment and take out execution for the entire amount of the average loss, without giving credit to the defts. for the amount paid into court and taken out by the plts. The defts. obtained rules nisi in effect to restrain the plt. from taking judgment and execution for the entire amount of the loss, without giving credit for the sums paid in respect of the premiums. It is obvious that nothing could be more unjust than that the plts. should recover back the premiums, which they could only be entitled to on the ground that the risk under the policy did not attach, and also the whole amount of the loss, to which they could only be entitled if the risk did attach. It is plain that what the plts. were entitled to, in the event which happened, was the loss after deducting the premiums. It was said, however, on the part of the plts., that the state of the pleadings allowed them to perpetrate this injustice, and that the money which had been paid into court and taken out in satisfaction could not in any way be treated as reducing the amount to which the plts. were entitled in respect of their average loss. On the other hand, it was contended that the deduction in question was one which a jury ought on the trial to take into account in the reduction of the damages. It was said that the jury, having ascertained the amount of the loss, have to inquire what is the damage to which the plts. were entitled; and that there are many cases in which circumstances occurring after the primum facis damage has occurred, are allowed to reduce the damages. Thus, part payment after action has always been held to reduce damages. So, in trover, the return of goods goes in reduction of damages. In the case of an executor de son tort, who has interfered with the estate, and so converted it, if he has paid debts he is "recouped," as it is called, in damages. It is unnecessary to decide this question in the present case. We think that the court has the power of preventing the plts. from proceeding to carry out, by its process, such a piece of injustice as here contemplated. And in Gould v. Oliver, 3 M. & G. 235, where money was paid into court on a count inconsistent with that on which the plt. recovered, it was insisted that by taking the money out of court the plt. had estopped himself from recovering on the inconsistent count. The Court held that such an estoppel ought not to prevail, and that each count must be dealt with independently of the rest of the record, but Tindal, C. J. remarked "that the plts. would not be permitted to retain the whole amount of the loss under the first count, and the amount of the general average under the second." This remark, though said not to be necessary to the part of the matter decided, was strictly pertinent to the matter under the consideration of the court, being an answer to an objection that might have arisen—that if there was not an estoppel, the plt., having got the money, could not be made to part with what he had taken out of court, and that so the plt. could recover it twice over. "No," says the Chief Justice, "the court would not allow him to retain it and take the whole loss besides." Now, here the plts. would get besides their indemnity from loss on the policy, the amount of the premiums; in other words, they would get back the price they have paid, and the thing bargained for as well. We think they cannot be permitted to retain both. The expression of the Chief Justice seems to point to the power inherent in these courts, by stay of proceedings or otherwise, to prevent the abuse of their process. For these reasons we are of opinion that the defts. are entitled to the relief which they pray for, and that the rule should be made absolute, to prevent the plt. from signing judgment or issuing execution for any larger amount in respect of damages than the balance of the average loss ascertained by the average stater, after deducting the amount of the premiums paid into court.

Rule absolute.

WILSON v. RAWKIN.

Marine insurance—Deck loading—16 & 17 Vict. c. 107—Cargo.

A policy upon freight is not rendered void by the master, without any authority from the owner and without his knowledge, having loaded part of the cargo on deck contrary to the Customs Consolidation Act 1858 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107), ss. 170 et seq.

A master loaded on deck spars and other articles for the use of the owner, but more than were required for the ship's use on the voyage:

Held, that the excess was cargo within the meaning of the Customs Consolidation Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107), ss. 170, 171.

Declaration on a marine policy of insurance at and from Restigouch to Liverpool, upon goods and merchandise, and also upon the ship, beginning the adventure upon the said goods and merchandise from the loading thereof, and including risks of craft until the said ship arrived at as above (valued at 1400*l.*) Averment that goods of great value were shipped on board at Restigouch aforesaid, to be carried as cargo on the voyage in the policy described, for certain freight therefore payable to the plt., and afterwards the said ship, with the said cargo on board thereof, sailed, &c., and was wholly lost, &c.

Fourth plea:

That the said policy was made, and the cargo, the freight in respect of which was insured as in the declaration alleged was shipped on board the said ship after the coming into operation of the Customs Consolidation Act 1858 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107), and consisted of timber and wood goods, and that Restigouch was said to be a British port in North America, and that the said ship with the said cargo sailed from Restigouch, and that the whole of the said cargo was not below deck, but on the contrary, the master of the said ship placed and permitted, and caused to be placed and remain, and be upon and above the deck of the said ship, part of the said cargo, contrary to the statute in that behalf, and that the master of the said ship had not obtained from the clearing officer any certificate that the whole of the cargo of the said ship was below deck, and that at the time of the said ship so sailing, and until and at the time of the alleged loss, the plt. was the owner of the said ship, and the said freight so insured as aforesaid was payable to him as such owner in respect of the said cargo.

The fifth plea was the same except that it alleged that at the time of the making of the policy it was known by the plt. that a considerable part of the cargo was then loaded, and was intended to be loaded, upon and above the deck of the said ship, and that it was intended by the plt. that the said ship should sail on the voyage with part of the cargo stowed and loaded above and upon the deck of the said ship as aforesaid.

Demurrers to fourth and fifth pleas.

There were also issues in fact raised which came on for trial before Shee, J. at Liverpool.

It was proved at the trial that the whole of the cargo on freight was loaded below deck, but that the master loaded above deck a quantity of spars and other articles for the use of the owner. These spars were more than were required for the ship's use on the voyage, but did not render the ship unseaworthy, and the owner was not, at the time of making the policy, aware of the spars being so loaded, and had given the master no instructions in this matter. The learned judge ruled that the spars, &c., were cargo within the meaning of the Customs Consolidation Act 1853, and directed a verdict to be entered for the deft. on both pleas, giving the plt. leave to move to enter a verdict for him.

A rule nisi was obtained accordingly, and it now came on for argument with the demurrers by order of the Court.

The following are the sections of the Customs Consolidation Act (16 & 17 Vict. c. 107) referred to in the argument.

Sect. 170 :

Before any clearing officer permits any ship wholly or in part laden with timber or wood goods to clear out from any British port in North America, or in the settlement of Honduras, for any port in the United Kingdom, at any time after the 1st Sept. or before the 1st May in any year, he shall ascertain that the whole of the cargo of such ship is below deck, and shall give the master of such ship a certificate to that effect; and no master of any ship so laden shall sail from any of the ports aforesaid for any port of the United Kingdom at any such time as aforesaid, until he has obtained such certificate from the clearing officer.

Sect. 171 :

No master of any ship, in respect of which such certificate as aforesaid has been obtained, shall place or permit, or cause to be placed or remain upon or above the deck of such ship, any part of the cargo thereof, until such ship has arrived at the port of her destination. Provided also that the store spars or other articles necessary for the ship's use shall not be taken to be cargo for the purposes of this Act.

Sect. 172 :

If any master of any ship for which such certificate as aforesaid is required, sails or attempts to sail without having obtained such certificate, or places or permits, or causes to be placed or remain, or be upon or above the deck of such ship, any part of the cargo thereof, except in the cases in which the same is not forbidden, he shall for every such offence forfeit and pay any sum not exceeding 100*l*.

Nov. 8.—Mellish, Q.C. (E. James, Q.C. and Cohen with him) for the deft.—The plt. is not entitled to recover. The master was the agent of the owner, and his knowledge was that of the owner. The case is like that of Cunard v. Hyde, 2 E. & E. 1, where the plt. having actual knowledge that part of the cargo was loaded on deck was held not entitled to recover. In Cunard v. Hyde, E. B. & E. 670, that did not appear. Secondly, the statute having been passed to prohibit deck loading and to protect life and property, there is an implied warranty on the part of the owner, when effecting a policy, that the statute has been complied with. Non-compliance with the directions of the statute in this respect amounts to a statutory unseaworthiness :

Law v. Hollingworth, 7 T. R. 160 ;

Bird v. Appleton, 8 T. R. 562 ;

Farmer v. Legg, 7 T. R. 186 ;

Bell v. Carstairs, 14 East, 374.

Brett, Q. C. (Milward with him).—There is no plea of unseaworthiness, and in point of fact the risk was not increased. There is no illegality in the voyage that disables the plt. from recovering :

1 Arnould Ins. 745 et seq. ;

1 Phil. Ins. sec. 214 ;

Metcalfe v. Parry, 4 Camp. 123 ;

Carstairs v. Allnutt, 3 Camp. 497.

The knowledge of the master was not that of the owner for this purpose, as deck loading was contrary to the master's duty. The penalty is imposed by the statute on the master :

1 Phil. Ins. ss. 221, 717 ;

Havelock v. Handmill, 3 T. R. 277.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 19.—COCKBURN, C.J. now delivered the judgment of the Court.—This was an action on a valued policy on freight from Restigouch to Liverpool, for a total loss by perils of the sea. The fourth plea is to the effect that the ship cleared out and sailed from Restigouch, a British port in North America, after the 1st Sept. 1861, and before the 1st May 1862 ; that her cargo consisted of timber and wood goods, and that the whole of the cargo was not below the deck, but, on the contrary ; that the master, contrary to the stat. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 197, ss. 170, 171, 172, placed and kept a portion of the cargo on deck, and sailed without the certificate required by the statute, and that the plt. was the owner of the vessel. The fifth plea adds the additional averment that the plt. intended the vessel to sail so loaded and made the policy for the express purpose of protecting the said adventure so prohibited by the statute in question. Both these pleas were traversed and also demurred to. On the trial before Shee, J., at Liverpool, it appeared that the vessel did in fact sail, on the 13th Nov. 1861, with the whole of the cargo that was on freight properly stowed below deck, but that the master took on board a quantity of spars and other articles for his owner, to be carried to Liverpool, which were placed on deck. This he did in the exercise of his general authority as master, without any instructions from (the plt.) his owner to do so, his object, it would appear, being to save expense to his owner in obtaining the materials necessary for refitting the vessel in Liverpool after the voyage. The jury found that the vessel was not, in fact, rendered unseaworthy by this deck load ; that the spars and other articles on deck were more than were required for the ship's use on the voyage, and that the plt. was not aware of the conduct of the master till after the policy was made and the ship had sailed. The learned Judge ruled, on the construction of the proviso in the 171st section of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, that the spars, &c. in excess of what were required for the voyage, were cargo within the meaning of the enactment, and he directed the verdict to be entered for the deft. on both pleas, giving the plt. leave to move to enter the verdict for him. A rule was accordingly obtained, which came on for argument along with the demurrers. On the argument it was not disputed that the fifth plea was good, and that the judgment on the demurrer to that plea must be for the deft. ; but it was also not disputed that this plea was not proved, and that the verdict on it must be entered for the plt. We expressed our opinion during the argument that our brother Shee's ruling that the spars in question were cargo was correct, and that consequently the fourth plea was proved in substance. It was objected that the plea was so framed as to aver that the portion of cargo loaded on deck was part of that which was carried on freight ; but we expressed our opinion that this was an immaterial variance, the substance of the plea being that cargo was illegally carried on deck, and that, if necessary, an amendment might be made in the plea accordingly. The verdict, therefore, on the fourth plea must stand for the deft. ; but the real question between the parties is, whether the fourth plea is good in substance, and on this we took time to consider. The result of our deliberation is, that in our opinion the plea is bad. While the cases of Cunard v. Hyde, E. B. & E. 670 ; 2 E. & E. 1, establish that where the

of the sections in question in respect of wage of timber on deck are violated is illegal, and a policy of insurance on a voyage will not attach, they equally at knowledge on the part of the assured timber being so stowed is necessary to policy, and that in the absence of such the assured may recover. In the present assured did not, in fact, know of timber stowed on the deck, or of any intention on the part of the master to stow it. But the insurer on freight, it is said that, as the stowing of cargo is immediately within the province and duty of the master, the assured (the shipowner) is considered as bound by the act of the master, his agent, and that the knowledge of the master in law be taken to be that of the owner. It is, of course, the general rule that a principal is bound by the acts and knowledge of his agent acting within the scope of his authority, and of opinion that rule has no application in the present case; for although it is true that the stowing of the cargo is undoubtedly within the duty of the master, yet, in the absence of proof to the contrary, it must be taken that his authority in other respects, is, by his instructions, limited to that which is lawful. "The trust reposed in the captain of a vessel," says Lord Mansfield, in Earle v. Rowcroft, 8 East, 133, "is that he should obey the written instructions of his superiors where they give any, and where his instructions are silent, he is at all events to do nothing but what is consonant to the laws of the land, whether with or without a view to their advantage, because, in the absence of express orders to the contrary, the master is bound to the law as implied in their instructions. The master of a vessel who does an act in violation of the laws of his country is guilty of breach of the implied orders of his owners." Applying this principle to the present case, it follows that the master's authority can be implied in the master's discharge of his duties to do that which with respect to this part of his duty was a violation of the law. Again, it is a well-established distinction, that a man is civilly responsible for the acts he does when acting within the established scope of his authority, he will not be criminally liable for such acts unless express authority is given, or the authority is necessarily to be inferred from the nature of the employment, as in the case of a bookseller held liable for the sale by him of a libellous publication. Under the present circumstances the authority of the agent is limited to that which is lawful. If in seeking to perform the purpose of his employment he oversteers the law, he outruns his authority, and his acts will not be bound by what he does. Now, in the present case, as has been already pointed out, only where there are no circumstances from which it can be inferred that the master has authority to contravene the statute can properly be said, but, according to the authority of Earle v. Rowcroft, the reverse is to be presumed. It is to us, therefore, impossible to say, that the master's stowing the cargo on deck contrary to the statute was acting by the authority of the owner, or that the latter was bound by his knowledge. This view of the law as here applicable is materially confirmed if the case be looked at from another point of view. It seems clear, on the authority of Earle v. Rowcroft, that if the master, acting within what otherwise would be the scope of his authority, contravenes some positive law, and thereby causes injury to his owners, this constitutes barratry in the master, notwithstanding that the purpose of the thing done was to benefit the owners. In the case referred to, the master, having been directed to make the best purchases with despatch, and to go into an enemy's port to complete his cargo, which could be more speedily and cheaply obtained there, in consequence of which the ship was seized and confiscated. This proceeding on the part of the master, though within the general scope of his authority, and though done in the interests of his owners, was held to be barratrous, and the owner on a policy in which barratry of the master was insured against was held entitled to recover. Within the principle of this decision, the soundness of which has never been questioned, the conduct of the master in the present case would have amounted to barratry, as being an unlawful act done in contravention of his duty, though with the intention of benefiting his owner. Had the statute attached the forfeiture of the vessel as the penalty of the offence, and the vessel had been confiscated, the owner could have recovered on an insurance against loss by barratry. But to constitute barratry there must necessarily be an absence of consent and knowledge on the part of the owner. Where an act which would otherwise be barratrous is done with the assent and knowledge of the owner, it ceases to be barratrous. If, therefore, the knowledge of the master could be taken to be the knowledge of the owner, an illegal, and therefore barratrous, act done by the master would not, in case of loss occasioned thereby, give the owner a right to recover. But Earle v. Rowcroft directly establishes that, on loss occasioned by the illegal act of the master without the authority of the owner, the latter may recover, and therefore shows that, where the master does an illegal act, which but for its illegality would be within the scope of his ordinary authority, but which being illegal is barratrous, this will not amount in point of law to assent or knowledge on the part of his employer. For these reasons, it appears to us that the plea in this action cannot be taken to have constructively, any more than he had actually, knowledge of the illegal act of the master, and that consequently, within the decision of Cunard v. Hyde, the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and that our judgment should be in his favour. I should add that this judgment must be taken as that of my brothers Blackburn and Mellor and myself. My brother Crompton having been obliged to leave the court before the argument was concluded, takes no part in the judgment.

THE MAYOR, &C. OF WEYMOUTH (apps.) v.
C. H. NUGENT (resp.)

Wharfage duties—Prerogative of the Crown—Exemption from payment.

The prerogatives of the Crown cannot be affected except by express legislative enactment.

Where, therefore, a local Act of Parliament gave a right to the corporation of W. to demand and take certain wharfage duties for (inter alia) stone brought into the harbour of W. in any ship or vessel, and certain stone was brought by a barge into the said harbour, for the use only of Her Majesty's Government works there, and delivered there to persons in the employment of such Government for the use of the said works:

Held, that no duties were payable in respect thereof.

This was a case stated under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, at the instance of the apps., upon a dismissal of an information.

The case stated "That at a petty session of the peace holden at the Guildhall, Weymouth, on the

THE MAYOR, &c. OF WEYMOUTH v. NUGENT.

[Q. B.]

23rd Aug. 1864, an information and complaint came on to be heard before us the undersigned Edward Bayley, John Taylor, and Richard Cotterell, Esqrs., three of Her Majesty's justices of the peace acting in and for the said borough, by which the appra. complained that the resp., the above-named Charles Hodges Nugent had refused to pay the sum of 2s. 6d. wharfage duties on ten tons of block stone brought into the harbour of the said borough, on the 22nd Oct. then last past. The information was laid under an Act of Parliament passed in the 6th year of the reign of George the Fourth, intituled 'An Act to amend and enlarge the powers and provisions of several Acts relating to the harbour and bridge of the borough and town of Weymouth and Melcombe Regia, in the county of Dorset.' At the hearing the appra. and resp. duly appeared. It was proved by witnesses called by the appra., that the stone described in the information was, on the 22nd Oct. 1863, brought by a barge into the harbour of Weymouth, for the use only of Her Majesty's Government works on the Nube; that it was brought there from Portland for such use, and delivered there by the resp.'s orders to persons in the employ of the Government for the use of the said works; that the resp., as one of Her Majesty's officers, took charge of it on behalf of the Government; that the sum of 2s. 6d. would be the amount of wharfage dues payable in respect of the said stone so brought into the harbour, if any were payable; that the collector, on the 29th Oct. 1863, demanded of the resp. payment thereof, and that he refused to pay it; that such demand was made of him as commanding officer of the Royal Engineers taking charge of the stone. (The case then set out the form of receipt given on the delivery of the stone.) The resp. did not cross-examine the appra.' witnesses, nor was any witness called on his behalf. It was contended on behalf of the resp., that he was not liable for the wharfage dues claimed, inasmuch as the Act of Parliament did not give the appra. any right to petty customs or wharfage dues in respect of stone brought into the harbour of the said borough for the use of Her Majesty's Government works, and that by Her Majesty's prerogative the stone was exempt from such dues in such a case, and we the said justices, being of that opinion, dismissed the information and complaint. The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the said justices were right in dismissing the said complaint? If the court should be of opinion that our determination was wrong, we request them to remit the matter to us with their opinion thereon accordingly, or to make such other order relative to this matter as the court shall deem meet."

By the 6 Geo. 4, c. 116 (local), powers are conferred upon the corporation of Weymouth to levy and take certain petty customs and wharfage duties according as they are set out in two schedules for goods brought into the harbour of Weymouth.

The 2nd section enacts,

That from and immediately after the passing of this Act, the petty customs and wharfage duties mentioned and contained in the first schedule to this Act annexed, and the harbour dues and ballast duties mentioned and contained in the second schedule to this Act annexed shall be demanded and taken upon every ship, tow, or other vessel which shall be brought into the harbour of Weymouth and Melcombe Regia aforesaid, which said petty customs and wharfage duties, harbour dues and ballast duties shall be and the same are hereby declared to be vested in the said mayor, aldermen, bailiffs, burgesses and community of the said borough and town for the time being for the purpose of repairing, improving and maintaining the harbour, wharfs, quays and piers within the borough and town of Weymouth and Melcombe Regia aforesaid.

By sect. 23 there is an exemption from toll of the bridge for burres, carriages, &c., connected with the mails, and also the horses, carriages, &c. attending Her Majesty, &c.

Direct. 29 also exempts from duty all coal imported into the said port for the use of Her Majesty's steam-packets, and actually used on board the same.

Lush, Q. C. (J. Brown with him) now appeared for the appra., and contended that the language of the Act was sufficiently comprehensive to include the Crown, and that there was no implied exception; that where the tolls are levied to make good costs incurred by individuals, or public bodies not connected with the Government of the country, there are always clauses inserted expressly exempting the Crown from liability to pay toll. He referred to

The Turnpike Act, 5 Geo. 4, c. 126;

The Harbours, Docks and Pier Clauses Act 1847 (10 Vict. c. 27), s. 28;

The Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), s. 92;

[COCKBURN, C. J.—If the Crown had granted the dues it would undoubtedly have been itself exempt, why not equally so when the grant is by the Parliament? If the Legislature had intended any exemption, it would have enacted it. He referred also to the express exemptions in clauses 23 and 24. [COCKBURN, C. J.—The prerogatives of the Crown are never affected except by express enactment.]

The Solicitor-General (Downes) with him) argued that the Crown not being bound unless expressly named, its prerogative cannot be affected by implication merely. That to this doctrine there is only the exception of cases where the enactment is for the general advancement of religion, the promotion of justice, or the general public good, which is not the case in the present instance. That it being admitted that the stone was to be employed by the Crown, no wharfage duty could be demanded. He argued also that the clauses themselves of the local Act altogether excluded the idea of the Crown being included. He cited

Lush, Q. C. replied.

COCKBURN, C. J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrates is right. There is a great principle or rule which, from an ancient period, has obtained, with regard to the prerogatives of the Crown: namely, that except with reference to certain matters of a public character, the Crown is not bound by statute unless specifically mentioned therein. It may be said that the status of immunity from toll or dues arose at a remote time, when the right to impose such was founded upon a grant from the Crown, and that the Crown, in such case, never intended to tax itself, and therefore it may well be assumed that, whether tolls and dues have been taken by grant from the Crown or by statute, the Crown never intended to include itself. But however this may be, the exemption has obtained from the earliest time, and we cannot suppose that the Legislature, in this instance, have intended to make the Crown liable without, in fact, making any direct reference to it. The rule I have mentioned applies to such a case as this, where dues are taken under a local Act of Parliament. Mr. Lush relies upon the exception in the Act as to the toll of the bridge, and upon the general rule that, where there is an express exemption, cases not expressed are not to be included. We must, however, take it that the exemption was merely inserted ex abundanti cautela. The case of Watson v.

THE BETA.

[PRIV. CO.]

Perkins, which is strongly in point, justifies me in these views. The principle applicable to the two cases is identical. The prerogative of the Crown, which is clearly established from ancient times, would be materially affected by the adoption of Mr. Lush's views; and we should be acting directly contrary to the rule established by so many cases if we were to hold that the Crown is liable. The argument that it was intended by implication to bind the Crown has no validity for the reasons I have given, and there is, moreover, no evidence to show that there was any such intention.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by JAMES PATERSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

(Present—The Right Hon. Lord CHELMSFORD, KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.JJ.)

THE BETA.

Ship—Licence of pilot—Renewal—Date of renewal—
17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 374.

A pilot produced a licence, last renewed on 22nd Jan. 1864. The licence purported to be conferred "from thenceforth up to the 31st Jan. next ensuing, and no longer." The 374th section of the Merchant Shipping Act enacts, that no licence shall continue in force beyond the 31st Jan. next ensuing the date of such licence, but the same may, on application, be renewed on such 31st day of Jan., or any subsequent day:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Court of Adm.), that the Legislature meant that the renewal was to operate from the 31st Jan., whether applied for on that day or not.

This was an appeal from a sentence of the High Court of Admiralty, in a cause of damage promoted by the barque Fides against the owners of the steamship Beta.

The screw steamship Beta (whereof Robert Minter Upton was master), of the burthen of 508 tons register or thereabouts, propelled by engines of 120 horse-power, and navigated by her master and a crew of twenty-five hands, left the East-lane Tier in the port of London, in charge of James Voss, a duly licensed Trinity pilot, at about 5.15 a.m. of the 6th May 1864, laden with a general cargo, and having on board passengers bound to Waterford and Belfast. At about 5.45 a.m. of the said day, the wind was easterly and the tide was about half ebb, and the Beta was proceeding down the river Thames at the rate of from five to six knots an hour, with a good and vigilant look-out being kept from on board her.

Whilst the Beta was so proceeding, and when she was about half a mile above the vessels lying in Deptford tier, she overtook several vessels drifting down the river. The pilot, James Voss, who was on the bridge of the Beta, conducting her navigation, shaped her course to pass such vessels, and by his orders the engines of the Beta were eased and stopped; and in order to cant her starboard-quarter clear of a schooner, which was one of such vessels drifting down, her helm was ported, which brought her head in towards the south shore. The helm was then steadied and her engines were, by order of the said James Voss, set on ahead, and her helm was starboarded for the purpose of bringing her out again from the south shore, and clear of the vessels in Deptford tier; but the said James Voss, finding that there would be difficulty in passing clear of the tier, ordered the engines to be eased and stopped, which was done. But, notwithstanding, the Beta came into collision with the barque Fides, which was the outermost of such vessels in Deptford tier.

Under these circumstances, the resps. averred in the court below that the said James Voss was a duly licensed pilot for the place in question; that they were by law compelled to employ him; that the Beta was in his sole charge; and, that so far as the Beta was to blame for the collision, the fault was exclusively that of the said James Voss, and that neither the Beta nor the resps. were liable for the losses caused by the said collision.

The learned judge of the court below was assisted by Trinity Masters.

The evidence for the resps. was taken orally in open court. Upon the licence of the said James Voss being produced, an objection was taken to it by the apps. upon the ground that it had not been renewed in such manner as required by the provisions of the 374th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854.

The learned judge of the court below, after hearing counsel on both sides, pronounced the collision to have been occasioned by the fault or incapacity of the said pilot, James Voss, overruled the objection taken to his licence, and decided that the employment by the Beta of the said James Voss was compulsory, and pronounced against the damage proceeded for.

After the Trinity Masters arrived at their decision,

Dr. LUSHINGTON continued:—We are all agreed that the blame of this collision is imputable solely to the pilot. I must now give my judgment upon that 374th section. The licence which I hold in my hand has been duly entered at the Custom-house according to the Merchant Shipping Act in the year 1855, and it appears that the object of it is to confer the licence from "thenceforth," that is, whatever may be the date, and the original date of this licence is 1855, up to the 31st Jan. next ensuing, and not longer. Now, there have been several renewals of this licence, and the last of them was on the 22nd Jan. 1864, and this collision took place, I think, in the month of May, but some time after the 31st Jan. It has been contended, according to the terms of the statute, that this renewal of the licence only lasted till the 31st Jan. 1864, and that consequently, at the time of the collision itself, there was no operative licence; that, consequently, the pilot was not a licensed pilot; that, consequently, he was the servant of those who employed him, and that they are responsible for his acts. Now, I am fain to confess, with regard to this 374th section, that any construction I put upon it is subject to some difficulty, and attended with inconvenience; and this being so, I look to the consequences of the different constructions proposed, and if very serious consequences to the beneficial and reasonable operation of the Act necessarily follow from one construction, I apprehend that, unless the words imperatively require that construction, it is the duty of the court to prefer such a construction that res magis valeat, quam pereat. Now, on the one hand, it is stated in the argument adduced by Dr. Deane and Mr. Clarkson, that unless their construction of the statute be adopted, it will be next to impossible to have any licensed pilot at all at certain periods of the year, and that there would be the greatest possible inconvenience arising, if all pilots were compelled to come to London with their licences for the purpose of getting them renewed at a particular time. It must be recollected a pilot cannot separate himself from his licence, because he is bound always to have his licence with him.

[Priv. Co.]

THE UNITED STATES.

[Priv. Co.]

and bound to produce that licence when he boards a vessel and takes charge of her. That difficulty has been most rightly urged, and the consequences would certainly be most detrimental to navigation if I were to impose on the section the construction asked by the other side, for I can hardly conceive any greater inconvenience than that pilots should be without licences, or should be compelled to come in a body for the purpose of renewing them. That is the inconvenience upon the one side. On the other hand, I am aware that if I adopt the construction of Dr. Deane, the licence may be renewed at any part of the year, and that is certainly not the intention of the Legislature, and I quite agree with the Solicitor-General, that that would be contrary to the spirit of the Act of Parliament, and for this reason, that the licence ought not to be renewed until the appointed period of expiration, and when the conduct of the pilot has been such as to merit the renewal of such licence. The words of the section are, "Subject to any alteration to be made by the Trinity-house, no licence granted by them shall continue in force beyond the 31st Jan. next ensuing the date of such licences." Now that would be plain enough, if I were quite satisfied what is to be considered the date of such licence, but I am not satisfied what is meant by the Legislature by the date of such licence. I do not apprehend that it necessarily follows that the date of such licence is the day of the renewal, or rather of the application for the renewal of such licence (not necessarily), "but the same may, upon the application of the pilot holding such licence, be renewed on such 31st Jan. in every year, or any subsequent day." Now there are two modes of considering this, bearing in mind that there is a distinction between an application for a renewal, and a renewal itself. Now, my understanding of this section is, that the licence which lasted until the 31st Jan. might be renewed, that is to say, it might upon application upon that day be renewed on the 31st Jan. in every year, or it might be renewed on any subsequent day, and undoubtedly these are very strong words and very difficult for the court to get over; but it is the inclination of my opinion, admitting the doubt and difficulty, that the meaning of this was, that the renewal might operate from the 31st Jan. in every year, and that it was to be in the power of the Trinity-house at any subsequent date afterwards to renew that licence, if they thought fit, yet that the Trinity-house are not enticed by this section from ordering, not from renewing, for that is not the expression I mean to use, but from ordering licences to have fresh operation from the 31st Jan., that being the day on which the effect and operation of all licences necessarily ceases, under the tenor of the Act of Parliament. Looking at the mischief which would accrue from a contrary construction, though with considerable doubt, this is the construction I must put upon the section. I therefore hold this pilot to have been duly licensed, and dismiss the action of the pilots without costs.

The present appeal was brought from that judgment.

Lord Justice TURNER.—Although it would be going too far to say that there is no difficulty in construing this statute, yet their Lordships have come to a very clear opinion with regard to it. The section seems to be capable of two constructions, either that the act of renewal was to be done, or that the renewal itself was to take effect, on the 31st Jan. Their Lordships, however, are of opinion with the learned judge of the court below, that the Legislature intended the latter to be the meaning. This construction avoids the great inconveniences which would result from the construction contended for by the app., which would admit of certain districts being for days, or possibly for weeks, without any qualified pilot. Their Lordships will, therefore, recommend that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Decree affirmed with costs.

THE UNITED STATES.

Ship—Collision—Negligence—River navigation—Launch—Duty as to look-out.

The U., a tug steamer, when being launched in the river Tyne, ran stern foremost into the starboard side of the steamer Otter, then passing down the river, and negligently being at that place:

Held, notwithstanding the O.'s negligence, the U. might, by ordinary care, such as giving a signal before launching, have avoided the consequences of such negligence, and therefore, both being to blame, half the damage only was payable by U.

This was an appeal from a decree of the High Court of Admiralty in a cause of damage by the steamer Otter, against the steam-tug United States.

The collision took place in the river Tyne, at half-past four o'clock on 9th March 1864, on the occasion of the launch in the river of the United States.

The Court below held the Otter was alone to blame, and made decree against her, whereon the Otter was appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. for the app.

Brett, Q. C. for resp.

Lord CHILMARFORD.—The facts of this case lie in a very narrow compass. On the 9th March 1864, about half-past four p.m., the app.'s screw-steamer, the Otter, was proceeding down the river Tyne, on her outward voyage, and had arrived near to the Middle-dock at South Shields. She was in her proper course on the south side of the river, and to the north of several tiers of vessels which were moored in that part of the Tyne. The resp.'s vessel, the United States, an intended steam-tug, was upon the slip, where she had been built, in a yard below the Middle-dock, and was about to be launched. She was decorated with flags, as is usual upon occasion of the launch of a vessel, and was prepared for launching at high water, which on the day in question, was at twenty-five minutes past four. The launch took place at 4.40. There was a tier of vessels moored nearly opposite the yard from which the United States was to be launched, and which it was necessary to move out of the way. The deputy harbour-master, who was on the spot in his boat, had given notice to the last vessel of the tier, called the Columbine, to leave the place where she was lying, and she was proceeding up the river in tow of a tug-steamer, when the Otter approached. The Otter, in order to avoid a collision with the tug-steamer and the Columbine, left her course, turned her head to port, ward, and came into the place which the Columbine had just left. At that moment the launch took place, and the United States ran stern foremost into the starboard side of the Otter, and occasioned the damage for which the suit was instituted. The learned judge of the Court of Admiralty was assisted by the Trinity Masters, and all the witnesses were examined viva voce before them, and in the result they expressed an opinion that the Otter was solely to blame for the collision, and a decree was pronounced against the damage proceeded for. Upon the appeal from this decree two questions have been raised on the part of the apps.: first, whether the Otter was at all to blame; secondly, if she were, whether there was negligence on the part of the United States which mainly contributed to the collision? The case presented by the apps. is that the Otter was proceeding down the river, on the south side, in her regular and proper course, outside the tiers of vessels, when the Columbine in tow of the tug-steamer came out from the berth where she had been lying athwart the hawse of the Otter. That the Otter immediately stopped and reversed her engines, and turned her head in to the southward, but that her way not being entirely stopped, she reached the place which the Columbine had left, within the tier of vessels, and quite out of the regular course of her voyage, and the instant she arrived there the launch of the United States unexpectedly took place, and the collision occurred. The case on the part of the United States is, that her intended launch was announced to vessels upon the river in the usual way. That although it may be true that the Otter stopped, and as many of the resps.' witnesses say for at least five minutes, yet that she afterwards steamed ahead again, and thus brought herself into the way of the United States at the moment of her being launched, and that if she had remained in the place where she stopped, she would entirely have avoided the collision. The resps.' view of the case is supported by a great number of disinterested witnesses of great respectability, and it was adopted by the learned judge in the court below. Their Lordships are not prepared to say that they would not have come to the same conclusion on this part of the case if it had been originally before them upon the same evidence; but even if they entertained any serious doubt, or were inclined to take an opposite view of the matter, considering that it is a question of fact upon which there is conflicting evidence, of which the learned judge had decided after a viva voce examination of the witnesses, affording him better means than their Lordships possess of forming a judgment as to their credibility and truth, they would hardly have felt justified in expressing a different opinion from that which he has pronounced. It being then established that blame is imputable to the Otter for the collision, the only remaining question is, whether she is solely to blame? In considering the question, it must be taken to be the fact that the Otter was in the place where the collision occurred by her own negligence. This circumstance will not of itself discharge the United States from all liability for the damage, for, as was said by Parke, B., in Dacres v. Mann, 10 M. & W. 549: "The rule of law is, that although there may have been negligence on the part of the plt., yet, unless he might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided the consequences of the left's negligence, he is entitled to recover." Was there, then, any negligence on the part of the resps., the consequences of which could not have been avoided by the exercise of ordinary care by the Otter, after she had placed herself in the way of the launch? This seems to depend entirely upon whether the United States was launched prematurely, and without waiting for a signal which it had been previously arranged should be given. Although there seems to be no bye-law or other regulation upon the river Tyne making it part of the duty of the harbour-master to be present at launches, yet it seems to have been customary, and it certainly seems a very proper precaution, to require his attendance upon these occasions, for the purpose of guarding against accidents. In this case notice of the intended launch was given to the harbour-master the day before it was to take place, by a person in the employ of the shipbuilder; and the deputy harbour-master attended to discharge whatever duty he was accustomed to perform on these occasions. Whether in general, when present, he was the person by whom the signal of the exact time when the vessel was to be launched was given is not very material, because it seems to be agreed on both sides that, in the present instance, the time was in some way to be regulated by the harbour-master. The resps.' witness, Stephenson, who was in charge of the United States, says "that the harbour-master told them they were to launch as soon as the Columbine got out of the way, and that he would attend to getting her out of the way." And the only difference between the parties upon this point is, whether the harbour-master, besides getting the Columbine out of the way, was to give some orders, or to make some signal that the way was clear. Now Smith, the deputy harbour-master, states that at three o'clock on the day of the launch he went to the shipbuilder's and told some person at the yard that they were not to launch till he told them: that as soon as he sang out "Let her come," she might come, and he added, "Don't let her come till I tell you." It was said by Dr. Deane that Smith was not to be believed, because he was desirous of sheltering himself from the blame that was imputable to himself for having removed the Columbine at an improper time; and the evidence of the pilot on board the Otter is referred to in support of this charge. But the pilot does not say that it was an imprudent thing or an improper time to have removed the Columbine; but, on the contrary, he says it was a convenient time, although "he himself would not have started her then." It may be observed in favour of Smith's statement, that it seems highly probable that an arrangement should be made with respect to launching a vessel upon some preconcerted signal; because it appears that where the duty of giving such signal is cast upon the harbour-master, no regular and established form is invariably employed. Mr. Lee, the resps.' witness, says, "They generally hold up their hat on their hand, that is the usual course." Some signal or other is made by the harbour-master that the launch may take place. In this unsettled and varying practice as to the sort of signal to be given, it seems almost necessary that some arrangement should be made as to what shall be the signal on each particular occasion; and there is no fair ground for distrusting the testimony of the deputy harbour-master that such an arrangement was made in the present case. If then the harbour-master was to give the signal, and the particular signal to be given had been previously arranged, it is immaterial whether the communication said to have been made to the person in charge of the United States shortly before the time of launching was merely not to launch till the barque (the Columbine) was out of the way and all was clear, without the addition of the words "until they got further orders;" because it must have been understood that at all events they were to wait for a signal from the harbour-master that the way was clear. This signal he never gave, and, of course, could not have given, when he saw the Otter occupying the place from which he had just removed the Columbine, until she was out of the way also. Without waiting for this signal the United States was launched, and the collision took place, being thus mainly attributable to the neglect of the precaution to avoid an accident, which had been carefully arranged beforehand. It does not appear from the judgment whether this view of the case was presented to the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty; but whether it was or not, their Lordships are unable to agree in the conclusion to which he arrived, that the Otter was solely to blame for the collision. They are of opinion that both parties were in fault, and therefore that, according to the usual course in such cases, the apps. are entitled to receive from the resps. half the amount of the damage sustained by the Otter. They will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty to reverse the decree, and to refer it to the registrar to ascertain the amount to which the apps. are entitled upon this view of the case. Their Lordships think that there ought to be no costs of this appeal or in the court below on either side.

Arrest—Bail—Release—General Rules, 1859, rr. 51, 54.

A vessel having been arrested, bail, which was afterwards pronounced sufficient, was tendered to the plts., who nevertheless entered a caveat against the release of the vessel, and she was consequently detained for some days:

Held, that the detention not being justifiable, the plts. must be condemned in the damages and costs arising from the detention.

This was a motion for costs and damages caused by the detention of the ship Corner.

A cause having been instituted against the ship and her freight in the sum of 1800*l.*, the vessel was arrested and an appearance entered on the 24th Oct., and on the same day the warrant was extracted. At one p.m. upon that day notice was given to the London attorney for the plt. that the defts. tendered Mr. Widdicombe, of Liverpool, shipbroker, and Mr. Bell, of Liverpool, shipbroker, as bail in the amount of 1800*l.*, and at the expiration of the twenty-four hours required by the rules of the court after the service of the bail-bond with the usual affidavit at the office of the plt.'s attorney, a præcipe for release was filed, and, there being no caveat on the file, the ship was released.

On the 27th Oct. the plt.'s attorney left with the deft.'s attorney a notice of objection to the bail, and of intention to move the court to grant a second warrant, by reason of the fact that the two sureties were partners, and also that sufficient notice of bail had not been given to the plt.'s attorney, and that he had not had time to communicate with Liverpool before the release; and on the 3rd Nov. the learned judge allowed a second warrant to issue, and the vessel was again arrested. At 2.40 p.m. on that day the deft.'s proctor served a notice upon the plt.'s attorney, that he had tendered Mr. M'Calman, of Liverpool, ship Chandler, and Mr. Widdicombe, as bail, and the twenty-four hours having been again allowed to elapse, and the bail-bond and usual affidavits filed, a præcipe for release was again applied for, when it was found that a caveat had been entered. The deft.'s proctor being informed that the objection was to the sufficiency of Widdicombe, application was made to the court on the 10th, and the court referred the matter to the registrar. The names of several firms in London were supplied to the plt.'s attorney as references as to the sufficiency of the bail objected to, and the registrar appointed the 13th Nov. for the inquiry. After the registrar had made his appointment, and on the 12th Nov., the plt.'s attorney gave notice to the deft.'s proctor that the caveat was withdrawn, and the vessel was again released. Damages, demurrage and costs were now asked for from the time of the entry of the caveat to the second release.

V. Lushington, for the deft., drew attention to the rules 51 and 54.

R. G. Williams for the plt.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—When once a vessel has become entitled to a release, the onus of proving a right further to detain her clearly lies on the plt., and it is for him to make out that the circumstances of the case warranted him in the further detention. The first caveat was justified because it was asserted that the sureties offered were partners—an assertion which was not and is not contradicted, and so far the plt. was not blameable; afterwards, however, an objection was taken to Mr. Widdicombe which was utterly unfounded, and which, as the party objecting confesses now, was not tenable. By rule 54 a party delaying the release of any property by the entry of a caveat, shall be liable to be condemned in costs and damages unless he shall show to the satisfaction of the judge good and sufficient cause for having so done; and I am of opinion that no such good and sufficient reason has been made out, and therefore condemn the plt. in damages from the time such objection was made until the release of the vessel, viz., from the 4th to the 12th Nov. The plt. must also pay the costs consequent upon the detention.

Breach of duty and breach of contract—The Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 6—"Assignee"—Charter-party—Bill of lading—Guarantee as to capacity and draught of ship—Fresh or salt water—"Freight"—Lump freight—Jettison and sale—Non-production of papers—Constructive waiver of tender—Delivery.

Through the negligence of a pilot not compulsorily taken, a vessel got aground in the course of the voyage, and part of the cargo (rice) was thereby damaged, and other parts it became necessary to throw overboard. The vessel subsequently put into the Mauritius for repairs, where the damaged portion was sold. On the arrival of the vessel at her port of discharge the master, who was under the circumstances entitled to land and warehouse the cargo, neglected to cause it to be assorted, and also wrongfully refused delivery to the consignee:

Held that the consignee was entitled to damages for, first, the goods jettisoned; secondly, the goods sold at the Mauritius; thirdly, the non-assortment of the cargo at Liverpool; fourthly, the loss of interest occasioned by the wrongful withholding of the cargo.

nended petition now came on to be heard on s. Oral evidence was taken and the case quied by counsel, and with regard to the the judge found the following facts iginal agreement between De Mattos and er that the homeward shipment should be account of De Mattos and the firm of r and Co., each a moiety ; the firm of er and Co. to purchase the cargo and to the matter of the shipment ; the cargo at Rangoon by the Burmah Company, on Ashburner and Co., and the bills of lading by the Burmah Company and their agent rner and Co. at Calcutta ; that Ashburner drew bills upon De Mattos for the whole of the purchase-money and sent these bills the bills of lading to the Union Bank in with instructions to the effect that De ould accept the bills of exchange and when was due pay their amount into the bank to t of Ashburner and Co., and that when this , and not before, the bank was to hand over of lading to De Mattos ; that the bank had, ; had a lien upon the bills of lading to secure nt account of Ashburner and Co. with the bank ; that De Mattos did accept the bills, but that the delay of the vessel at the Mauritius, which prevented her from arriving before the bills became due, caused him to make a new arrangement with Ashburner, the plt., to the effect that the plt. should withdraw the bills from circulation at a cost of about 3500*l.*, and that the plt. should have an assignment from De Mattos of his moiety of the cargo upon trust to appropriate the proceeds as follows : first, to satisfy one-half of the price of the cargo ; second, to reimburse himself the 3500*l.* ; third, to apply the remainder towards paying off the debt (then 18,000*l.*) due from De Mattos to the plt. personally upon their general account ; and that on the arrival of the vessel at Liverpool the Union Bank gave up the bills of lading to the plt. and De Mattos stopped payment pending the negotiations between the plt. and the master as to the freight.

The Court also found as follows :—The vessel had been loaded at Rangoon and Hastings to the full extent named, as safe, by Capt. Brooking, the master-superintendent in conjunction with Mr. Cator, the freighters' agent, namely, to 25 feet, and at that draught she carried only 2698 tons. At a draught of 26 feet, she would, in the fresh water of the Irrawaddy, have been able to carry 2918 tons ; but in salt water she would have been able to carry full 3000 tons. With this cargo on board, the Norway went down the Irrawaddy in charge of a pilot, who was voluntarily employed by the master, and in doing so she got aground upon a shoal, and this grounding was attributable to the negligence of the pilot ; the Norway was got off after a few hours, and then proceeded on her voyage, it being thought she had received no mischief, but after a few days the vessel began to leak. Jettison was made by the master of some part of the goods, and eventually the vessel put in at Mauritius, where the cargo was discharged, and the ship repaired, the damaged part of the cargo sold, and the rest reladen. On the arrival of the vessel at Liverpool a dispute arose as to the amount of freight due, and the plt. offered to pay the undisputed portion into a bank, to abide a reference, but the master claimed an excessive sum, and, though not refusing to deliver any part of the cargo until the whole of the sum claimed had been paid, nevertheless insisted upon retaining in his possession sufficient of the plt.'s goods to answer his full demand, and thus never relaxed his lien for the full sum claimed, and throughout rejected any compromise ; the master also failed to establish that he had furnished the plt. with the papers and information necessary for him to verify the justice of the master's claim. The master did not take the vessel into one of the closed docks as he was requested by the plt., but into the Canada Dock, which is an open dock furnished with sheds, but it appeared that rice cargoes were not unfrequently discharged there, and could there be assorted if sufficiently skilled servants were employed. The master, on failure of the negotiations, entered the cargo in his own name, and employed a master-porter to superintend the unloading, and the cargo was unladen, but no assortment made. The plt. then instituted this suit, and the plt. subsequently applied for and obtained an order that on payment by him to the master of 8461*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* (the balance of freight stated by the plt. to be due in respect of the cargo), and on the plt. depositing in the registry a note for 5250*l.* to answer any further claims of the master for freight and general average, and on the bills of lading being filed in the registry, and an undertaking being given by the plt. to indemnify the defts. against any loss that they might sustain through the delivery of the cargo, the cargo should be released and possession given to the plt. And on the 5th April, under another order of the court made by consent, the plt. paid to Messrs.

Taylor, the defts.' agents, in respect of the cargo, 845*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* landing charges, reserving any question in respect of the same for the decision of the court. The cargo was then taken possession of and sold by the plt.

Lush, Q.C. and V. Lushington for the plt.—First, the plt. had the beneficial interest in the whole of the cargo, and was therefore entitled to sue under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. Secondly, as to the charter-party. (a) The guarantee in the charter-party was a promise to carry 3000 tons, and therefore there was deficiency of about 300 tons. (b) The master had no lien for the one-third of the freight payable before delivery of the cargo on the arrival of the vessel at Liverpool. That was not freight. Thirdly, as to damages for jettison and sale. (a) The shipowner is responsible for the loss thus occasioned, because it was the ulterior consequence of the negligence of himself or his agents :

Davis v. Garrett, 4 Moo. & P. 540 ;

Siordet v. Hall, 4 Bing. 607 ;

Lloyd v. Iron Screw Navigation Company, 4 N. R. 292.

(b) Though the freight was lump freight the plt. was entitled to deduct so much as would have been payable as freight for the goods jettisoned and sold, for by strict right, if the master fails to bring home any part of the cargo, he loses the whole of his lump cargo : (Bright v. Couper, 1 Brown. 21.) Fourthly, as to damages for goods brought to Liverpool. (a) The plt. was exempted from making a tender, because, first, the master made an exorbitant demand for freight, and would not listen to any proposition for compromise (Kerford v. Mondel, 28 L. J. 303, Ex); secondly, the master did not furnish the proper papers showing what freight was due : (Macl. 587.) (b) The master was bound to unload the vessel in one of the closed docks, because, first, they were the docks named in the charter-party (Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 67, par. 3); secondly, they were the only customary docks for the discharge of rice cargoes (Ib. par. 4); thirdly, the plt. so directed the master. (c) The sound goods were not separated from the unsound. (d) The rice was not assorted. (e) The plt. is entitled to the interest upon the value of his cargo, from the time when the master ought to have given him possession to the time when he did give possession.

Brett, Q. C. and Cohen for the defts.—First, the plt. is not entitled to sue, at all events, alone. Besides the plt., his partners and De Mattos, and also the bank, were interested in the cargo. Secondly, the guarantee in the charter-party was only that the ship was capable of carrying 3000 tons, and that upon a draught of twenty-six feet of water. Water means salt water, the reference being to the ordinary sea-going draught of the vessel : (Pust v. Douie, 33 L. J. 172, Q. B.) The guarantee was therefore fulfilled. Thirdly, as to damages in respect of jettison and sale. These were the results of the perils of the seas ; but if of the pilot's negligence, the defts. are not responsible. The freight is lump freight. If any part of the goods arrive at their destination, the whole lump freight is payable ; it cannot be apportioned. Freight can be deducted only when it is payable by the tale : (The Salacia, 7 L. T. Rep. N. S. 440 ; 9 Jur. N. S. 27 ; 32 L. J. 41-43, Adm.) Fourthly, as to damages in respect of goods brought to Liverpool. (a) The plt. made no tender, and nothing was done to waive tender. (b) The master was not bound to go into a particular dock in order to deliver :

Brown v. Johnson, 10 M. & W. 831 ;

Brereton v. Chapman, 7 Bing. 559.

(c) The master was not bound to assort, as the plt.

had not made entry of the goods : (Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, s. 67, par. 6. It is no part of the ordinary duty of the master or porter to assort (Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858, s. 35); but, if otherwise, it is he and not the defts. who are answerable to the plt. The plt. might have got possession of his cargo under the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, s. 70.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—I will first deal with the preliminary objection taken by the defts. to the right of the plt. to sue on the ground that he was not beneficially entitled to the cargo comprised in the bills of lading assigned by him. I adhere to my decision in the St. Cloud, 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 55, that under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, the court will not entertain a claim made by a bare assignee of a bill of lading. But in this case under the new arrangement made with De Mattos the plt. remained, as before, the legal holder of the bills of lading, free from the lien of the bank, as free also from any undertaking to assign them to De Mattos, and as to the cargo comprised in the bill he, as representative of his firm, remained as before entitled to one-half, and as to the other half he became equitable assignee from De Mattos, upon trusts substantially for the benefit of Ashburner personally, and also as the representative of his firm. De Mattos ceased to be interested in the cargo, except that it was to his advantage that the cargo should turn out well, for the higher price fetched the greater of course would be the reduction of his debt to Ashburner. Under these circumstances I am of opinion that the plt. not only was the legal holder of these bills of lading, but also that by the assignment the "property comprised in the bills of lading passed to him" as an individual person, and as the representative of his firm, and I am therefore of opinion that he has a right to sue the deft ship under the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. Then, as to the construction of the charter-party and bills of lading. The freight is stated in the bills of lading to be "freight payable as per charter." The court is therefore referred to the charter-party, but only for the purpose of ascertaining the amount of freight. What are the stipulations in the charter as to freight? I think they occupy the whole clause beginning "in consideration of" and ending "less than 11 months' interest." After naming 11,250*l.* as freight payable if the ship is ordered to the United Kingdom, the charter-party contains these words, "the master guaranteeing to carry 3000 tons dead weight of cargo upon a draught of twenty-six feet of water or to forfeit freight in proportion to deficiency." I think this guarantee is a twofold one, viz., first, that the ship was large enough to carry 3000 tons ; secondly, that her build was such that she could carry the 3000 tons upon a draught of twenty-six feet of water. It was not therefore a promise on the part of the master that in this particular voyage home he would carry 3000 tons ; for at a time when the charter was executed, it was not settled for certain from what port the vessel should reload for her home voyage. The selection lay with the freighter ; he might choose either Calcutta, Rangoon, Akya or Bassein ; and it was not impossible that the river channel, from one of these ports, might not be navigable for a vessel drawing twenty-six feet of water ; and the shipowner could not with prudence have covenanted absolutely to carry 3000 tons. What he covenanted was, that his vessel was capable of carrying 3000 tons and upon a draught of twenty-six feet of water, and further that she could take on board a full cargo compatible with safety. Hence after the guarantee was added the clause, "the vessel to be loaded at such port of loading to such draught of water

This, for shortness, I may call the net value. There are three modes by which this indemnity may be effected. First, that the plt. should deduct from the full freight his full loss, namely, net value. Secondly, that he should deduct nothing, but, in the first instance, pay the full freight, and then recover by action his full loss, viz., the net value. Thirdly, that the plt. should deduct from the full freight the freight of the goods thrown overboard and sold, and then by action recover the residue of his loss. In the end, if all parties are solvent, each of these modes comes to the same thing; but it is important to distinguish between them, in order that the shipper may be able to ascertain the amount of freight for which the shipowner has a lien; and when he, the shipper, is bound to tender, he can become entitled to claim delivery of the rest of his goods brought to their destination. Now the first of these modes, by which the shipper would deduct the net value from the full freight, is not recognised by English law. The cases of Meyer v. Dresser, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 612, Dakin v. Oxley, 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 268, and the Salacia (supra), amongst other cases, decide that under no circumstances can the shipper insist upon deducting from the full freight the value of his goods wrongfully disposed of during the voyage. He must seek his remedy for that value, as distinct from their freight, by cross-action. The third of these modes (by which the shipper would make a deduction from the full freight of the goods improperly disposed of, but no other deduction) is permitted to the shipper, if the freight is payable per tale. But this is lump freight, not freight per tale. For I cannot accede to the argument that the freight is not freight per tale, because 11,250*l.* freight for 3000 tons would be equivalent to the sum of about 3*l.* 15*s.* per ton, and 11,625*l.* for 3000 tons to another sum per ton. This argument, besides being inherently weak, is based upon the assumption (which I have already declared to be without foundation) that the master covenanted absolutely to carry 3000 tons. The freight is lump freight, and it is urged on behalf of the debt. that lump freight cannot be apportioned, that the deduction would be difficult if not impossible to calculate, and consequently that the only remedy open to the shipper is that of an action for damages. On the other hand, Mr. Lush argued for the plt. that if there was any difference between lump freight and freight per tale, it was, that in the case of lump freight if any part of the cargo shipped was not brought to the port of destination the shipowners in an action for freight could not recover any freight at all, because he would not have observed his own part of the covenant, and in favour of this proposition he cited the old case of Bright v. Couper (supra). There seems to have been no recent decision on the point, and on consulting the various text-books on the subject I find that they all speak doubtfully as to what would be decided if a case like the present was to arise, and the court must, therefore, fall back upon considerations of equity. It certainly would be unjust that the master should forfeit the whole of his freight for not bringing a small portion of his cargo; but, on the other hand, it would be harsh upon the shipper that he should in the first instance pay full freight, though his cargo had not been delivered, and in ascertaining the proper amount of freight to be deducted no such difficulty would arise as would detain the master and his vessel in port. I am therefore of opinion that, in the present case, the plt. would have been entitled to deduct from the lump freight a sum equivalent to the freight for the goods jettisoned and sold, and then to have recovered the residue of his loss by a separate action. The exact sums will be ascertained by the registrar and merchants. As to the plt.'s claim for damage in respect of the goods brought to the port of destination, the debts. question his right to sue at all for damages in this respect, and they do so upon the ground that the plt. was never entitled to delivery, for that he never made a sufficient tender, or a tender at all. The plt., on the other hand, contends that he was exempted from the obligation of making a tender by reason of the improper conduct of the master. This conduct of the master is said to have consisted, first, in making an unjustifiable demand and insisting upon it throughout; and, secondly, in withholding the necessary information. As to the first point, the making of an exorbitant demand does not alone constitute an excuse to the plt. for not making a tender, but it is a very different case when the master not only makes an exorbitant demand, but persists in it; and I think the case cited for the plt., Kerford v. Mondel, 28 L. J. 303, Ex., is an authority for the position that in such a state of circumstances the owner of the goods is not bound to make a tender. As to the second point, it was strongly argued on behalf of the debts. that it was no part of the master's duty or contract to furnish the plt. with papers. But to this doctrine the court cannot accede. Where a creditor has a lien upon a debtor's goods for an unliquidated amount, that amount being dependent upon a complicated account, the particulars of which are at all events partly in the possession of the creditor alone, in seems only common sense that the creditor cannot be justified in enforcing his demand, unless he has communicated to the debtor full information, and by full information, I mean, not merely the statement of the total amount claimed, but a detailed account, and a production of all papers in his possession necessary to enable the debtor to verify the account and satisfy himself that the sum claimed is justly due. I see no reason why this rule should not apply to the master of a vessel in his relation to the owners of the goods. Nor do I think that in the present case this duty was the less incumbent upon the master of the Norway, because Ashburner, as a representative of his firm, was aware of some of the advances made to the shipowner, and to be deducted from the freight. That was an accidental circumstance. Besides, the particulars of which Ashburner was in possession were neither complete nor undisputed. If, therefore, the master failed to furnish to the plt. the papers necessary to enable him to ascertain the extent of the debts' lien, and damage arose to the plt. therefrom, I shall hold that the master was guilty of "a breach of duty" within the terms of the 6th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, and also that, in consequence, the plt. cannot be prejudiced in this case from not having made a sufficient tender. For how could he make a sufficient tender if he had not the means of knowing as to its sufficiency. To use the words of Lord Denman in the case of Ashmole v. Wainwright, 2 Ad. & E. 843. "It is said that the plt. (who was the owner of the goods), ought to have tendered the proper charges; the answer is, that the debts. (who were the carriers) ought to have told him the proper charges. In the present case there is great conflict of testimony as to whether the papers were produced; and therefore the only course, after considering the probabilities of the case, is to determine on whom lies the burden of proof, and if the party on whom the burden lies leaves the case in doubt, the decision must be against him. In this case I deem it clear that the burden of proof lies upon the master, and the only result that the court can arrive at is, that it is not established to the satisfaction of the court that the master fulfilled his duty by producing the requisite information. On these two grounds then—first, that the master having made an excessive demand for freight, persisted in it, and refused to entertain the idea of reduction; and secondly, that he withheld from the plt. the papers necessary to show what was the amount of freight and general average due—I shall hold that the plt., if he did not make a sufficient legal tender, was not thereby disqualified from prosecuting his claim for damages for non-delivery of his cargo. As to the particular dock in which the cargo should have been discharged, Mr. Lush cited the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Act 1862, par. 3, which directs that if any wharf or warehouse is named in the charter-party or bill of lading, the shipowner shall land the goods at that wharf or warehouse, and argued that the bill of lading, in stating that the Norway was bound to Cowes for orders as per charter-party, rendered it incumbent upon the master to obey the orders of De Mattos to discharge the cargo at one of the three named closed docks. But, on reference to the charter, it appears that the orders there mentioned were orders to proceed to London, Liverpool, Bordeaux, &c.; that is, to specified ports, but not to any particular dock in those ports. This argument, therefore, I think cannot be maintained. Reference also was made by Mr. Lush to the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862, par. 4, which provides that the shipowner, in landing goods in virtue of that enactment, shall place them in or on some wharf or warehouse on or in which goods of a like nature are usually placed; and it was contended that the Canada wharf was not such a place as contemplated by the section. I think, however, that the evidence before me shows that rice is not unfrequently landed in the open as well as the closed docks. Mr. Lush then argued that, irrespective of any statutory obligation or any express contract, the master being bound to deliver to the owner of the goods was bound to deliver at the dock named by that owner. But on this point I think the law is correctly represented in the following observation of Mr. Parsons in his "Treatise on Maritime Law," vol. 1, p. 152: "The general rule applicable to carriers and other persons contracting to deliver goods, is, that a personal delivery is necessary. But this rule does not apply to the case of ships, the usages of trade having constituted a delivery on the wharf with notice to the consignee sufficient." The court would be reluctant in any way to diminish the responsibility of masters of vessels to attend to the instructions given to them by the owners of the goods on board those vessels; but in the present case, looking to the absence of any provision in the bill of lading that the goods should be delivered in any particular dock, to the difficulty and even danger of taking the Norway into the Stanley or Wapping dock, to the attempt of the master to take her into the Stanley dock, and lastly, to the fact that the goods might have been as well handled in the Canada dock as in one of the closed docks, I think that the plt. is not entitled to any damages for the discharge of the cargo in the Canada dock. As to the second point, the claim for damages for not separating the unsound from the sound rice, in the conflict of testimony I must conclude that the plt. has failed to prove that, in this respect, the cargo was improperly handled. As to the claim for damages for non-assortment, that the cargo was not assorted, and thereby its sale was prejudiced, is admitted. The question is, whether the deft. was bound to assort. Mr. Brett relied upon two statutes as constituting a valid defence. He cited the 35th section of the Mersey Docks Consolidation Act 1858: "The cargo of any vessel for any foreign or colonial port entering and using any open dock shall be received, weighed and loaded off by one set of porters only, who shall be in the employ and under the direction and orders of one of the master porters appointed by the board," as showing that the duty of the master porter was limited to receiving, weighing and loading off (which in this case was done), and that he is not bound to assort unless specially required and paid extra for the work. He cited also the evidence of Messrs. Taylor as going to the same effect. Mr. Brett also cited the 6th paragraph of the 67th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act: "If any goods are for the purpose of convenience in assorting the same landed at the wharf where the ship is discharged, and the owner of the goods has made an entry, and is ready and offers to take delivery thereof, and to convey the same to some other wharf or warehouse, such goods shall be assorted at landing, and shall, if demanded, be delivered to the owner thereof within twenty-four hours after assortment, and the expense of and consequent upon such landing and assortment shall be borne by the shipowner;" and his argument was, that entry by the owner of the goods, and an offer to make delivery, and to convey the goods to some other warehouse was a condition precedent to assortment, and that in this case the owner had not made an entry, and therefore that the duty to assort never arose. It is true that, as a fact, Ashburner did not make entry, but in my opinion the evidence establishes that this was occasioned by the wrongful act of the master. The master enforced his lien for an excessive sum, and at the same time withheld the papers necessary to enable the plt. to ascertain what was a sufficient tender. This being so, I must hold that the plt. having been wrongfully prevented by the master from making entry must, as regards the debts, be in as good a position as if he had actually made entry. The master had received express notice from the plt. to have the rice assorted, and, irrespective of that, he was bound to take as good care as a prudent owner would have taken, and it appears in evidence that it is the custom to assort Rangoon rice, and that the cargo was depreciated from not having been assorted. I think, therefore, that the plt. is entitled to damages for the non-assortment of his cargo. Then Mr. Brett contended that, even if the assortment of the cargo had been improperly omitted, the remedy of the owner of the goods would be against the master porter personally, and not against the shipowner. No doubt this would generally be the case, because usually the master porter is employed by the consignee of the cargo, but in the present instance the master porter was employed by the master of the vessel. I think, therefore, that the debts were bound to have assorted the cargo, and that whether the non-assortment arose from their neglect to give the order, or from the act of their agent in not doing it, they are equally responsible. The amount thus incurred by the damages will be estimated by the registrar and merchants. Lastly, the plt. claims damages for non-delivery of the rice. As in the result the market did not fall, and the sale consequently was not injured by postponement, the only way in which the plt. could be damaged by non-delivery is in loss of interest. He might have realised his cargo in December. As it was, he did not do so till April or May, and meantime his capital to the extent of the value of the cargo was locked up. It is for the loss of interest upon this principal for this period that the plt. claims damages, and I think the plt. is entitled to be recouped his loss. If, indeed, he might have saved part of this loss, and by culpable neglect did not do so, then, to the extent of the consequences of his neglect, he could not have recovered from the debts. But I think the plt. was not bound to avail himself of the means provided by the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (sect. 70-71), to obtain possession of his cargo, for that would have involved his depositing with the wharfinger the full sum claimed by the master, and this was an exorbitant sum. Such course was not imperative upon the plt. I shall therefore refer it to the registrar and merchants to estimate this interest. It will be convenient that I should sum up the results of this judgment. I shall endeavour to do full justice in the case, and to effect a complete adjustment of all outstanding claims against the parties. I am of opinion that in this case the master had a lien upon the cargo for freight and general average. The freight will be the sum contracted for by the charter-party (11,250*l.*), less the following deductions: first, the advances; secondly, the commission, interest and insurance; thirdly, the proportion of freight forfeited for breach of the guarantee; fourthly, the proportion of freight that would have been payable in respect of the cargo jettisoned, and in respect of that sold at the Mauritius, if they had been brought to their destination. I shall refer it to the registrar and merchants to take an account thereof, and to ascertain the net freight due on the principles stated in my judgment, taking into consideration the amount which has been paid on account of freight by the plt. during the progress of this cause, and the period at which it was paid. I shall also refer it to the registrar and merchants to ascertain the amount (if any) due from the owner of the cargo in respect of general average. I am also of opinion that the plt., under the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, is entitled to damages in respect of, first, the goods jettisoned; secondly, the goods sold at the Mauritius; thirdly, the non-assortment of the cargo at Liverpool; fourthly, the loss of interest occasioned by the wrongful withholding of the cargo. I shall direct the registrar, with the assistance of the merchants, to assess these damages, and having done so, to take an account between the parties, and ascertain the balance (if any) due, and to which of them. He will also report to the court as to whether interest is properly due on this balance, and for what period. The plt. must have the costs of this suit.

Bill of lading—Duty to carry on, tranship, or deliver—Reasonable time—Law of the flag—Lex loci contractus—Lex fori.

A bill of lading in English, of goods to be delivered in a French port, was given by the master of a French vessel lying in the port of New York. The vessel during her voyage suffered injury, and was compelled to put into an English port. The cost of repairs would have exceeded the value of the vessel, and the master therefore gave notice of abandonment, which the underwriters refused to accept, and litigation ensued, pending which the master was, by French law, unable to complete the act of abandonment. The cargo was discharged, warehoused, and various offers were made to the master as to payment of freight, and amongst them to deposit in a bank the whole sum claimed and sign the usual average bond; but the master insisted upon payment of the whole freight, without any deductions. The litigation in France having ended:

Held, in a suit brought immediately afterwards by the assignee of the bill of lading (an English subject) against the master for breach of contract and breach of duty,

That the law of the vessel's flag governed the contract, and that, therefore, the duty of the master to carry on or tranship the goods, or to deliver them at an intermediate port, must be ascertained by reference to the law of France;

That the master was entitled to a reasonable time within which to carry on or tranship the goods, and that until that time had elapsed he could not be called upon to deliver, except upon payment of full freight;

That the delay occasioned by the litigation in France must be considered as reasonable;

That the offer to pay into a bank the whole freight was not equivalent to an offer to pay the freight;

And that, under the circumstances, the master had not been guilty of a breach of duty or contract.

Messrs. Dumas, Hankey and Co., of Fenchurch-street, merchants, as assignees of the bill of lading of the cargo of the Bahia, sued the vessel and her master for breach of duty within the provisions of the 5th section of the Admiralty Court Act 1861. While the Bahia, a French barque, was lying in the port of New York in Nov. 1863, the master, on the 5th of that month, signed the usual bills of lading to carry a cargo of corn or Indian maize from New York to Dunkirk, in France. The Bahia having in the course of the voyage suffered damage, put into Ramsgate for repairs, the costs of which it was found would exceed the value of the vessel. The master accordingly proceeded to execute, according to the French law, an act of abandonment to the underwriters in France, with whom the vessel had been insured. The underwriters refused to accept the abandonment, and considerable litigation took place in France, pending which the master was unable to obtain a certificate of innavigability, so as to complete the act of abandonment, and without doing so or cancelling the act of abandonment he had by the law of France, as was alleged, no power or control over the ship. The cargo having been taken out of the ship and warehoused, various offers were made by the plt. to the deft. for the purpose of obtaining the cargo, the plt. offering to pay "the whole freight from New York to Dunkirk as regulated by the considerations mentioned in the charter-party, less the cost of transport from Ramsgate to Dunkirk." The deft., however, insisted upon immediate payment of the whole freight without any deductions, and a further offer was made on behalf of the plt. to deposit in a bank the whole sum claimed, and to sign the usual average bond. This offer was also declined by the deft., and thereupon the present suit was brought for damages by reason of breach of contract and breach of duty in neither carrying on the cargo by transhipment or re-shipment, nor delivering it to the plt. upon the terms proposed by them.

Sir G. E. Honyman and Clarkson appeared for the plt.

Brett, Q.C. and V. Lushington for the deft.

The arguments of counsel were directed to the following questions:—First, as to what law was applicable to the case, whether the law of England, France, or New York; secondly, as to what was the effect of each of these laws under the circumstances of the case. These arguments will be found set forth in the judgment.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Great part of the argument was upon the question as to which country furnished the law for regulating the obligation of the master to the plt. under the actual circumstances. This point I will proceed to consider, though I am doubtful whether this will prove to be necessary for the decision of the case. First, then, this cannot properly be called a question of construction, for there is little or no dispute as to the meaning of the terms of the bill of lading. The question rather may thus be stated generally: given an agreement between two parties, what is the law that was actually contemplated, or what is taken to have been contemplated by them as the law governing the

THE BAHIA.

ing what mutual obligations not expressed should be implied. Judged by this test alone, the British law would not, I think, be applicable, for neither of the parties to this contract, which was evidenced by the bill of lading, contemplated the application of the British law. Neither of the parties was a British subject, nor was the port where the contract was made a British port, nor was it intended that the vessel should go into a British port. If, then, British law is applicable, it must be that it was brought in by after circumstances, irrespective of the original contract. As to this, it was said that though the shippers were American, the indorsees of the bill of lading were British subjects. But this was a mere accident, and may be disregarded. Then it was said that the place where the alleged wrong was committed by the master was a British port, and that the lex fori which has to adjudicate upon this alleged wrong is British law. Now there is no doubt that, in the case of a foreign ship coming from distress of weather within local British jurisdiction, both ship and cargo are in many respects subject to British law. They would be so, e. g. in respect of pilot dues, port dues, quarantine regulations and other matters of that description, and also as to many particular enactments which, by the law of the land, are expressly applicable to ships in general; but it does not, therefore, follow that the terms of a contract of affreightment of the cargo should be governed by English law. For were this the rule, then, if a British ship were found in a French port, her owners would have to submit to French law, and all charter-parties and bills of lading would be governed accordingly. Save, therefore, so far as the lex loci is applicable, ratione loci or ratione fori, I cannot hold that British law is applicable to this case, and I think that a British court having to adjudicate with respect to the contract, should adopt the foreign law which had from the beginning been contemplated as binding between the contracting parties. In the present case this must be either the French law or the New York law; for it was not contended that the law of St. Thomas, where the charter was made, governed the contract between the master and the shipper. Which then of these two laws ought to prevail? The facts on which reliance is placed in order to prove the New York law to be applicable, are, that the bill of lading was made at New York, and in English—that is the language of New York—and in terms not unusual in American contracts of affreightment. On the other hand, the circumstances in favour of the applicability of the French law are, that the vessel was a French vessel, owned by a resident in France, and that the contract was to be finally executed in France, for the port of destination was Dunkirk. Now, if the court were to pronounce in favour of the law of New York, as the lex loci contractus, the practical effect would be that a master of a ship touching at ports of different countries, and taking goods from thence, would, on his arrival at any intermediate port, or at the port of destination, find himself and his ship subject at the same time to the different laws of several foreign countries, a result nothing short of confusion. Again, it is to be remembered that the master was but an agent acting for an absent principal, that principal being a domiciled native of France. If, therefore, the law of the flag of the vessel be adopted, but not otherwise, the shipowner would be able to measure beforehand the character of his duties and liabilities as a carrier, and all the contracts of the same nature entered into by his agent abroad would be regulated by a uniform principle. Nor would the shipper have any reason to complain, for the flag of the vessel would be sufficient notice to him of the law by which his contract of affreightment, if he chose to enter into one, would be governed. The Bahia, being a French vessel, I incline to consider that, so far from inserting by implication into this bill of lading any agreement to accept the law of New York as to the mutual rights of masters and consignees of cargo as to transshipment, &c., the master had no authority to bind the shipowner to accept the law of New York, and that the shipper must be taken to have known beforehand that, if circumstances like the present should arise, the dispute would have to be settled by the French law. I should add that, if I were to decide this case by the law of the State of New York, I could not hastily come to the conclusion that it was the same as that of England without some direct proof. However, although my opinion is strongly in favour of the applicability of the French law exclusively, I think it will be more satisfactory if I consider, not only what would be the results according to French law, but what would be the results according to New York law, supposing that to be the same as British law. The laws of both countries, France and England, as to contracts of affreightment, however they may differ in particulars, have one object—to secure to each party the full benefit of the contract, so far as it is not unfair to the other. Suppose, then, a ship, through injuries occasioned by perils of the seas, is forced during her voyage to put into any intermediate port, it would be unjust to the owner of the goods that his goods should be detained there an indefinite time; but, on the other hand, it would be unjust to the master that he should forthwith be prevented from earning his freight. The question is, within what limits of time, or other conditions, the laws of the two countries allow to the master the option of repairing and carrying on, or transshipping or delivering. First, then, as to the French law. The materials on which the court has to found its judgment are the articles in the Code de Commerce; secondly, the opinions of French lawyers which have been produced in evidence; and thirdly, the decrees of the French courts in this particular case. As to these last, it is perfectly true that the judgments of the Tribunal of Commerce at Marseilles, the Imperial Court of Aix, and the Court of Cassation, all given in the action between the underwriters and the shipowner, may not be binding upon the plts., who are owners of the cargo, and were not parties. But it is not to be forgotten that the plts. would have been allowed to intervene, and had notice of this liberty in M. Bonnefoi's letter to them of the 4th March. So, too, it is true that the judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce at Dunkirk, though given between the parties, is not absolutely conclusive in the present case, for it is conceivable that, in an action for freight, the shipowner may be entitled to full freight, and yet that a cross-action may lie against him by the owner of the goods for damages. I apprehend, however, that the declarations of the French tribunals in each of these several judgments are admissible as evidence to show what the French law is. By the French law, in the event of the ship being forced to put into an intermediate port from injuries received, there is, in the first place, no absolute obligation upon the master to reship and carry on. That, indeed, is often impossible; the ship may have been lost, or have received irreparable injuries. Secondly, there is no absolute obligation to tranship; the obligation arises only in the event of the ship having been declared unnavigable by competent authority: (Code, art. 296, 390, 391.) Thirdly, there is no unconditional obligation to deliver. The master may, if he think proper, insist on delivering, and then he is entitled to freight pro rata itineris: (Code, art. 296.) In the present case, the master did offer to deliver, but only on terms of receiving full freight, without even any deduction for freight already paid in advance.

THE BAHIA.

This clearly was a demand for more than the master was entitled to, as was admitted at the bar. On the other hand, the French law gives delivery to the owner of the goods, if he thinks proper to demand it, but in that case requires him to pay the full freight due: (Code, art. 293, 296.) This entire freight the plts. never offered to pay; they only offered to deposit it with a bank. No French authority was produced to show that an offer to deposit is equivalent to a tender of payment, so as to entitle the owner of the cargo to delivery. The plts., however, did also make an offer of payment, but that, so far from being an offer to pay the whole freight less the advances, was not even an offer to pay freight pro ratâ itineris; it was an offer to pay the whole freight less the expenses of carrying on the cargo from Ramsgate to Dunkirk. A pro ratâ freight is quite a different thing, being calculated upon the distance actually accomplished of the whole voyage, and independent of the consideration of the expense required to complete the remainder. The plts., therefore, were by French law never entitled to delivery. It is true that the master made an exorbitant demand, but of this the plts. cannot complain, if they were never willing to pay what was legally due from them. The plts. had in their possession all the knowledge necessary to enable them to ascertain what was the amount of freight due. The negotiations for delivery having thus failed, the master had still the option either to repair and carry on, or to tranship. The plts. contended that the master did decline either to carry on or to tranship. But I think this is not proved by the evidence. It is true that the deft. never offered to tranship; but the question of transhipment never arose; it could not in fact arise while the question of abandonment was still in abeyance; and beyond all doubt it was in abeyance. The master indeed was desirous to abandon, and had executed a deed of abandonment; but this was ineffectual until he had obtained a certificate of unnavigability from the authorities. For this certificate he applied, but was prevented from obtaining it by the action of the underwriters in the French courts. Indeed, so far was the master from having finally abandoned his vessel, that if the Dunkirk surveyors had reported unfavourably to the right of abandonment, it is fair to conclude he would have had the vessel repaired. The fact was, the question of abandonment was a question, to use the French phrase, "awaiting solution;" and, till it was settled, the master could neither abandon nor tranship. Then I think it clear that the French law will allow the master a reasonable time to determine whether he will carry on, and, in the event of his determining not to carry on, a further reasonable time whether he will tranship or deliver. The only question is, whether the delay required to settle the litigation in France between the shipowner and the underwriters can be considered a reasonable delay as between the master and owners of cargo. A consideration of the 296th article of the Code, of the opinions of the French lawyers given in evidence, and of the judgment of the Tribunal of Commerce at Dunkirk, leads me to the conclusion that, according to French law, the plts., as owners of cargo, were bound to await the solution of the question pending between the shipowner and his underwriters. This may seem hard upon the plts., seeing that the litigation did not finally close until the judgment of the Court of Cassation on the 22nd March 1864—after the lapse, that is, of more than a year from the date of the vessel putting into Ramsgate, and that this final judgment, like its precursors in the inferior tribunals, was against the shipowner, and is conclusive that the shipowner was, by French law, not justified against the underwriters in resisting their application. But as against this must be set several considerations: first, that the plts. are estopped from denying the right of the deft. to resist, at all events in the first instance, the application of the underwriters, inasmuch as the plts. have admitted the accuracy of the Ramsgate surveys, showing that the repairs of the vessel would exceed her value; secondly, that though the final sentence by the Court of Cassation was not delivered for fourteen months, the date of the first sentence in the Marseilles court was on the 4th March 1863, a little more than a month after the date of the Ramsgate survey, and that the sentence being "exécutoire sans appel," might have been enforced immediately, and by the plts. themselves, to whom liberty to intervene was expressly reserved; thirdly, that on the 14th March 1863, the plts. arrested the vessel and took possession of the cargo partly on the 23rd March and partly in the following month of April. These acts of the plts. reduce the total delay to a few weeks only, and during this period, assuming that the surveys were right as admitted by the plts., the deft. was not idle; he sought to abandon the vessel; he exerted himself to procure the certificate of unnavigability, and, with this view, resisted the application of the underwriters to have the vessel removed to Dunkirk. Under these circumstances I must hold, that if the case be judged by French law, the plts. are not entitled to recover from the deft. But, in holding this, I do not decide that the master of a vessel would not be answerable to owners of goods for a long and unreasonable delay caused by a litigation improperly carried on by himself with his underwriters. But that is not the present case. Now, as to the law of the State of New York, assuming it to be the same as the English law, it will be found in many important respects to coincide with the French law. The chief authorities on the subject are collected in Mr. Brett's argument, in the case of Blasco v. Fletcher, 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 169; 14 C. B., N. S., 147, to which the court is much indebted. The result may be stated as follows:—First, there is and can be no absolute obligation on the part of the master towards the owner of the goods to forward them in the original vessel, although of course it is the duty of the master in his capacity of agent to the shipowner to do so if he can: (Benson v. Chapman, 2 H. of L. Cas. 720.) Secondly, it has never yet been decided that the master in any case is bound to tranship; all that has been decided is, he is at liberty to tranship: (The Hamburg, 32 L. J. 162, Adm.; 8 L. T. Rep. 175, and cases there cited.) Thirdly, there is no absolute obligation to deliver at the intermediate port unless full freight be paid; and in the present case, as I have previously stated, full freight has never been offered by the plts.: (Tyndall v. Taylor, 4 El. & Bl. 227.) The only exception to this rule is, where the master declines either to carry on or to tranship—in short, abandons his contract altogether; in that case the consignee is entitled to his goods, without payment of any freight at all: (Hunter v. Prinsep, 10 East, 394.) In the present instance, I have already held, that the deft. did not decline either to carry on or to tranship. Indeed, supposing the deft. to have declined to carry on, the court could not, without positive evidence of the fact (which is here wanting), conclude that the deft. had declined to tranship; because, looking to his own interest, he would have preferred to tranship from Ramsgate to Dunkirk rather than pay the penalty under British law of forfeiting the whole of his freight. Fourthly, British law, like the French law, allows to the master a reasonable time within which he may exercise his option: (Cargo ex Galam, 3 N. R. 257.) And by "reasonable," I think must be meant that which, all circumstances being considered, is reasonable, and amongst these circumstances would be the vis major of the decree of a judicial committee: (Hodley v.

Priv. Co.]

THE FUSILIER.

[Priv. Co.]

Clarke, 8 T. R. 259.) Nor does it make any difference that the tribunal was a French one. Because it is for the British law to determine the rights of the owner of the goods against the master (as, for the purpose of the argument, I am now assuming), that is no reason that the British law should overlook the fact that the relations of the shipowner, the master and the underwriters were all governed by the French law; and the consequences of that fact, viz., that the master could not abandon or sell the vessel without having obtained a formal certificate of un navigability, and that if the shipowner intended to insist on abandonment it was necessary for him to oppose the application of the underwriters. In short, in estimating what is a reasonable delay, the British law would practically take into consideration the same circumstances as the French law would. And I have already held that by the French law, as it appears to me, the plts. are not in a position to complain of a delay so far as it was occasioned by French litigation. The claim of the plts. then fails equally whether tried by the French law or by New York law, and I must pronounce against it with costs.

THE FUSILIER.

Salvage of life—Liability of owners of cargo—Reasonable amount—Ratio to value of ship.

The owners of the cargo of a vessel, to which salvage services have been rendered, are liable to contribute to that portion of the claim of the salvors which arises from saving the lives of the passengers on board the vessel.

In such cases the first consideration is, the value of the services with reference to the amount of property rescued from peril; and the next is, how far the merit of these services is enhanced by the risk to life or property which has been involved in them.

In salvage services for the saving of life, passengers stand on the same footing as the crew, for they are equally "persons belonging to such ship."

The benefit to property is not the criterion of liability to the payment of life salvage.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Court of Admiralty.

A cause of salvage was promoted by the owners and crews of certain steam-tugs against the ship Fusilier, and the cargo and freight, in the circumstances stated below.

The owners of the ship and of the cargo entered separate appearances. The value of the ship, freight and cargo was: ship, 2500*l.*; freight, 2581*l.*; cargo, 52,000*l.* It was argued in the court below that neither ship, freight, nor cargo was liable. The learned Judge of the Court of Admiralty decreed that a sum of 2200*l.* should be paid for salvage services, and apportioned that sum among the salvors: (see 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 699.) The owners of cargo appealed against that decree.

Cur. adv. vult.

Lord CHELMSFORD. — The principal question raised upon this appeal is, whether by the 458th and 459th sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the owners of the cargo of a vessel to which salvage services have been rendered are liable to contribute to that portion of the claim of the salvors which arises from the saving the lives of the passengers on board the vessel. There was another subordinate question as to the amount of salvage awarded to some of the salvors, which will require a short notice. It is unnecessary to state the facts of the case, which were all agreed to on both sides. The apps., the owners of the cargo on board the Fusilier, the vessel salvaged, admitted that owners, masters and crews of the different vessels to whom salvage was awarded were entitled to remuneration for their services. The value of the ship was 2500*l.*; of the freight, 2581*l.* 17*s.* 8*d.*, and of the cargo, 52,000*l.* The learned judge of the Court of Admiralty pronounced the sum of 2200*l.* to be due to the salvors for the salvage services rendered by them to the vessel Fusilier and her cargo, and for their services in saving the lives of the passengers on board the said vessel, namely, to the masters, owners and crew of the steam-tug Aid, the sum of 700*l.*; to the master, owners and crew of the life-boat Northumberland, the sum of 700*l.*; and to the masters, owners and crews of the luggers, Champion and Lotus, the sum of 800*l.*, together with costs." The services rendered by the luggers were these: On the 3rd Dec. 1863, the Fusilier was aground on the Girdler Sand. The steam-tug the Aid, and the life-boat Northumberland, had been rendering assistance, and had succeeded in taking all the passengers out of the Fusilier and placing them in safety on board the Aid, to be conveyed to Ramsgate. The Aid received an order from the Fusilier to bring an anchor and chain from Ramsgate to be used in getting her off the sand. The weight of the anchor and chain procured for this purpose was found to be too great for the Aid, and it was necessary to employ the two luggers, the Champion and the Lotus, to carry them off to the Fusilier. These vessels anchored near to the Fusilier at midnight of the 4th Dec., and remained by her the whole night. On the following day unsuccessful attempts were made to tow the Fusilier off the sands. In the course of the afternoon of the 5th Dec. the gale, which had been blowing from the westward, changed to the southward, thereby lessening the chance of the Fusilier being got off the sand, and the luggers were ordered to proceed to the Nore and remain there till the weather moderated. They remained at the Nore from the 6th to the 10th Dec.; then, according to instructions, they returned to the Fusilier, which not being sufficiently light to float, although part of her cargo had been removed, they were ordered back to the Nore, still with the anchor and chain on board, and the Fusilier having been got off the sand on the 11th Dec., they followed her to the Blackwall Docks, and finally arrived at Ramsgate on the 14th Dec. The app. objected that the amount of 800*l.* awarded to the Champion and the Lotus for their services was excessive, and urged, as proof of the excess, that it exceeded the value of the two vessels. Their Lordships would always be slow to disturb an award of salvage by the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty, on the ground of his having given too large a sum to the salvors, unless they were satisfied beyond all doubt that he had made an exorbitant estimate of their services. The accident of salvage exceeding the value of the vessels is wholly immaterial. Undoubtedly the placing valuable property in peril may enhance the merit of salvage services, but it does not follow, on the contrary, that the trifling character of the property endangered will necessarily detract from the value of such services. It was not quite correctly said in argument at the bar, that what is risked is the first thing to be regarded, and the next the services which are rendered. It would have been more accurate to have reversed the order of these considerations, and to have said that the first thing to be regarded is the value of the services with reference to the amount of property rescued from peril; and the next, how far the merit of these services is enhanced by the risk to life or property which has been involved in them. Taking the grounds of claim to salvage in this order, it is obvious that it never can be an argument against the amount awarded to the salvors, that it exceeds the value of their property put in peril by the services. And even if such an argument could ever be urged, it hardly belongs to the apps. in this case. No complaint was made by them of the total amount of salvage awarded to the salvors in one entire sum of 2200*l*. It is only in the distribution of this sum amongst the different classes of salvors that there is any opening for their objection. Now the award of salvage is not of such a sum to one set of salvors, and such a sum to another, making a total of 2200*l*., but of that sum as the whole value of the salvage services which is afterwards apportioned amongst them according to their respective merits. The amount allotted to the Champion and the Lotus might be made the subject of dispute by the owners and crew of the other vessel, but it can hardly be objected to by the apps., who have never once suggested that, taking into account the value of the property rescued from peril, and the number of lives saved, the sum of 2200*l*. was too great a reward for the whole of the services rendered. There is, therefore, no valid objection to the decree upon this ground. The principal question in the case is one of great importance, and of some difficulty. Prior to the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the Court of Admiralty, in a cause of salvage where no property had been rescued from peril, but where life had been saved, had no power to award anything to the salvors. But where both property and life had been saved, it was the well-established practice of the court to increase the amount of salvage, and thus indirectly remunerate the salvors for the merit due to their having saved life as well as property. Of course, as the salvage was awarded in one entire sum, the owners of the cargo as well as of the ship and freight contributed their proportion to the payment of this increased salvage, and so in a certain sense were rendered liable to the payment of what is called life salvage. Before the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the Legislature had provided for the payment of a reward or compensation by way of salvage for the saving of the life of any person on board a ship or vessel in distress, by the 19th and 21st sections of the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 99, "An Act for consolidating and amending the laws relating to wreck and salvage." The provisions of these sections are substantially re-enacted in the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and therefore need not be further noticed. In construing the 458th and 459th sections of the Act, on which the principal question arises, the recognised practice of the Court of Admiralty of indirectly rewarding salvors for the saving of human life by giving an increased rate of salvage on that account must always be borne in mind. The Legislature, in dealing with the subject of life salvage, must be taken to have been aware of this practice, and to have intended to confer upon the Court of Admiralty a power of doing that directly which they had been so long in the habit of doing indirectly. And it must also be remembered that, by the established practice of the court, the owners of cargo were always rendered virtually contributory to the reward and compensation given to salvors for the preservation of life. Under these circumstances the provisions in the sections in question were introduced. The 458th section is in these terms, "Whenever any ship or boat is stranded or otherwise in distress on the shore of any sea or tidal waters situate within the limits of the United Kingdom, and services are rendered by any person: first, in assisting such ship or boat; secondly, in saving the lives of the persons belonging to such ship or boat; thirdly, in saving the cargo or apparel of such ship or boat, or any portion thereof; and whenever any wreck is saved by any person other than a receiver within the United Kingdom, there shall be payable by the owners of such ship or boat, cargo, apparel, or wreck, to the person by whom such services or any of them are rendered, or by whom such wreck is saved, a reasonable amount of salvage, together with all expenses properly incurred by him in the performance of such services or the saving of such wreck, the amount of such salvage (which expenses are hereafter included under the term salvage) to be determined in case of dispute in manner hereinafter mentioned. It is, perhaps, hardly necessary to advert to a point which was raised in the Court of Admiralty, but barely mentioned here, and certainly not insisted upon, that the persons saved being passengers on board the Fusilier were not in terms of the Act "persons belonging to such ship." It would be strange, indeed, if an Act intended to encourage and reward the saving of life which is in peril in consequence of the distress and danger of the vessel in which it is embarked, should be construed so as to make a distinction between those who are on board in different capacities and different relations to the vessel. It is a sufficient answer to such an objection to say that nothing is more common in popular language than to speak of the "passengers belonging to such vessel." The salvors, therefore, are entitled to a reasonable amount of salvage for the services rendered in saving lives of the passengers on board the Fusilier, and the only question to be considered is, whether the owners of the cargo are liable to contribute towards its payment? The general rule as to the parties liable for salvage is, that the property actually benefited is alone chargeable with the salvage recovered. But this rule is inapplicable in the case of life salvage, because it is difficult to imagine a case where the saving of the lives, either of the crew or of the passengers of a vessel in distress would be of any benefit, either to the vessel or to the cargo. The Legislature, therefore, could not have intended that the benefit to property should be the criterion of liability to the payment of life salvage. All that seems to have been contemplated is, that the salvage should be included in the entire sum payable for salvage of ship and cargo, a distinct reward for the preservation of human life. It was argued on behalf of the apps., that when the 458th section, describing the services to be rendered in assisting the ship or boat, in saving the lives of the persons belonging to the ship or boat, and in saving the cargo or apparel of the ship, goes on to say, "there shall be payable by the owners of such ship or cargo, or apparel, or wreck, a reasonable amount of salvage, the words must be read reddenda singulis. But, although this might very well be if the section had confined the claim to the saving of the ship and cargo and apparel, then each species of property benefited would be

GAUN V. FREE FISHERS OF WHITSTABLE.

have been chargeable; yet where, amongst the other subjects of claim, the saving of human life is included, there is no reason why that should be referred to the ship any more than to the cargo, since the one derives no more benefit than the other from the services rendered. The Legislature seems merely to have had in view the rewarding at a higher rate persons whose services were more meritorious from having rescued human life as well as property from peril, and almost to have assumed that the liability to the salvage would attach without any distinction upon all the owners of property exposed to the common danger. And as the salvage is always awarded in a gross sum, and under this section is to be increased by the reward for the saving of life, the owners of cargo since the Act are liable exactly to the same extent as before, with this immaterial difference, that there now is a distinct and express item of claim to increase the amount of salvage to which they are contributory, instead of the whole being estimated on a higher scale. But it is said that the 459th section of the Act shows that it must have been intended by the Legislature that the owners of the ship should alone be liable to the payment of life salvage, for it enacts that "salvage in respect to the preservation of the life or lives of any person belonging to any such ship or boat shall be payable by the owners of the ship or boat in priority to all other claims for salvage, and in cases where such ship or boat is destroyed, or where the value thereof is insufficient, after payment of the actual expenses incurred, to pay the amount of salvage due in respect of any life or lives, the Board of Trade may in its discretion award to the salvors of such life or lives out of the Admiralty Marine Fund such sum or sums as it deems fit, in whole or part satisfaction of any amount of salvage so left unpaid in respect of such life or lives." There is no doubt that this section causes some difficulty as to whether the Legislature intended that life salvage should be payable by any other persons than the owners of the ship; but if such was the intention it would have been easy to have expressed it, and the language of the section is capable of the construction that it merely fixes the limits of the shipowners' liability, and does not mean to render him solely liable to the payment of this description of salvage. And whatever doubt may be thrown upon the subject by this section, there are two subsequent sections of the Act, the 460th and 469th, which appear to be susceptible of the other interpretation than that the owners of cargo were intended to bear a proportion of the payment for life salvage. The 460th section enacts, that whenever any salvage is due to any person under this Act, the receiver shall act as follows, that is to say: If the same is due in respect of services rendered in assisting any ship or boat, or in saving the lives of persons belonging to the same, or the cargo or apparel thereof, he shall detain such ship or boat, and the cargo and apparel belonging thereto, until payment is made or process is been issued by some competent court for the detention of such ship, boat, cargo, or apparel. It is expressly provided that, in the case of cargo being due for services rendered in saving the lives of persons belonging to the ship, the cargo is to be detained. And it is not intended that it is merely held as additional security with the payment of the salvage, for the 469th section enacts that whenever any ship, boat, cargo, apparel, or sums so due as aforesaid (that is, sums due for services rendered "in saving the lives of persons belonging to the ship"), the receiver may sell such ship, boat, cargo, wreck, and out of the proceeds of the sale, all sums of money due in respect of salvage. Whatever difficulty, therefore, may be supposed to be created by the 469th section, it seems impossible to read the two last-mentioned sections without being satisfied that they proceed upon the ground of the owners of cargo being liable to the payment of life salvage. The object of the Legislature in different sections referred to seems to have been to give a legislative sanction to the practice of the Court of Admiralty of indirectly rewarding salvors for the preservation of human life by allowing the value of their services to be made the subject of a distinct estimate, but without intending to fix the responsibility of payment upon one class of owners of property involved in the common peril more than on another. Their Lordships, after much consideration, have arrived at the same conclusion with the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty, and they will therefore humbly recommend to Her Majesty that the decree appealed from be affirmed, and that the appeal be dismissed with costs.

Decree affirmed.

GAUN V. FREE FISHERS OF WHITSTABLE.

Fishery—Grant by Crown—Sea-shore—Right of navigation—Ancient grant—Anchorage tolls—Immemorial user.

The bed of all navigable rivers and of estuaries is vested in the Crown; but this ownership of the Crown is for the benefit of the subject, and is subordinate to the paramount right of the subject to free navigation, and the right to anchor is a necessary part of the right of navigation. The grantee of the Crown takes the soil, subject to the same public right of navigation. Where, therefore, a subject claims anchorage tolls in respect of ships, it is not enough to prove a grant of the soil and immemorial user, for such a claim can only be sustained by proving that some consideration was given for the right to levy tolls, or a corresponding advantage to the public, such as the right of haven.

Where the proprietors of an oyster fishery claimed to levy tolls on all ships anchoring within the limits of their fishery, and proved immemorial user:

Held (reversing the judgment of the Ex. Ch.), that such a claim could not be sustained without proof of a consideration given.

Seemingly, the bed of the sea, to the extent of three miles from the shore, is not vested in the Crown, but merely the part lying between high and low water mark, the three miles limit being adopted by a conventional rule of international law: (per Lord Chelmsford.)

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Ex. Ch. affirming a judgment of the C. P.

The action, brought by the Company of Free Fishers and Dredgers of Whitstable, in the county of Kent, was indebitatus assumpsit for the anchorage, groundage and other toll and charges for and in respect of divers vessels before then brought and anchored by the deft. William Gaun, and then being in, upon, and over certain ground and soil of the pita.

Pita, never indebted.

At the trial, which took place before Erie, C. J., at Maidstone, on 12th March 1861, the jury found a verdict for the pita., the learned judge holding, that under the circumstances the claim for anchorage was valid, but reserving leave to move for a new trial. On this motion a rule nisi was granted, which the Court of C. P. discharged (11 C. B., N. S., 387). Thereupon the deft. appealed to the Ex. Ch., which affirmed the judgment of the C. P., (9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 263). The deft. then appealed to the H. of L.

Prentice and White, for the app., contended for the following propositions:—1. That the soil of the sea where the app.'s vessel was anchored, being below low-water mark, was vested by law in the Crown, and could not be held by a subject. 2. That the Crown holds the soil of the sea as trustee to the public, and could only grant such soil to a subject subservient to the public rights. 3. That the finding of the jury did not affect the case, as if any charter was ever granted by the Crown affecting to grant a right to take toll for anchoring on the high seas, such charter would be void, and a grant of such charter could not be presumed. 4. That the public have the right to navigate the high seas without any exaction or toll being made or imposed upon them, and the Crown had no power to impose any toll on the public for passing or anchoring on the high seas without the authority of Parliament, unless the public had a quid pro quo.

Cur. adv. vult.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, in consequence of some uncertainty in the statements of the special case, it was admitted by the app. at the bar of the House that the payment demanded by the resps. had been made to the lords of the manor of Whitstable from time immemorial, and that the vessel of the app. cast anchor within the limits of the oyster bed or fishery claimed by the resps. The case appears to me to depend on principles which have long been settled. The bed of all navigable rivers where the tide flows and re-flows, and of all estuaries or arms of the sea, is by law vested in the Crown; but this ownership of the Crown is for the benefit of the subject, and cannot be used in any manner so as to derogate from, or interfere with, the right of navigation, which belongs by law to the subjects of the realm. The right to anchor is a necessary part of the right of navigation, because it is essential for the full enjoyment of that right. If the Crown, therefore, grants part of the bed or soil of an estuary or navigable river, the grantee takes subject to the public right; and he cannot in respect of his ownership of the soil make any claim or demand, even if it be expressly granted to him, which in any way interferes with the enjoyment of the public right. The resps. claim to be entitled by Royal grant to a portion of the bed or soil (below low-water mark) of the arm of the sea which forms the estuary of the Thames, opposite to the manor of Whitstable, in the open sea, a sea way being the high road for the passage of vessels; and they claim a sum of one shilling for every vessel that cast anchor within the precincts of that part of the bed or soil which is claimed by them. But this claim interferes with the free enjoyment of the right of navigation, subject to which the original grant must be taken to have been made, and cannot be supported on the ground of ownership of the soil. If the payment be claimed as an ancient anchorage due, some facts must be shown which either prove, or from which it can be inferred, that the soil claimed by the resps. was originally within the precincts of a port or harbour, or that some service or aid to navigation was rendered to the public in respect of which the alleged grant was made; but nothing of the kind appears, and no such case can be presumed or inferred from the mere fact of an immemorial payment. No such case is made by the resps., and the payment is demanded merely on the ground of its having been immemorially made to the lords of the manor of Whitstable and their assigns in respect of the ownership of the site—an ancient oyster fishery now vested in the resps. Anterior to Magna Charta, by which such grants were prohibited, a several fishery in an arm of the sea or navigable river might have been granted by the Crown to a subject. The present fishery of the resps. must be taken to have been so granted; and the grant might include a portion of the soil for the purpose of the fishery. But this, like every other grant whenever made, must have been subject to the public right of navigation; and I cannot suppose that the establishment of oyster-beds for the private emolument of the proprietors could be regarded by the law as an equivalent to the public for the imposition of this tax (at its commencement no inconsiderable) on the right of navigation. Speaking with great respect to the learned judges in the court below, it appears to me that the error of the judgments consists in not adhering to the clear principle that the grant by the Crown of any part of the bed or soil of this estuary below low-water mark, whether for a fishery or not, must by the common law have been subject to the public right of navigation, of which the right to anchor is an essential part; that no property can be claimed in the soil except subject to this overriding right, and that there is no fact or circumstance to warrant a presumption that any corresponding benefit was given to the public in return for the imposition of this anchorage due. It is not suggested on either side that any further facts remain to be ascertained and I see no utility, therefore, in directing a new trial. I shall therefore humbly move your Lordships that the judgment of the court below be reversed.

Lord WENSLEYDALE.—My Lords, from the loose and unsatisfactory manner in which this case has been stated, I think that your Lordships will find some difficulty in giving a satisfactory opinion upon some of the questions proposed to be raised. Speaking for myself I must say that I should wish a further inquiry to take place, and should therefore have advised to direct a new trial between the parties but having heard what my noble and learned friend the L. C. has said upon that subject, and being acquainted also in some degree with the opinion of my noble and learned friend opposite, I do not mean to persist in that, although my own notion is that it is consistent with the statement made upon the record that some real legal ground might be found for the establishment of the right of anchorage and therefore, so far as I am concerned, I would rather that the case should undergo further investigation. I perfectly agree that, from long enjoyment of a privilege in this case of demanding a payment of anchorage for a period of ninety years from 1775 to 1864, every reasonable presumption

GANN v. FREE FISHERS OF WHITSTABLE.

may be made that it has continued from time immemorial, but where the privilege requires more than immemorial enjoyment in order to be legal and valid some facts must exist besides mere long enjoyment; there must be some proof of these facts. Now to make a grant of anchorage in an arm of the sea where the fundus maris is the property of the Crown, but where every subject of the Crown has a right to navigate and cast anchor when and where he thinks fit as a necessary means of safe navigation, he cannot be deprived of that right by an usage, however long, unless there is some evidence of a sufficient consideration, of some advantage to the subject to enable the Crown to confer upon a particular individual the privilege of receiving compensation from the subject, and thus depriving the subject of his undoubted right. On this record it appears to me there is not sufficient evidence of any such facts. It is much to be regretted that the great inconvenience of the technicalities of a bill of exceptions or special verdicts, being now in many cases done away with, and a statement of facts allowed on rules to show cause instead, that somewhat more pains and care should not be taken to state all that is really material. I think that this case is wanting in this respect. Here is no proof, I think, except the enjoyment of anchorage for rather less than ninety years. The case is extremely defectively stated on both sides. Upon the case, as found, some matters are very clear. The manor of Whitstable existed before the statute of Quia Emptores, 18 Edw. 4, c. 15, and there was an immemorial company of oyster dredgers there, who had established before time of legal memory, and before the statute of Magna Charta, an oyster fishery on the sea-shore of Whitstable within the limits of that fishery as claimed by that company, but not occupied by oysters. The deft.'s vessel cast anchor. Whether the place in which the anchor was cast was actually within the limits to which the company were really entitled, and whether the anchor was cast because the vessel was in danger, or without absolute necessity, and purely voluntarily, is not stated. A claim for anchorage of 1s. had been paid regularly since 1775 for anchoring within that portion of the manor in which the deft.'s vessel had cast anchor, and that was claimed to be taken as a customary payment for the use of the soil. In 1791 the manor of Whitstable and the fishery of Whitstable, being a royalty of fishery or oyster dredging within the said manor, were conveyed to Edward Foord and James Smith in equal moieties, as tenants in common in fee. By deeds of 24th and 25th Oct. 1792 (between whom does not appear), the manor was declared to be the property of Foord, Smith and Salisbury; and the rights of the lord of the manor in the fishery and the ground and soil thereof from the land boundaries of the fishery, and the customary payments usually made to the lords of the manor, for or on account of the anchorage of any ship or the landing of any goods, and also wrecks of the sea, were declared to be the property of Thomas Foord, his heirs and assigns. And the release contains a clause that the south-east and south-west sides of the sea beach at Whitstable, as the same is or shall be thrown up by the sea, shall be taken to be the boundary between the lands of Foord, Smith and Salisbury, and their heirs, and those of Foord and his heirs; and from thence into the sea as far as his fishery extends, whether the same be more or less than the quantity of land then belonging to the fishery. On the 30th April 1793, an Act of Parliament passed for incorporating the Company of Free Fishers and Dredgers; and on the 4th and 5th June 1793, Foord conveyed the royalty of fishery and fishing oysters, and the dues of anchorage and loading, to the Company of Free Fishers and Dredgers. The separation of what has been termed the terrestrial parts of the manor from the fishery has been very properly held to be immaterial by the judges of both courts. Evidence was then given of a charter of Edward IV., exempting the inhabitants of the Cinque Ports from tarrage, and that the deft. was an inhabitant. But it is wholly unnecessary to trouble ourselves with the question whether anchorage was included in the word tarrage or not; for the lord of the manor of Whitstable's title dated for a period long before the reign of Edward IV., and the charter of Edward IV. could confer no exemptions. There is no difficulty also in saying that the jury would be perfectly right in presuming that the payments which had been made ever since 1775 were made from beyond time of legal memory to the lord of the manor of Whitstable; though that question does not appear to have been regularly put to them. Again, it might be properly presumed that the oyster fishery was granted to the lord of the manor. Again, it is hardly necessary to discuss the question whether the vessel, on the occasion that she cast anchor, was in peril or not, or the casting of anchor was, in a sense, voluntary. If the company have a right to anchorage in any case I should think they had it in all cases. But the principal difficulty I feel is, that the right to the soil of the fundus maris within three miles below low-water mark and to the fishery in it, though granted before Magna Charta, is undoubtedly subject to the rights of all subjects to pass in their vessels in the ordinary and usual course of navigation and to take the ground there, or to anchor there at their pleasure, free from toll, unless the toll is imposed in respect of some other advantage conferred upon them, or at least on the public. Subjects may have that advantage where they anchor in a port, in respect of the owner of the port being obliged to maintain it and keep it sufficiently repaired and ready for the reception of ships, and it may be that the Company of Dredgers may have had the anchorage assigned to them, beyond the time of memory, by the owners of the port, who may have had the rights of anchorage immemorially by virtue of the rights of the port. But the case supplies no materials to enable us to come to that conclusion. We are told nothing about the port, its position, or the obligation of the owners. It would be our duty, if the case admitted of it, to find a legal origin for a right so long enjoyed. It might also be due by right as a compensation for the injury, by anchoring within the limits of the oyster fishery, to the breed of oysters. The grant of an oyster fishery beyond the time of legal memory which would require some expense and trouble to establish and keep up, would, I am strongly inclined to think, justify the imposition of such toll within the limits where oysters are placed to breed. Coltman, J., a very able judge, in the case of the Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke, 7 Ad. & Ell. 355, held that the party might be liable by ancient custom to pay to the lord of the manor a reasonable payment, as the owner of a soil where there were oyster beds, for grounding on the soil. But whether the place where the anchor was cast in this case was within the true boundaries of the immemorial oyster beds does not appear to be distinctly stated in the case; or whether the particular place where the anchor was laid was near an oyster bed or anchorage there, did then, or could at any time, prejudice the actual fishery, or its extension, does not appear. It might be perfectly innocuous. For these reasons I think that the plts. are not entitled to succeed. If my noble and learned friends agreed to it I should prefer that there should be a new trial; but I do not wish to persist in that against their opinion.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, the principal question intended to be raised between the parties

GANN v. FREE FISHERS OF WHITSTABLE.

in this appeal is, whether the resps., the Company of Free Fishers and Dredgers of Whitstable, who are owners of a fishery for the growth and improvement of oysters within the limits of the manor of Whitstable, are entitled to demand from the app. a payment for anchoring his vessel within the manor; their title to demand such payment being derived from the lord of the manor, whose predecessors have from time immemorial received a customary payment "for and on account of the anchorage of any ship or vessel within the said manor." The special case upon which the judgment of the Court of Ex. Ch. was given is very loosely and imperfectly drawn, and omits many facts which are necessary to raise with proper precision the point to be decided. For instance, it is not stated whether the claim for anchorage applies to all vessels, whether anchoring within the manor without any actual necessity, or driven to do so by stress of weather or by the exigencies of navigation. Again, it is said that the app.'s vessel was anchored upon a part of the land "claimed by the company," and that their claim was for anchoring on the soil alleged to be theirs, not stating that it actually was theirs. And instead of claiming the anchorage due, as a payment made from time immemorial, it is only alleged that "the plts. gave evidence to prove, and the jury found, that from 1775 continually, down to the present time, they, and those under whom they derived title, had from time to time claimed as of right to take, and had taken, the sum of 1s. from vessels casting anchor within that portion of the manor on which the deft.'s vessel had cast anchor, and that they claimed to take it as a customary payment for such use of the soil." The learned counsel on both sides expressed their desire to have the important question, whether, under the circumstances of the case, the anchorage due could have a lawful origin, decided by the House; and for this purpose it was admitted on the part of the app. that the payment for anchorage had been received by the lords of the manor of Whitstable without interruption from time immemorial, and that his vessel cast anchor upon the soil of the company within the limits of their oyster fishery, and that there was no particular necessity for her coming to an anchor there. It may be observed, that if the payment can legally be claimed in respect of the soil, there is the more reason why it should be paid by those who are driven by necessity or led by their own convenience to anchor upon it, because they are the persons who really derive benefit from it. In considering the question, it is necessary to bear in mind that it applies exclusively to the claim of a toll or due for anchorage on the high seas, and not in any port or haven. I mention this in the outset, because Mr. Lush, towards the close of his argument, contended that the toll might be regarded as being claimed in respect of a port, Whitstable being a limb of Faversham, one of the Cinque Ports. The claim had never been put upon this ground in all the former discussions in the courts below, and it is clearly insufficient to sustain it. Mr. Lush admitted that the resps. were not the owners of the port, but suggested the possibility of the lords of the manor having obtained the port by devolution from the original owner. There is no ground whatever for this presumption, and even if there were, the anchorage due is claimed, not in respect of the ownership of a port, but as a payment "of right made to the lord of the manor." The claim, too, is made solely in his character of lord, and not as the owner of a fishery, so that no question of competition between the right of passage of the public in the highway of the sea and the right of an individual to have a several fishery there can possibly arise. The question is thus simply raised, whether, at any period of the history of this country, the Crown could have imposed upon the subjects a toll for anchoring their vessels upon the high seas within the limits to which its right to the soil of the sea shore extends, without any other consideration moving from the Crown but the permission to use the soil for this purpose. The case of the resp. is very shortly and distinctly stated by Erie, C. J. in his judgment in this case. He says: "The soil of the sea-shore to the extent of three miles from the beach is vested in the Crown, and I am not aware of any rule of law which prevents the Crown from granting to a subject that which is vested in itself. If the Crown did grant the soil of the shore in question, it may well be that the right of taking an anchorage toll of one shilling was granted with it. With great respect for the learned Chief Justice, I do not think it can be assumed as an unquestionable proposition of law that, as between the Crown and its subjects, the sea-shore to the extent mentioned is the property of the Crown in such an absolute sense as that a toll may be imposed upon a subject for the use of it in the regular course of navigation. In stating the right of the Crown in the sea-shore, the text writers invariably confine it to the soil between high and low water mark. The three miles limit depends upon a rule of international law by which every independent state is considered to have territorial property and jurisdiction in the seas which wash their coast within the assumed distance of cannon-shot from the shore. Whatever power the Crown may impart with respect to foreigners, it may well be questioned whether the Crown's ownership in the soil of the sea to this large extent is of such character as of itself to be the foundation of a right to compel the subjects of this country to pay a toll for the use of it in the ordinary course of navigation. In the case of the Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke Lord Denman, in delivering the judgment of the court said: "The right of soil in arms of the sea and public navigable rivers which the Crown has, independently of any ownership in the adjoining land must in all cases be considered as subject to the public right of passage, however acquired, and any grantee of the Crown must of course take subject to such right." Now, if the public possess this paramount right of passage, it seems to be rather inconsistent with such right that they should be compelled to make any payment, however small, for the liberty to exercise it. And the resps. must be driven to contend, either that the right in its origin was not an absolute one, but that the Crown might permit it only under certain conditions, or that the right to navigate does not include in it the power to anchor at pleasure. We were properly told in argument that in considering the question we ought not to confine our view to the present time, but should look to the early period of our history, when the powers of the Crown were much more ample and unfettered than they have since been. But I have searched in vain amongst the earlier authorities to find any clear and distinct proof of the Crown ever having claimed such a toll as that in question, without giving some benefit to the subject as a consideration for it. Indeed it was admitted in the argument for the resps. that some consideration for the right to take anchorage dues was necessary to be shown; but it was said that the mere use of the soil of the Crown by casting an anchor upon it was a sufficient consideration. None of the authorities referred to, however, support so wide a proposition. As far as I can discover, a payment for anchorage has always been claimed in respect of a port or harbour, the creation or erection of which is for the common benefit of navigation, and constitutes in itself a sufficient consideration. Lord Hale, in enumerating the duties which arise from the jus domini or franchise of a port mentions, "Anchorage, as a prestation or toll for every anchor cast there." (De Portibus Mar

HOBBS v. HENNING.

p. 74.) It was said by the counsel for the resps., that it appears from the same high authority that toll might be taken for anchorage in a haven. This is true, but apparently only where the haven is within the limits of the franchise of a port. Hale describes "a haven" to be a place of a large receipt and safe riding of ships, so situate and secured by the land circumjacent that the vessels thereby ride and anchor safely, and are protected by the adjacent land from dangerous and violent winds: (p. 46.) But he afterwards uses the word to denote a portion of the port itself, as in p. 54, where he says, "In the consideration of a port there are these two things involved, viz., first the consideration of the interest of the soil both of the shore or town, which is the caput portus, and of the soil of the haven itself wherein the ships do ride and apply." And that the ownership of the soil of a haven, unless it is within a port, will not entitle the owner to take anchorage dues for the use of it, is laid down in p. 73, in these terms: "The ownership or property is where the King or common person, by charter or prescription, is the owner of the soil of a creek or haven where ships may safely arrive and come to the shore. This interest of propriety may, as hath been shown, belong to a subject. But he hath not thereby the franchise of a port, neither can he so use or employ it, unless he hath had that liberty time out of mind, or the King's charter." And after stating that the owner may bring in his own goods not customable, &c., he adds, "but he may not use it as a public port, nor take toll or anchorage there." Williams, J. quotes this passage in delivering his judgment in the C. P., and says that "it clearly assumes that if the owner had a Royal grant he might take anchorage." I do not, however, understand this to be Lord Hale's meaning. It appears to me that the correct interpretation of his language is, that without the King's grant or charter a subject cannot have the franchise of a port, and without having a port he cannot take toll or anchorage, which are dues arising from and pertinent to it. The counsel for the resps. in their argument in support of their claim insisted strongly upon the analogy presented by the public fishing in the sea, which, primæ facie, all subjects of the realm possess, and of which they might formerly have been deprived by a grant from the Crown to an individual of an exclusive right of fishing. But, in the first place, it does not appear that such a right of several fishery was ever granted in what may be called the open sea. Lord Hale states that "the King may grant fishing within a creek of the sea, or in some precinct, that hath known bounds, though within the main sea" (p. 17); and, again, that "a subject may by prescription have the interest of fishing in an arm of the sea, in a creek or part of the sea, or in a certain precinct or extent lying within the sea" (p. 18). But even if such a grant could have been lawfully made so as to extend beyond these defined limits, yet the right of several fishery appears to have been always subservient to the right of navigation; and the King could not enable the owner of a fishery to do anything which, though within the competency of an exclusive owner, was an obstruction to the passage of ships upon the seas. In the Mayor of Colchester v. Brooke, Coltman, J. suggested that although parties who wish to go up a navigable river are not obliged to wait for a particular time of the tide, yet it might be law that if they take the ground they may be liable to make a reasonable payment to the owner of the soil. This opinion is not stated with any positiveness; but yet it may be correct as applicable to a navigable river, because the owner of the soil may have given consideration for the payment by rendering the river navigable. The necessity of discovering a quid pro quo for the claim in this case has driven the resps. to contend that the establishment of the oyster fishery belonging to the resps., being for the public benefit, might be considered to be a sufficient consideration for the imposition of the toll upon anchorage. It is difficult to understand how a benefit wholly unconnected with navigation, and extending to the public generally, can be made the legal foundation for a local payment from vessels anchoring within a particular district. There is no reason why, if good to this extent, it should not be sufficient for a similar charge for all vessels casting anchor upon the soil of the Crown in any other part of the seas round this island. I have, therefore, arrived at the conclusion that the undoubted right of the public freely to navigate the highway of the sea cannot be restricted by the imposition of any payment whatever, unless some good consideration can be shown for it; and the resps. have failed to establish any other ground of title in the lords of the manor to the anchorage due than the mere use of their soil. This I consider to be wholly insufficient to justify the demand in question, unless it can be held that the right of navigation does not include the right of anchoring, which can hardly be seriously contended. I admit that every intendment ought to be made in favour of a payment which has been uninterruptedly received time out of mind, supposing it presumably capable of a lawful origin; but, not being able to discover any ground upon which this claim of an anchorage due could have had a legal commencement, the case of the Mayor, &c. of Nottingham v. Lambert, in Willes, is an authority for showing that no length of prescription can give it validity. I think the facts sufficiently admitted to render a new trial unnecessary. I am therefore of opinion that the judgments of the Ex. Ch. and of the Court of C. P. ought to be reversed, and judgment to be entered for the deft.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

Reported by W. MAYD and LUMLEY SMITH, Esqrs.,
Barristers-at-Law.

Nov. 16, 1864, and Jan. 30, 1865.

HOBBS v. HENNING.

Marine insurance—Concealment of material fact—Contraband of war—Neutral ship—Judgment of foreign prize court—Grounds of condemnation—Estoppel.

To a declaration against an underwriter on a policy of insurance on goods on board ship from London to Matamoras, with leave to call at any intermediate port, alleging a loss by one of the perils insured against, the deft. pleaded that the goods were contraband of war, shipped by the plt. for the purpose of being imported into a port in a State in North America engaged in hostilities with the United States of America, and were liable to be seized by the cruisers of the United States, and that the ship mentioned in the policy was carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized by such cruisers, and that the ship and goods were seized accordingly, which was the loss complained of. The plea further averred that the deft. at the time of making the said insurance was ignorant of the said circumstances:

Held, that the plea was a bad plea, because it was consistent with it that the goods were being sent from a neutral port to a neutral port in a neutral ship, and

C. P.]

HOBBS v. HESSING.

therefore were not liable to seizure; because the pit. was not shown to be responsible for the ship's papers or the character of any goods besides his own; and because the carrying of the papers did not alone work a forfeiture, but was only evidence from which a cause of forfeiture might be inferred:

Held, further, that the allegation of the deft.'s ignorance of the facts stated in the plea did not make the plea good.

The sentence of a prize court condemning a vessel is not conclusive as to any matter of fact which was the ground of condemnation, unless that matter of fact is clearly and certainly stated in the judgment as a ground of condemnation:

Held, also (per Erie, C. J. and Byrle, J.), that although the finding of a matter of fact in the judgment of a prize court may, when adduced in evidence, be conclusive evidence of the fact so found, it cannot be pleaded as an estoppel.

The declaration was on a valued policy of insurance on goods shipped on board the Peterhoff, from London to Matamoros, with leave to call at intermediate ports, underwritten by the deft. The policy was in the ordinary form, and was set out in the declaration, which alleged that the goods were shipped by the pit., or J. Wetherall and Co. on their behalf, and that they, or one of them, was interested in the goods to the amount insured at the time of the loss; that the ship sailed on the voyage, and during the voyage and the continuance of the risk, the goods were, by the perils insured against, wholly lost.

Third plea:

That the said ship, with the said goods on board thereof did not sail on the voyage covered by the said policy as in the declaration alleged.

Seventh plea:

That the said goods were contraband of war, and were shipped by the pit. for the purpose of being sent to and imported into a port in North America, situate in a state then and now engaged in hostilities with the United States of America, and were liable to be seized by the cruisers of the said United States as contraband of war, and that the ship in the policy mentioned was, during the continuance of the risk, and at the time of the loss, carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized by such cruisers, and that the said ship and goods were seized accordingly, which is the loss complained of, of all which the deft. before and at the time of making the said insurance and subscribing the said policy was wholly ignorant.

Eighth plea:

That before action brought the said ship and goods were during hostilities between the United States of America and the Confederate States seized by the cruisers of the said United States of America, and carried into a port of the said United States, and such proceedings were thereupon duly and according to the law of nations had that afterwards and before action brought, it was duly adjudged and determined by the United States Prize Court, held at New York, in the said United States, and there having competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said ship was knowingly on the voyage aforesaid laden in whole or in part with articles contraband of war, and had them in the act of transportation at sea, and that the said ship with her said cargo was not truly destined to the port of Matamoros, but on the contrary was destined to some other port or place, and in aid and for the use of persons then at war with the said United States of America, and in violation of the law of nations, and that the ship's papers were simulated and false as to her real destination, and thereupon it was considered and adjudged by the said court then having competent jurisdiction in that behalf that the said ship and her cargo were subject to condemnation and forfeiture, and that the same should be condemned and forfeited accordingly, which is the loss complained of. And the deft. says that before action brought all things had happened and all things had elapsed necessary to make the said judgment binding on the pit., and to entitle the deft. to plead the same as an answer to this action, and the said judgment so pronounced was absolutely final and conclusive, and is still in full force and effect, not reversed, annulled, or otherwise vacated.

First replication issue on the pleas.

Second replication to the seventh plea:

That the voyage in the declaration and in the policy of insurance mentioned was a voyage to a certain port in Mexico, to wit, to Matamoros, and not a voyage to any port in North America, situate in a state then or now engaged in hostilities with the United States of America, and that the said goods, while proceeding on the said voyage to the said Matamoros, were seized as in the declaration alleged.

Demurrer to the seventh and eighth pleas.

First rejoinder to as much of the first as is related to the third plea:

The deft. says that the pit. ought not to be admitted on the third plea and deny the truth thereof, says that before action brought the said ship and during hostilities between the United States of America and the Confederate States, seized and carried into a port of the United States, and such proceedings were thereupon duly and according to the law of nations had that afterwards and before action brought, it was duly adjudged and determined by the United States Prize Court held at New York in the United States, and there having competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said ship was knowingly on the voyage aforesaid laden in whole or in part with articles contraband of war, and had them in the act of transportation at sea, and that the said ship with her said cargo was not truly destined to Matamoros, a neutral port, and for the purpose of commerce within the authority of public law; but truly was destined for some other port or place, and for the use of the enemies of the said United States in violation of the law of nations, and that the pit. were simulated and false as to her real destination, and that the pit. was considered and adjudged by the said court to have competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said cargo were subject to condemnation and forfeiture, and that the same should be condemned and forfeited. And the deft. says that, before action brought, all things had happened and elapsed necessary to make the said judgment binding on the pit., and to entitle the deft. to plead the same as an answer to this action, and that the said judgment of the court was and is absolutely final and conclusive, in full force and effect, and not reversed, annulled, or otherwise vacated.

Third rejoinder to the second replication seventh plea:

The deft. says that the pit. ought not to be admitted the second replication to the seventh plea, says that, before action brought, the said ship and during hostilities between the United States of America and the Confederate States seized by the cruisers of the United States, and carried into a port of the United States, and such proceedings were thereupon duly and according to the law of nations had that afterwards and before action brought, it was duly adjudged and determined by the United States Prize Court held at New York in the United States, and there having competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said ship was knowingly on the voyage aforesaid laden in whole or in part with articles contraband of war, and had them in the act of transportation at sea, and that the said ship with her said cargo was not truly destined to Matamoros, a neutral port, and for the purpose of commerce within the authority of public law; but truly was destined for some other port or place, and for the use of the enemies of the said United States in violation of the law of nations, and that the pit. were simulated and false as to her real destination, and that the pit. was considered and adjudged by the said court to have competent jurisdiction in that behalf, that the said cargo were subject to condemnation and forfeiture, and that the same should be condemned and forfeited. And the deft. says that, before action brought, all things had happened and elapsed necessary to make the said judgment binding on the pit., and to entitle the deft. to plead the same as an answer to this action, and that the said judgment of the court was and is absolutely final and conclusive, in full force and effect, and not reversed, annulled, or otherwise vacated.

The Franklin, 3 Rob. Adm. Rep. 217;Lothian v. Henderson, 3 B. & P. 499; 2 Smith's L. C. (5th ed.) 692.

Jan. 30.—ERLE, C. J. delivered the judgment of the court.—The declaration is on a policy of insurance on goods from Matamoras in the usual form, and alleges a loss in the course of that voyage by a peril insured against. The seventh plea alleges that the goods were contraband of war, and were shipped by the plt. for the purpose of being sent to, and imported into a port in a state engaged in hostilities with the United States, and were liable to be seized by the cruisers of the United States as contraband of war, and that the ship was carrying goods and papers which rendered her liable to be seized by such cruisers; and that the ship and goods were seized accordingly, which is the loss complained of: of all which the deft., at the time of subscribing the policy, was wholly ignorant. The demurrer to this plea raises the question, whether the facts alleged show a defence, and our answer is in the negative. The plea was probably intended to be a defence, on the ground of the concealment by the plt. of material facts, but we do not find sufficient averments to establish that defence, as we read the plea. We take it to be consistent therewith, that the goods of the plt. were sent from a neutral port to a neutral port in a neutral ship. The allegation in the declaration that the goods were sent from London to Matamoras is admitted by the plea, and although we cannot notice judicially the situation of Matamoras, so neither can the deft. rely on its proximity to the Confederate States, or make any unfavourable inference therefrom against the plt. If the goods were in the course of transport from a neutral port to a neutral port, the better opinion (see the authorities collected in Ortolan's Diplomatie de la Mer, vol. 2, p. 181) seems to be, that war does not give a belligerent any right to seize them on account of their quality. The allegation that the goods were shipped for the purpose of being sent to an enemy's port is an allegation of a mental process only. We are not to assume therefrom either that the plt. had made any contract or provided any means for the further transmission of the goods into the enemy's state, or that the shipment to Matamoras was an unreal pretence. If the goods were in a course of transmission, not to Matamoras, but to an enemy's port, the voyage would not be covered by the policy, and that defence is raised in direct terms by the third plea. Here the allegation does not deny the destination to the neutral port to which the insurance relates, but introduces a purpose existing in the mind of the assured, after the termination of the voyage insured for, as to the ulterior disposition of the cargo and ship. It is consistent with that purpose, as here alleged, that the plt. made the consignment for mercantile profit, as the end to be attained by him; in other words, that he knew of an effective demand for warlike stores at Matamoras, and was induced to send a supply by the expectation of a high price, and that he expected that the purchase would probably be made on behalf of the Confederate States, and in that sense had the purpose that the goods should pass into those States. In this sense, price was the ultimate end which he proposed to attain, and Federal and Confederate are alike indifferent as means, provided he attained at end; and in a neutral territory he might lawfully sell to either. The distinction between a mere mental purpose that an unlawful act should be done, and a participation in the unlawful transaction itself, is made clear by referring to the cases of Hobnan v. Johnson, Cowp. 341, and Lightfoot v. Tennant. In the first, the plt. in a foreign country sold goods to the deft., knowing that he purposed to smuggle them into England, and in one sense, the plt. there sold them with the purpose that they should be so smuggled; but as he did not participate in any way in the unlawful transaction, the mere mental purpose did not avoid the contract of sale. In the second case (Lightfoot v. Tennant), the plt. sold goods to the deft., to be delivered abroad, in order that they should be sent unlawfully to the East Indies. After a verdict for the deft., on a plea alleging this fact, on motion for judgment non obstante veredicto, the objection was raised that the mere mental purpose of the vendor did not avoid the contract of sale; but the objection was answered by suggestion of the fact that the plt.'s participation in the unlawful transaction went beyond the mere mental purpose, that he was taken to be a party to the whole project, and to be acting in the execution thereof in the sale which was the cause of action; and upon these facts the contract was held void. For these reasons we think the averment, "that the goods were shipped for the purpose of being sent to an enemy's port," construing these words as we have done, is insufficient to establish that they were liable to seizure for breach of neutrality. The effect of the other allegations in the plea depends much on that which we have last considered. If goods fit for immediate use in war, and therefore of the quality denoted by the term "contraband of war," are passing between neutrals, it seems that they are not liable to seizure by a belligerent. The right of capture, according to Sir Wm. Scott's opinion, expressed in the case of the Imina, 3 Rob. Adm. Rep. 168, attaches only where they are passing on the high sea to an enemy's port; they must be taken in delicto, that is, in the actual prosecution of a voyage to an enemy's port. The liability, therefore, of these goods to lawful seizure, although their quality was such as might make them contraband of war, depended on their destination, and they were not liable, unless it distinctly appeared that the voyage was to an enemy's port. The further allegation, that the ship was carrying goods and papers which made them liable to be seized, is immaterial as a ground of defence; for these goods are not alleged to be the plt.'s goods, and the plt. is not shown to be responsible for the ship's papers, nor for any other goods than his own; also, if the voyage was to a neutral port, and the law be as above stated, the facts alleged do not show that the ship and goods were liable to seizure. Furthermore, the allegation that the ship was carrying papers which made it liable to be seized, is not strictly accurate in reference to the law of nations. The papers alone are not a breach of neutrality, so as to work a forfeiture of the ship, they are only evidence from which a cause of forfeiture may be inferred; they may be evidence either of enemy's property or of destination to a blockaded port, or to an enemy's port with contraband, and so be evidence on which the judge may find a cause of forfeiture proved, but they are in themselves no cause of forfeiture. The language of Sir Wm. Scott, in the case of the Franklin, speaking of simulated papers, and saying that "this fraudulent conduct justly subjects the ship to confiscation," must be taken with reference to the question before him, whether the ship should be confiscated as well as the contraband cargo; and his decision is in the affirmative, and rightly, if the shipowner was knowingly conveying contraband to an enemy's port, of which knowledge papers indicating a false destination would raise a presumption. These being the premises alleged in the plea, the allegation that the HOBBS v. HENNING.

deft. was ignorant of them is of no avail. If the defence is, that the plt. has concealed a fact which he was bound to disclose, the plea should have been framed accordingly. As it stands, it shows no wrongful act on the part of the plt. towards the insurer. If the proper construction of the premises in the plea be different from that which we have come to, still the allegation of the deft.'s ignorance of those premises would not make the plea a good defence on the ground of concealment. The insurance is against capture, lawful and unlawful, and the deft., in order to discharge himself, must show a concealment by the assured. Mr. Phillips, in his book on Insurance, vol. 1, s. 531, says: "Concealment is where one party suppresses or neglects to communicate a material fact." It is quite consistent with anything appearing on this record that a letter from the plt. may have miscarried, or that the deft. may have remained in ignorance without any default of the plt. The allegation, therefore, of the ignorance of the deft. is of itself immaterial, and has no effect in avoiding the policy; and the result is, that we consider the seventh plea to be bad. We proceed now to the eighth plea, which in substance alleges that the ship did not sail on the voyage covered by the policy. The third plea pleads the same ground of defence as a fact in direct terms. The eighth plea pleads it by way of estoppel, setting out a judgment, in which the fact is supposed to be stated as a matter whereon the court had adjudicated, and then relying on the judgment to estop the plt. from denying that fact. The same estoppel is the ground of two rejoinders to two replications, and the eighth plea and the two last rejoinders may be considered together. The deft., in support of these pleas, relied on the rule that sentences of foreign courts deciding questions of prize are to be conceived as conclusive evidence in actions on policies, on every subject immediately and properly within the jurisdiction of the court on which it has professed to decide judicially (see the opinion of the judges in Henderson v. Lothian, 3 Bos. & P. 499); and he contended that the judgment, as pleaded, showed that the voyage on which the ship was captured was not a voyage from London to Matamoras. The plt., in answer, contended, first, that the decision does not profess to decide the matter of fact on which the deft. relies; secondly, that if it had decided that matter of fact, still the decision could not be pleaded as an estoppel, and we are of opinion that the plt. is right. The rule making the decision of a court, which creates the status of a person or thing, conclusive upon all persons as to the existence of that status, has been regarded as salutary. Sentences of nullity of marriage in the Ecclesiastical Courts, of forfeiture in the Exchequer, of settlement of paupers by the quarter sessions, and of prize in Prize Courts, are examples. In Hughes v. Cornelius, 2 Show. 322, the rule was applied within salutary limits, where, in trover for a ship by the former owner, the sentence of a prize court was held conclusive to show that the property had been changed. See Doe v. Oliver, 2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 634, where the whole subject is fully considered with much learning and lucid arrangement. But the rule making the finding of a judge upon any matter of fact upon which he professed to form his judgment conclusive upon all the world has been supposed to be anomalous, and to produce pernicious results. See Lord Eldon's opinion in Lothian v. Henderson, 3 Bos. & P. 499, to that effect. Also in Geyer v. Aguilar, 7 T. Rep. 695, Lord Kenyon speaks of the rule as a source of the grossest injustice. So in Donaldson v. Thompson, 1 Camp. 429, Lord Ellenborough says, speaking of this rule, that the doctrine rests on a case in Shower, which does not fully support it, and the practice of reviewing these sentences often leads in its consequences to the grossest injustice. We would further refer to the rule in Dalglish v. Hodgson, p. 504, where Tindall, C.J. says, "that the sentence of the prize court is not conclusive as to the ground of condemnation, if there be any ambiguity as to what the ground is. It must not be left in uncertainty whether the ship was condemned on one ground which would be justified by the law of nations, or on another ground which would amount only to a breach of the municipal regulations of the condemning country." Although these sentences must be received in evidence, still the precedents show that they have been carefully examined for the purpose of seeing whether the matter of fact, in proof of which they are adduced, was clearly and certainly found by the judge whose sentence is relied on. Bernardi v. Motteux, Doug. 575; and Culbert v. Boulton, 7 Term. R. 523, are two amongst numerous cases which might be cited to this effect. We now proceed to examine the judgment set out in the eighth plea. The condemnation appears to us to have been for carrying contraband of war intended to be for the use of the enemy of the United States, and the sentence, so far from deciding that the ship with the said goods did not sail on the voyage from London to Matamoras, appears to us to express that she was on that voyage when she was taken. The first matter of fact found by the judge is, that the ship was knowingly on the voyage aforesaid, that is from London to Matamoras, laden with contraband. The second is, that the said ship with the said cargo was not truly destined to Matamoras, a nautical port, and for the purpose of trade and commerce within the authority and intendment of public law; but was destined for some other port or place, and in aid and for the use of the enemy and in violation of the law of nations, and that the ship papers were simulated and false. If the judge meant to find that the ship was not bound to Matamoras, but on the contrary to a port of the enemy, the finding would have been so expressed. But if he meant to find she was bound to Matamoras, not for the purpose of commerce with the inhabitants thereof, but for the purpose of such a sale or transfer there as that the Confederates should get the use of the cargo, all the words of the judgment have their usual meaning and effect. We have no jurisdiction to inquire into, nor are we at all considering the validity of the legal grounds of the judgment; our task is to ascertain what matter of fact the judge found to exist. He may have considered that trading with the Confederates was not within the authority and intendment of public law, and was a violation of the law of nations, and that a voyage to Matamoras, in order that the plt.'s goods and cargo should be transferred from there to some port or place for the use of the Confederates, was a destination of the cargo for such port or place, and made it liable to confiscation, and that the papers were simulated and false, because they represented Matamoras as the final destination, and concealed a purpose of ulterior destination. By this examination of the judgment set out in the plea, we are led to the conclusion that the learned judge did not intend to find as a matter of fact either that the ship had not sailed on a voyage to Matamoras, or that after having so sailed she had deviated from that voyage. But, on the contrary, he condemned her as a lawful prize, because she was in prosecution of that voyage, with an ulterior destination, either for the cargo or the ship, or both as above explained. The judgment, therefore, does not sustain the inferences of fact which the deft. seeks to establish thereby, nor does it sustain his claim of right to prevent the plt. from showing the truth in respect of this fact, and the plea is therefore bad. So far that is the judgment of myself and my brothers Byles and Keating. The other that plea is the opinion of my brother and myself, and my brother Keating assent or dissent. We are further on that the eighth plea and the same as last mentioned are bad, because of a matter of fact in the course of adjudication of a prize court cannot be an estoppel in the cases where, if adduced, the judgment would be received as evidence of the fact so found. Although there are numerous in which the evidence has been adduced, still there is no precedent for the fact as an estoppel that we have been told. The principle on which the evidence was admissible is not clear. Lord Eldon, in Lottian v. Oyle, says it was introduced at first against the owner to prove the loss, and was afterwards used by him for their defence. Lord Ellenborough, in Oyle, speaks of it as a matter of comity between the two courts. Such evidence does not in any legal description of matter of fact nor is it guarded by the safeguards against which restrict matters of estoppel in respect of fact and of subject-matter. In Burke v. Jackson, 5 Col. 585 (cited in Doe v. Oliver, 2 Sm. & Col. 585), Knight Bruce, V.C. gives an elaborate opinion on estoppel, and lays down the principle (p. 585): "Generally neither the judgment current nor of an exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which came in question before it, though within the scope, or of any matter incidentally cognisable, matter to be inferred by argument from fact; and that a judgment is final only for purpose and object. The admissibility of matters of prize courts upon matters of fact is limited within these limits; and although we have here to hold that they are admissible as in decided cases have established their utility, yet beyond that limit we would not consider that the attempt to use them as an estoppel does transgress that limit, and no precedent for it. In relying upon the fact of any precedent, we do not consider objection is confined to a matter of form; and in some degree the tendency of such to defeat real truth by technical proof, they have the effect of preventing the foreign from being misunderstood or misapplied. Argument can only be adduced in evidence, and is pleadable as an estoppel, the meaning ascertained by adducing in evidence the proceedings and other matters referred to in the judgment. In Bernardi v. Motteux, Lord Stowell admitted a French arrêt, and expressed his opinion that the procès verbal on which the judgment was founded ought to have been given in evidence at the time by the plaintiff, to show the meaning of the judgment—that is, to show whether the judgment was intended to find enemy's property, and so to reach of warranty of neutrality, or to condemn on an arrêt against throwing papers." So in Christie v. Serretan, 8 T. R. 192, by the special case, had power to refer to the proceedings before the Tribunal de Commerce, to a printed copy of a treaty between the United States and America, to show the meaning of the treaty. So in Pulford v. Bell, the court referred to the purpose of the judgments in the Tribunal de Commerce at Bordeaux, in the Tribunal de Commerce at Gironde, and in the Cour de Cassation. So in Dulgeish v. Hodgson, the circumstance which the ship entered the river was admitted in evidence to show the meaning of the judgment, that is to show whether she was liable for breaking blockade, or for disobedience to a municipal law of Brazil. These are the reasons which induce us to adhere to the precedent and reject the plea of estoppel. If the judgment here in question should be hereafter adduced in evidence in support of the third plea, it may be that it would be found to refer to pleadings and doctrines of public law, and to various classes and items of proofs relating to acts and declarations of parties on board, and so forth, and if the judgment was given in evidence, these matters so referred to therein might be also adduced in evidence, and might show that the fact was not found by the judge as supposed by the defendant. This inquiry would not tend to impeach the conclusive effect of the judgment upon the question of prize, but might prevent a mistaken assumption from prevailing over the truth. For these reasons we give our judgment on these demurrers for the plaintiff. We consider the eighth plea open to the further objection that it does not plead the issuable fact in respect of the voyage, but the evidence which might prove that fact. It pleads the probandum and not the probandum; but as this objection would not apply to the rejoinder to the replication to the third plea, we do not further advert to it.

FARNWORTH AND ANOTHER v. HYDE.

Marine insurance—Total loss—Notice of abandonment—Sale of cargo—Province of the jury.

In an action against underwriters on a policy of insurance on a cargo of timber, it was proved that the ship, on board of which the timber was, had run aground and been sold with its cargo by the master, under the advice of competent surveyors, and the jury found that the sale of the ship was justified, because the cost of the repairs of the ship would have exceeded its value when repaired, and that the sale of the timber was justified, because it was not practicable in a mercantile sense to convey it to its destination. No notice of abandonment of the cargo was given to the underwriters before the sale:

Held (per Erie, C.J., Keating and M. Smith, JJ.), that such a sale, supervening on the existing state of things, amounted to an actual total loss of the cargo, so as to render it unnecessary for the owner of the cargo to give notice of abandonment to the underwriters before the sale:

Held, further, that the question whether or not the sale was under the circumstances justifiable, was entirely a question for the jury:

Held (per Byles, J.), that the necessity of selling the timber must be strictly proved, and that if the timber could have been carried to its destination and there sold to greater advantage than if it had been sold with the ship, the master was not justified in selling it, and that the verdict of the jury was not conclusive, and that on the facts of the case, as set out in the judge's notes of the trial, the court were bound to reverse it.

This was an action brought by the plaintiffs, who were timber merchants, against an underwriter, upon a policy of insurance on timber on board the Acos, from Quebec to Liverpool. The plaintiffs claimed as for a total loss, and the defendant paid into court 25 per cent. on the valued amount as for a partial loss.

The vessel sailed from Quebec with the timber on board and got aground and was subsequently frozen up for the winter in the river St. Lawrence. She was surveyed repeatedly, and, in the opinion of some of the surveyors, it would have been prudent to sell the ship and cargo as they lay, but at the suggestion of Lloyd's agent at Quebec the sale was deferred till the spring, in the hope that they might be saved. Ultimately, however, they were sold; and the purchaser, taking advantage of an unusually high tide, got the ship off and sold her in Quebec. No notice of abandonment was given to the underwriters till after the sale.

The action was tried at Liverpool, before Pigott, B., and a verdict was found for the plts. for the full amount claimed, the jury finding that the sale was justifiable. The deft. had leave to move, and the judge's notes set out the value of the ship and cargo, and the amount which would have been required to repair the ship, and various facts relating to what would have been realised by the sale of the timber, supposing it to have taken place in Quebec or in England. It is unnecessary to set out here the details of the evidence, as the material facts are stated in the judgment of the majority of the court, and the separate judgment of Byles, J.

E. James, Q. C., for the plts., obtained a rule to enter a verdict for the deft. or a nonsuit, on the ground that there was no total loss, and that the sum paid into court covered the amount due on a partial loss.

Brett, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C. and C. Russell showed cause.

E. James, Q. C. and T. Jones supported the rule.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 27.—M. SMITH, J. delivered the judgment of Erle, C.J., Keating and M. Smith, JJ. —This action was on a policy on timber in the ship Avon, from Quebec to Liverpool. The Avon was frozen-up in the passage down the St. Lawrence, and, after survey, the ship and the cargo were sold by the master to one purchaser by separate sales. At the trial the jury found in effect—first, that the sale of the ship was justified, on the ground that the cost of the repairs would have been greater than the value of the ship when repaired; and secondly, that it was right to sell the cargo, because it was not practically possible, in a mercantile sense, to have carried it to its destination; that is to say, because the costs of bringing the cargo, added to the amount of depreciation, would not have left any appreciable margin of profit to the owners. Upon these findings the verdict was entered for the plt. for a total loss; and the rule nisi to alter the verdict, and enter it for a partial loss, on the ground that there was no evidence on which the finding of the total loss could be supported, is now to be disposed of. Upon the first question, relating to the ship, we have to say whether there was evidence to support the finding that the sale was justifiable; and our answer is in the affirmative. We do not propose to state the evidence at length; but, taking the report of the surveyors on the 2nd May, and the statement of Julien, who purchased on the 7th May, we think there was evidence for the jury that the ship was in imminent danger of destruction, and that a sale appeared to afford the only reasonable hope of saving any part of her value. Then upon the second question, relating to the cargo, we have to say whether there was evidence to support the finding that it was right to sell it, because the cost of bringing the whole or any part of it to its destination would have exceeded the value thereof then and our answer is again in the affirmative. We are not called on to say on which side, in our opinion, the balance of evidence inclines. If there was reasonable evidence for the jury, the evidence stands; and we think there was. We have been embarrassed by the estimate appended in sequel to the judge's notes, by which it appears that a comparison of the supposed cost of carrying the timber to its destination, with the supposed value thereof there, showed a possible profit of 209%. The estimate, taken alone, seems at first sight inconsistent with the finding in respect of the cargo; but as this estimate is followed by the note that the jury might say if anything was to be deducted for loss of quantity, we consider that there was evidence to the effect that in the process of saving the timber there would probably be a loss of 25 per cent. in quantity; and, although it might follow that in the case of a diminution of the quantity of timber a deduction should be made for some of the estimated expenses, such as freight, in the like proportion, yet some of the expenses might be a constant quantity, subject to no deduction, such as the expense of bringing labourers to make rafts. All this was for the jury; and we cannot say that there was not evidence to support the verdict. Then, upon the facts so found by the jury, is the plt. entitled to recover for a total loss? As the cost of carrying the cargo to its destination would have been greater than its value on arrival, it is not disputed that there would have been a constructive total loss, if notice of abandonment had been given: (Rosetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 176; and Reimer v. Kingrove, 6 Ex. 263.) But no such notice was given, and we are therefore to say what is the legal effect of this sale so found by the jury to have been right and necessary. We answer, that such sale supervening on the existing state of things was an actual total loss. A right sale passes the property; and when the property is passed from the assured by reason and in consequence of a peril insured against the cargo is actually lost to him, as much as if it was destroyed. We are aware that the interest of the underwriter may at times be sacrificed by sale, where the ship or cargo might have been saved wholly or partially, if notice of abandonment had been given; but we are also aware that, if a right sale, such as was here proved, is not held to be an actual total loss, it would be for the interest of the assured, where a notice of abandonment would make a constructive total loss, to give a notice of abandonment, and leave the ship or cargo to perish unsold; and so the benefit of salvage from a sale would be lost by reason of the delay required for notice of abandonment. It must rest with the tribunal that has to deal with the questions of fact to guard against fraud and wrong; and the sale by the master ought not to be found right or valid unless it was the best that could be done for the interest of those concerned, with reference to the circumstances, including the time and manner of sale, and so, in a mercantile sense, necessary. The opposing considerations for and against requiring notice of abandonment where the proper insured exists in specie are stated in Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 266; 4 Scott, 1; and Knight v. Faith, 15 Q. B. 649, 657. In Roux v. Salvador the policy was on hides from Valparaiso to Bordeaux. The ship was forced into Rio, and decomposition

FARNWORTH AND ANOTHER v. HYDE.

he hides began by reason of a peril of the sea; and, because it was found not to be practicable to carry them to their destination, on account of the expected progress of decomposition, they were sold at Rio; and the loss was held to be total, although there was no notice of abandonment. The judgment is of a court of error—it is powerful in reasoning and in learning; and, although it relates to a cargo of perishable goods in the course of decomposition, yet it extends to all cases where the adventure is brought to an end by a peril, and the goods are taken out of the power of the assured in the course of their voyage, either by physical laws working decomposition, or by political laws working detention and sale by a court, or by circumstances of distress and danger creating what may be described as a mercantile necessity for a sale. The present case is an example of such circumstances, where a stranded ship was in danger of falling to pieces, and the expense and risk of rafting the timber, and reloading it on transhipment, and carrying it to its destination, was supposed to exceed the value of the cargo when there. Such a case seems expressly included in the part of the judgment in Roux v. Salvador, 3 Bing. N. C. 279, where it is said that if goods damaged by the perils of the sea, and necessarily landed before the termination of the voyage, are, in the case of perishable goods, in such a state that they cannot in safety be reshipped; if, though imperishable, they are in the hands of strangers, not under the control of the assured; if, by any circumstances over which he has no control, they can never be brought to their original destination; in any of these cases the circumstance of their existing in specie at that forced termination of the risk is of no importance; the loss is in its nature total to him who has no means of recovering his goods, whether his inability arises from their annihilation, or other insuperable necessity. The judgment in Knight v. Faith, 15 Q. B. 657, accords with Roux v. Salvador in holding that there may be a total loss without abandonment, when there has been a right sale caused by urgent necessity, with full proof that everything was done optima fide, and for the real benefit of all concerned. There is an apparent difference of opinion in these two decisions as to the degree of imminent danger which should be held to be such urgent necessity as would justify a sale. But the sufficiency of the degree of danger is within the province of the jury, and it is useless to attempt to define a degree without a standard for measure, as Lord Campbell observes on the degree of fraud; but those observations are relevant to the caution required from the jury, not to the law of the case when the necessity for the sale has been properly formed. In King v. Walker, 9 L. T. Rep. 259, it was not necessary to decide that a valid sale from necessity was an actual total loss without any notice of abandonment; but the court clearly sanctioned the rational principles respecting the effect of a valid sale from necessity laid down in Roux v. Salvador saying, "It may not be easy to understand why notice of abandonment should be required in a case where the vessel cannot be made to sail except at an expense for repair which no reasonable man would incur, and is therefore properly and, in a sense, necessarily sold for the old materials." In these three cases all the authorities relating to abandonment are fully reviewed, and no useful object would be gained in repeating the review. We consider that we act on the principles laid down in Roux v. Salvador in holding that the jury, finding that the sale was right under the circumstances in evidence before them, found that there was an actual total loss with benefit of salvage, although the cargo existed in specie at the time of the sale, and there was no notice of abandonment. This is the judgment of my Lord, my brother Keating and myself.

My brother Byles has written a separate judgment, which he desires me to read. He agrees in the principle, but he takes a different view of the facts.

BYLES, J.—I agree with my Lord and the rest of the court, that if the cargo was sold by the captain of the vessel because the expense of forwarding it to its destination would have exceeded its value when so forwarded, it was rightly so sold; that a sale under such circumstances would have changed the property; and that there would have been, not merely a constructive, but an actual total loss, of the timber. I also agree that, in the case of such an actual total loss, no notice of abandonment is necessary. But in all cases of alleged constructive loss, where the captain takes upon himself to sell the ship, and still more so when he sells the cargo, the necessity of so doing ought to be strictly proved, and the jury are not at liberty to act on conjecture. It is plain, on the figures appended to the report of the learned judge, that the expenses of bringing the cargo to Liverpool would not have equalled the value of the cargo, when brought there in its integrity, by 209*l*. The jury have found that there would have been a diminution of the quantity of timber to this extent, and therefore that the expenses would have equalled the value of the diminished cargo, which alone could have been actually brought home. But I can find no evidence on the judge's notes to support this amount of deduction from the original quantity of the cargo. It may be that there would be some deduction; but it may also be that, if any, there would be a very much smaller deduction. Again, on the assumption that such a diminution of quantity were proved, the expenses of bringing home the cargo should be calculated on the larger quantity of timber contained in the whole original cargo. It is possible (but I see no evidence to prove it) that the expenses of landing and rafting would be the same whether any portion of the cargo were lost or not. This might depend on the period at which the loss of quantity took place, of which there is no evidence that I am aware of. But, assuming the landing and rafting to be constant quantities, yet the freight, both original and additional, is at so much per load, and is calculated by the assured on the quantity contained in the entire cargo. But the freight actually payable for sending a smaller quantity would be less. Therefore, in calculating the expense of sending the diminished cargo home, too much is charged for freight. But any deduction from the charge for freight makes the sale unlawful, and indeed destroys the claim for a constructive total loss; for it does not appear on the figures that, even if the freight could be charged on the original quantity, it would do more than bring the expenses of sending home the cargo up to the value of the cargo so sent home; no excess of charge beyond the value of the cargo is shown. I much regret that in this preliminary question I am unable to concur with the rest of the court; but though I fear I must be in error, I do not feel at liberty to yield my opinion; for, if it be correct, the plt. will still be entitled to hold his verdict to the extent of a partial loss, the amount of which loss is by agreement to be settled by competent parties. And on a careful consideration of the evidence, I feel strongly that this result would be more likely to advance the real justice of the case than the verdict as it now stands.

ADMIRALTY COURT.

Reported by ROBERT A. PRITCHARD, D.C.L., Barrister-at-Law.

Aug. 1, 2, and Nov. 8, 1864.

THE MARIE JOSEPH.

Bill of lading—Stoppage in transitu—Fraud—Bonâ fide transferee for value.

A bill of lading is not, like a bill of exchange or promissory note, a negotiable instrument which passes by mere delivery to a bonâ fide transferee for valuable consideration, without regard to the title of the parties who make the transfer.

Although the shipper may have indorsed in blank a bill of lading deliverable to his assigns, his right is not affected by an appropriation of the bill of lading without his authority, and if he have not authorised the transfer, a subsequent bonâ fide transferee for value cannot make title under it to the goods.

Indorsees of a bill of lading accepted a bill of exchange in payment, and, as further security, deposited the bill of lading with the shippers' agent; but, having afterwards fraudulently obtained possession of the bill of lading, indorsed it to a bonâ fide transferee for value:

Held, that the shippers had not thereby lost their right to stoppage in transitu.

This was a suit under the provisions of the Admiralty Court Act 1861, s. 6, for breach of duty and breach of contract by the master, in respect of goods shipped on board the above-named vessel.

On the 11th Feb. 1864, Walter Stericker, of Kingston-upon-Hull, as agent for Messrs. Maxwell and Dreossi, of Bordeaux, in France, agreed with Messrs. Scarborough and Tadman, of Kingston-upon-Hull, for the sale to them of sixty tons of linseed cake, they paying for the same by their acceptance at three months' date. The linseed cake was accordingly, on the 11th Feb., shipped at Bordeaux on board the Marie Joseph, owned and commanded by Jean Marie Gloahec. Messrs. Maxwell and Dreossi indorsed the bill of lading unto order or assigns, and drew a bill of exchange for the price of the linseed cake on Messrs. Scarborough and Tadman, and forwarded both the bill of lading and the bill of exchange to Stericker, their agent. On the 16th Feb. 1864, Stericker brought both the bill of lading and the bill of exchange, and also a policy of insurance upon the linseed cake, to the office of Scarborough and Tadman. Mr. Scarborough, one of the members of the firm, accepted the bill of exchange, and thereupon Stericker delivered to him the bill of lading duly indorsed by Maxwell and Dreossi, together with the policy of insurance. A conversation then took place, in which some mention was made by Stericker respecting the implication of the firm of Scarborough and Tadman in the affairs of one David Moor, which affairs, since the preceding Christmas, it had been rumoured were embarrassed. Thereupon Mr. Scarborough said, "Let him (Stericker) keep the bill of lading." Accordingly Scarborough handed back the bill of lading and the policy to Stericker, and Stericker signed and gave to Scarborough a receipt for the same in the following terms:

Hull, 16th Feb. 1864.

Memorandum, that I have received of Messrs. Scarborough and Tadman, of Hull, a bill of lading and policy of insurance for about sixty tons of linseed cake, shipped ex Marie Joseph, dated at Bordeaux the 11th Feb. 1864, and which I hold as security against their acceptance of Messrs. Maxwell and Dreossi's draft for 427l. 1s. 4d., due on the 14th May 1864, until the cakes are sold or the vessel arrives.

WALTER STERICKER.

On the 18th Feb. 1864, Mr. Walter Tadman, the other member of the firm of Scarborough and Tadman, called on Stericker, and stated to him that his firm had sold the linseed cake to a Mr. Craydale who would accept a bill of exchange against the bill of lading, and Mr. Tadman asked for the bill of lading. Trusting to this representation, Stericker returned the bill of lading to Tadman; but the representation was untrue, as no such sale had taken place. On the same day, the 18th Feb., but shortly afterwards, Messrs. Pease and Co., the plts., who are bankers in Hull, sent a message to the office of Scarborough and Tadman, requesting one of the members of the firm to call upon them at the bank. It appeared that, on the 18th Jan. preceding, Messrs. Scarborough and Tadman owed the bank 1985l., and were liable on bills which the bank had discounted, and which were running, to the extent of 4847l., while the bank held security only for 850l. On the 18th Feb. the debt had been reduced to 1187l., but the discount liabilities still amounted to 4000l. or thereabouts. Upon receipt of the message Mr. Tadman went to the bank, and took with him the bill of lading, and also some warrants for some rough grass. There he saw Mr. Arthur Pease, a member of the banking firm, who asked him to reduce the debt of the firm, but did not ask him for security. Tadman thereupon offered to him as a security the bill of lading, the policy of insurance, and the warrants, and this offer Mr. Pease accepted. Tadman then indorsed the bill of lading, and delivered it with the other documents, to Mr. Pease, and a memorandum, in the usual form, was drawn up, to the effect that the documents were delivered as security for advances then made, or which might afterwards be made, giving authority to the bank to sell the goods and place the proceeds to the credit of the depositors. This memorandum was not signed by Mr. Tadman, in consequence, as it is sworn, of a mere oversight. Mr. Pease also deposed that at the date of this transaction he did not know the history of the bill of lading, but assumed the bill of lading to be as it purported, the lawful property of Scarborough and Tadman; that he had no suspicion that Scarborough and Tadman were insolvent or on the eve of insolvency, though he knew, through the banking account, that they were mixed up with the dealings of Mr. Moor. Mr. Moor did not become bankrupt till the 4th March.

On the 7th March Scarborough and Tadman also stopped payment. On the 5th March Messrs. Maxwell and Dreossi telegraphed to Stericker to stop the delivery of the linseed cakes, and announced that a bill of lading indorsed to Stericker would be sent by the same post. This was accordingly done, and on the 7th March Stericker received a bill of lading, being a duplicate of the one indorsed to Scarborough and Tadman, except that it was indorsed to him (Stericker). The vessel arrived in Hull on the 5th April. A water clerk came on board first, and told the captain that he thought two persons claimed the cargo, and advised him to be careful. He was shortly afterwards followed by Johnson, the clerk of the solicitors to the plts. Pease and Co., who presented the bill of lading held by the plts., and claimed the cargo. When it was first presented it was not indorsed by Messrs. Pease and Co., the plts.; in fact it was not indorsed till the 7th. On the same day, the 5th, but later, Stericker came on board and presented his bill of lading, and eventually obtained possession of the cargo, the captain receiving an indemnity from Maxwell and Dreossi. On the 9th April Messrs. Pease and Co. commenced this action against the Marie Joseph and her master, and on the 15th April an appearance was entered on behalf of the master.

The evidence was taken vidâ voce before the court itself.

James's Advocates and Clarkson appeared for

J. Q. C. and C. P. Hunt for the defts.

JUNNETON.—The case may at once be of any difficulty occasioned by the second lading indorsed to Stericker, as that bill was indorsed long subsequently to the indorsement of the first bill of lading by Tadman to the defts. Messrs. Maxwell and Drossi had a right to stop in transitu, they did not, in order to exercise their right of lading. The question is, whether Messrs. Maxwell and Drossi had a right to stop in transitu as against Messrs. Pease and Co. the plaintiffs. If the first bill of lading, issued upon the delivery of it to Scarborough and Tadman, had been at once indorsed by them, it would have lost their right to stop in transitu, as against the bank. This is clear upon the authority of Lickbarrow v. Mason, 5 Term Rep. 111; Smith L. Cas. 681, and other cases. It is, however, without disputing (which is impossible) the authority of that case, its applicability in the present instance. The bill of lading, that the indorsement to Pease and Co. of the first bill of lading was not an indorsement, is a consideration. But I cannot doubt that the indorsement averred by Messrs. Pease to cover, and to account, past advances and also advances in future, is, in the view of the law, a valuable consideration; and I know, from undoubted authority, that it is customary for bills of lading to be so covered, and to account, and no one exists as to the validity of such transactions. The cases cited have really no bearing on the present case. Reliance is placed on the case of v. Thompson, 5 Maule & Sel. 351, and upon the fact which holds good even under the late Acts, that a factor, known as a factor, pledge goods entrusted to him as a factor, for past advances made to himself, and of dealing being plainly incompatible with a fiduciary character. In the present case of lading was undoubtedly delivered as a security for such past advances. But Scarborough and Tadman were not factors, they were owners, and dealt with as such by the bank. The case of Patten v. Thompson, and the cases of v. Ruding, 6 Beav. 376, and Re Westinthus, 5 B. & A. 517, plainly show that the use of a bill of lading as a security to a bank for advances, if made by the owner, or by a factor authorized to make such pledge, takes precedence over the right of the vendor to stop in transitu. Another objection was, that this indorsement for valuable consideration, was nevertheless, because fraudulent against creditors of Pease and Tadman. But, to use the words of the judgment in Van Casteel and others v. Booker, 31, "to defeat a payment or transfer made to or for the assignees must show it to be fraudulent against the body of creditors, by proving voluntary on the part of the bankrupt, and imputation of bankruptcy; and if it is made in consequence of the act of the creditor, it is not fraudulent." In the present case, it has not been shown that the indorsement of the bill of lading to Pease by Tadman in contemplation of bankruptcy.

Mr. Pease swears he did not suspect the Scarborough and Tadman to be insolvent; it is shown that it was made in consequence of the advice of Mr. Pease, for Mr. Pease pressed for a sum of the debt of the firm, and it was only then that Tadman offered the bill of lading as a security. On these grounds, therefore, it seems to me clear that, if Scarborough and Tadman had, immediately on receiving the bill of lading, indorsed it to Pease and Co., the vendors would have lost their right to stop in transitu as against the lien of the bank. But there is another most important fact to be considered. The bill was returned to Stericker and obtained back from him by a fraudulent representation on the part of Mr. Tadman, and he, being so fraudulently possessed of it, transfers it to Messrs. Pease. In the case of Gurney v. Behnd, 3 Ell. & Bl. 623, Lord Campbell points out the distinction between a bill of lading and a bill of exchange. He says: "Prima facie the defts. had a right to stop the wheat on 2nd Feb., for it was still in transitu, and they were unpaid owners. The burden is upon the plaintiffs to prove that they had become the owners, and that the right to stop in transitu was gone. For this purpose it is not enough that they had become bona fide holders of the indorsed bill of lading for valuable consideration. A bill of lading is not, like a bill of exchange or promissory note, a negotiable instrument which passes by mere delivery to a bona fide transferee for valuable consideration, without regard to the title of the parties who make the transfer. Although the shipper may have indorsed in blank a bill of lading deliverable to his assigns, his right is not affected by an appropriation of it without his authority. If it be stolen from him, or transferred without his authority, a subsequent bona fide transferee for value cannot make title under it as the shipper of the goods. The bill of lading only represents the goods, and in this instance the transfer of the symbol does not operate more than a transfer of what is represented." Applying this doctrine to the present case: the bill of lading was obtained back from Stericker by Tadman upon false representations—by fraud; it was then negotiated without Stericker's consent, or the consent of the vendor, and contrary to the understanding between Stericker and Tadman. This fraudulent conduct of Tadman, then, rendered invalid the indorsement to Pease and Co., and they, although quite innocent of any participation in it, must bear the consequences. I pronounce against the plaintiffs, of necessity, with costs.

Salvage—Appeal from magistrates—"Sum in dispute"
The Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 464—Jurisdiction—Delay in taking objection.

Upon an application to magistrates for an award of salvage, the plaintiffs claimed the sum of 200*l.*, but afterwards made a formal demand of 40*l.*:

Held, that in such a case the High Court of Admiralty had no jurisdiction to entertain an appeal from the magistrates' decision.

An objection to the jurisdiction of the court may be taken at any time during the progress of the cause.

This was an appeal from a decision of two of Her Majesty's justices of the peace at Southampton, in a salvage claim brought by the owners and master and crew of the steam-tug Phœnix, against the above-named vessel, a brig of 315 tons. The value of the property saved was 1600*l.*, and the salvors claimed a sum not exceeding 200*l.*, and subsequently made a formal demand for 40*l.* The justices, after hearing the evidence adduced, adjudged that no salvage was due, and from their decision the present appeal was prosecuted.

apps., the owners of the Phœnix, and argued that the appeal should not be allowed, as the sum in dispute was under 50*l.*, and that therefore the case was within the provisions of the 464th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. The following is the section referred to:

If any person is aggrieved by the award made by such justices . . . as aforesaid, he may in England appeal to the High Court of Admiralty of England . . . but no such appeal shall be allowed unless the sum in dispute exceeds fifty pounds.

The Admiralty Advocate and E. C. Clarkson for the resps., the owners of the Mary Ann, contra.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This is an appeal from the award of two justices of the peace at Southampton, in an alleged cause of salvage. The owners of the ship have denied the jurisdiction of the court, on the ground that the sum in dispute did not exceed 50*l.*, it being enacted by the 464th section of the Merchant Shipping Act that no appeal shall be allowed unless the sum in dispute exceed 50*l.* The term "sum in dispute" is a somewhat vague expression, but would, in my opinion, have reference, in a case like the present, to any specific sum that has, in fact, been demanded and refused as a remuneration for the services rendered. I lay out of my consideration all loose expressions occurring in conversation between the master of the Mary Ann and the master of the Phœnix; but it appears that the Southampton Steam Towing Company, who are the plts. in this suit, made a formal demand for 40*l.* It is true that the plts. might not, by sending in this demand, absolutely debar themselves from suing for a larger sum; but they have not throughout the proceeding ever demanded a sum exceeding 50*l.* On the contrary, if when the parties went before the justices they demanded any specific sum, it was this sum of 40*l.* This, therefore, constitutes the sum in dispute, and, it being under 50*l.*, no appeal can be entertained by this court. It has been contended that this objection is taken too late, but I apprehend that if at any time the court discovers, and the facts show, that the court has no jurisdiction, it cannot proceed further in the cause. The delay of one or both parties cannot confer jurisdiction. I must dismiss this appeal with costs.

THE SPIRIT OF THE OCEAN.

Limited liability—Registered owners—Liability of part owners.

The owners of a ship who are entitled to the privilege of limited liability are not necessarily those whose names appear upon the ship's register.

The master, also part owner of a ship, sold his shares, but before the transfer had been registered, the ship, through the master's default, came into collision with and damaged another vessel:

Held, that the master was not an owner so as to affect the privilege of limited liability.

Part owners are not partners, and therefore, semble, that the error or misconduct of one part owner would not forfeit the right of his co-owners to limited liability.

This was a suit for the purpose of limiting the liability of the owners of the British ship Spirit of the Ocean, 577 tons.

The Spirit of the Ocean, on the 22nd Nov., came into collision with the Robin Hood, whose owners and the owners of the cargo of the Robin Hood, having brought an action against the Spirit of the Ocean, the present action was brought for the purpose of asserting the right of the owners of the Spirit of the Ocean to the privilege of limited liability.

E. C. Clarkson appeared for the plts.

F. Lushington for the defts.—The master, who was then also part owner, was on board the vessel at the time of the collision, and to blame for it. The 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 shows that in such a case there can be no limited liability, at least as respects the master. The following is the section referred to:

The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say . . . Where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat; be answerable in damages . . . to an aggregate amount exceeding fifteen pounds for each ton of their ship's tonnage.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Upon the assumed state of facts in this case several questions of law were raised, and especially that the co-owners of the master were not entitled to limited liability. But it is first necessary to consider what is the real state of the facts, and whether the master was or was not a co-owner at the time within the meaning of the statute. The state of facts appears to be this, that Roulle Cary, the father of the master, owned several shares in this vessel, and that, early in the year 1864, in order to enable his son to become master, he transferred to him six shares. In the month of July his son, by bill of sale, re-transferred to his father the shares, which bill of sale was not registered at the time of the collision. Then the question is—assuming the son to be on board and to blame for the collision—whether he was a part owner, as the bill of sale was not registered? The solution of this question depends upon the meaning which the court must ascribe to the term "owners" in the 54th section of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862. If the court is bound by the terms of that section to hold that it means registered owners, whatsoever may be the circumstances of the case, then the court must hold, of course, that the master was an owner in respect of this collision. Very properly in the argument reference was made to many of the other sections of this Act, and, indeed, to prior Acts of Parliament; but I must confess that they throw but a very dim light upon the question I have to determine. Neither am I helped much by the fact that the former state of the law, which rigidly excluded all equitable interests, and held that nothing could be noticed which did not appear upon the registry, is now altered. The cases, too, which have been cited, though incidentally throwing some light upon the arguments raised, are not so pertinent to the present question as to afford me very material assistance as to deciding it. I bear in mind, however, though for very different purposes, that the present state of the law does allow cognisance of equitable interests. The object of the statute clearly was, to relieve from limited responsibility those who, as owners of the ship, had the government thereof, and were entitled to the advantages arising therefrom, and exposed to the risk consequent upon navigation, provided always that those owners had not incurred any blame as to the collision in question. Negligence or misconduct would forfeit this, which I may call a privilege. Supposing one part owner alone to blame, it appears to me contrary to the principle on which that enactment is founded, to hold that his error or misconduct would affect the innocent co-owners, for it is personal blame which is the ground of the forfeiture from limited liability. It must be recollected that co-owners of ships are not partners. I think that I am justified in giving to the word this latitude of construction, and that I ted in this opinion by the judgment in Dickson, 2 B. & Al., though that judgment d not in a case of collision and upon a ifferently worded. The terms of the c. 159, s. 1, are both singular and plural: person or persons who is or are owner or part owner or owners, of any vessel, shall o answer for any damage arising by reason glect without the fault or privity of such owners." Those of the 504th section of hant Shipping Act 1854 are singular o owner of any sea-going ship, or share all, in cases where any of the following or without his actual fault or privity." those of the 54th section of the Mer- pping Act Amendment Act 1862 are ily, viz.: "The owners of any ship, British or foreign, shall not, in cases of the following events occur without al fault or privity." But although this is found in the phraseology, it seems im- o infer therefrom that the Legislature o impose upon one owner a new liability faults of his co-owner. Whatever, there- opinion might be with respect to Mr. Cary, ould not hold that his co-owners were y his fault or negligence. A contrary ould, I think, be opposed to the spirit of and not reconcilable with justice. But et to Mr. Cary, jun., does the absence of n compel me to consider him an owner e meaning of the 54th section of the Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862? d that it is the duty of the vendee, and st also, to register his title, as without n the vendee would not be entitled to the efits of ownership. But apart from regis- e execution of the bill of sale entirely e title of the vendor. Such is the case by ry law of nations, and I think, too, by the law of this country. Registration is but of a fact done—a record of the sale, not itself; and though formerly, unless the l been made, the law would not take cog- f any interest in shipping, yet this was r virtue of statute only, and as the execu- e bill of sale then divested the interest in r where not prohibited by statute, such the present state of the law, the statutory aying now been repealed. I cannot doubt ll the reasons upon which limited liability l apply to Mr. Cary, sen. equally with owners, and I see nothing in the Act to e giving that construction to the 54th l pronounce for the limitation of liability, he costs occasioned by opposing it.

THE INDIA.

Bottomry—Obsolete statute—Repeal.

User is not sufficient to repeal a statute, but of non-user may be important in considering ion whether or no the statute has been re- implication.

1, c. 21, s. 2, which prohibits loans of money ry of vessels designed to trade in the East as, since the other restrictions upon the East ide have been removed, been repealed by impli-

a cause as to the validity of a bottomry a foreign vessel engaged in the India

In Jan. 1859 the India, a Monte Video vessel, left Monte Video bound for Calcutta with a cargo of horses; and in February following, the vessel being, in the course of the voyage, in Table Bay, the master borrowed some money on bottomry from a British subject there; and on his arrival at Calcutta he gave another bond, in favour also of British subjects, and payable at the Mauritius. In the answer put in by the owner of the India it was alleged that both bonds were void, by reason of the 7 Geo. 1, c. 21, s. 2.

The following is the section referred to:

... All contracts and agreements whatsoever . . . made by any of His Majesty's subjects, or any person or persons in trust for them for or upon the loan of any moneys by way of bottomry on any ship or ships in the service of foreigners, and bound or designed to trade in the East Indies, or parts aforesaid . . . shall be and are hereby declared to be void.

(See also 19 Geo. 2, c. 37, s. 5.)

Deane, Q. C. and Clarkson, for the bondholders, moved the court to reject the answer.

V. Lushington for the owner.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—Though a British Act of Parliament does not become inoperative by mere non-user, however long the time may have been since it was known to have been actually put in force, yet the fact of non-user may be extremely important when the question is, whether there has been a repeal by implication. What words will establish a repeal by implication, it is impossible to say. If, on the one hand, the general presumption must be against such a repeal, on the ground that the intention to repeal, if any had existed, would have been declared in express terms, on the other hand it is clear that it is not necessary that any express reference be made to the statute which is to be repealed. A prior statute would, I conceive, be repealed by implication if its provisions were wholly incompatible with a subsequent one; or, if the two statutes together would lead to wholly absurd consequences; or, if the entire subject-matter has been so dealt with in subsequent statutes that, according to all ordinary reasoning, the particular provisions in the prior statute could not have been intended to subsist. Before the passing of the statute 7 Geo. 1, c. 21, the whole of the East India trade was a strict monopoly in the hands of the East India Company. Not only had there been a series of parliamentary charters, but foreign ships were further excluded from trading to British possessions in India by virtue of the Navigation Act, 13 Car. 2, c. 18. The statute of 7 Geo. 1, c. 21, confirms the monopoly, the title being "An Act for the further preventing His Majesty's subjects from trading to the East Indies under foreign commissions, and for encouraging and further securing the lawful trade thereof." The 2nd section contains several provisions for preventing any foreign trade, and, amongst others, it prohibits all contracts of bottomry by British subjects on ships in the service of foreigners. It is manifest the sole object of this prohibition is the protection of the monopoly. The relaxation of this monopoly was a gradual process, both as to place and person. The monopoly continued longer as to China than as to the East Indies, and excluded foreigners longer than British subjects, other than the servants of the company. The abolition, so far as it concerns British subjects, was effected by the 2nd section of the 3 & 4 Will. 4, c. 93 (an Act to regulate the trade to China and India), which declares that notwithstanding any provisions made for the purpose of protecting the exclusive rights of the trade theretofore enjoyed by the company in any Act of Parliament contained, it should be lawful for any of His Majesty's subjects to carry on trade with any countries beyond the Cape of Good Hope to the Straits of Magellan. Then, with regard to foreigners, in 1797 the statute of Geo. 3, c. 117, was passed, reciting the Navigation Act, and empowered the directors of the East India Company to admit foreign ships to trade to the East Indies, notwithstanding the statute. The Court of Directors exercised this power by issuing a regulation which provides, "that foreign ships belonging to every state or country in Europe or in America, so long as such states or countries respectively remain in amity with Her Majesty, may freely enter the British seaports and harbours in the East Indies, whether they come directly from their own country or from any other place, and shall there be hospitably received, and shall have liberty to trade there in imports and exports conformably to the regulations established or to be established in such seaports," and then follows a proviso that they shall not engage in the coasting trade. Since that period various other measures have been adopted to put the foreign trade of India on the same footing as the trade carried on in British vessels and by British subjects. By an Act of the Government of India the duties on goods imported or exported in foreign or British vessels were equalised, and by another Act the coasting trade of India was thrown open to foreign vessels on the same terms as to British vessels. The trade therefore to India is now as open to foreign as to British vessels. If that be so, not only have all possible reasons for the prohibition contained in sect. 2 of 7 Geo. 1, c. 21, of bottomry upon foreign vessels engaged in the India trade, ceased to exist, but the continuance of that statute would be inconsistent with the state of trade as established by subsequent statutes. I therefore am of opinion that the statute 7 Geo. 1, c. 21, s. 2, is repealed by implication.

BARING v. HARRIS.

Sale of a ship—Injunction—Costs.

Defts., W. and Co., agreed, in consideration of the plts. accepting bills to a fixed amount (5000l.) drawn by them, to place the plts. in funds to meet the bills out of the proceeds of ships and deals coming to W. and Co. from their foreign consignor, who was a shipbuilder. W. and Co. having received from their consignor a certificate of sale of a ship then on its way to them, applied to the deft. Y. for an advance on the ship by way of mortgage. Y. objecting, on the ground that the certificate did not authorise a mortgage, W. and Co. entered into a collusive sale of the ship to the deft. L., to whom Y., in ignorance of the private arrangement between W. and Co. and L., then advanced the required sum by way of mortgage.

W. and Co., stopping payment shortly afterwards, plts. claimed a charge on the ship, and prayed to have a sale, or that they might be allowed to redeem, and that the amount of the bills might be paid out of the proceeds of sale; also, for an injunction against Y.:

Held, that the plts., though they might have a right of action as against W. and Co., had no right to a charge on this particular ship; also, that they had no right to challenge the sale to L. and the mortgage to Y., unless they established a case of fraudulent collusion against themselves:

Held, further, that as there was no proof that Y. had any knowledge of the plts.' equitable title, the charge of fraudulent collusion with W. and Co., as against him, must fail, and injunction (which had been granted by Kindersley, V.C.) dissolved.

Where an app. succeeds on appeal in having an order made against him in the court below dismissed with costs, it is a salutary and desirable rule that he should have the costs of the appeal, and the old practice in this respect may be considered to be abolished.

This was an appeal from an order of Kindersley, V.C., whereby he granted an injunction at the suit of the plts., Messrs. Baring Brothers, restraining the defts. (except the deft. Mitchell) from mortgaging, selling, transferring, or otherwise dealing with a ship called the Smyrna, under the following circumstances.

The deft. Peter Mitchell, who lived at Miramichi, in New Brunswick, in 1864 applied to the plts. and asked them to open a credit in favour of Messrs. George Wright and Co., of Liverpool (the firm under which the defts. Harris and Van Wart carried on business), and proposed that any advances the plts. might make should be secured by the proceeds of ships and deals to be consigned by Mitchell to Wright and Co. The plts. agreed to open a credit in favour of Wright and Co., to the extent of 5000l., on receiving security on (as they alleged) all ships and deals to be consigned, as aforesaid, by Mitchell; and on the 3rd March Messrs. Wright and Co. wrote to the plts. as follows:

Herein we inclose letters from Hon. Peter Mitchell, of Miramichi, requesting you to open a credit to extent of 5000l. in our favour to be drawn for in bills at four months' date from time to time as we may require them. We hereby undertake to place you in funds to retire said bills at their maturity, out of proceeds of sales of ships and deals coming to us from said gentleman. Hoping to hear from you in confirmation of this credit,—We remain, yours respectfully,

GEORGE WRIGHT and Co."

The plts. upon this accepted four bills of exchange drawn upon them by Wright and Co., payable at four months each; two, dated 5th July 1864, for 1500l. each; a third, dated the same day, for 1000l.; and the fourth, dated 8th July 1863, for 1000l.

The Smyrna was a ship of which Peter Mitchell was the owner, and which, in Aug. 1864, had been sent by him to Wright and Co. for sale in this country.

In Sept. 1864, Wright and Co. applied to the deft. Yates, who was the secretary and manager of the company called the Maritime Credit Company (Limited), for an advance upon the ship, which had not yet arrived. Yates, finding that the certificate of sale which had been sent by Peter Mitchell to the deft. Harris did not authorise a mortgage, refused to make the advance; whereupon Wright and Co. entered into an arrangement with the deft. Lockwood, who was in the employ of Cunard and Co., by which they purported to execute a bill of sale, dated the 21st Sept., to him for 3500l.; and on the same day Lockwood mortgaged the ship to Yates for 2250l. The names of Lockwood as owner, and Yates as mortgagee of the ship, were now upon the register. It appeared that Yates departed somewhat from the usual course of business in these matters, by insisting that the bill of mortgage from Lockwood to him should be indorsed by Wright and Co.

In the early part of October Wright and Co. stopped payment.

The plts., alleging that they had a charge on "all ships and deals to be consigned for sale" by Peter Mitchell to Wright and Co., and that Peter Mitchell intended that the proceeds of the sale of the ship Smyrna should be applied in providing for the bills, claimed to be entitled to a charge on the ship, and accordingly filed this bill for an injunction in the terms above.

BARING v. HARRIS.

[CHAN.]

The bill alleged, paragraph 12, that if in fact Yates advanced 2250*l.* on the security of the ship, the money was paid to Wright and Co. and not to Lockwood, and that Yates knew at the time that the ship had been sent over for sale, and that the left. Harris and his firm had received a certificate of sale from Peter Mitchell, and had no authority to mortgage the ship, also that Lockwood was not the owner of the ship, and that it had been transferred to him to hold as trustee for Wright and Co.

The bill prayed for a declaration that the plts. were entitled to a lien or charge on the ship; that it might be sold, or that they might redeem, and that the proceeds of the ship when sold might be applied in payment of the bills; also for an injunction.

Lockwood, in his evidence, admitted that the understanding between Wright and Co. and himself was that he was to resell the ship to Wright and Co. for the difference between the purchase-money and the mortgage, but said that this arrangement was carefully concealed from Yates.

The V.C. having on the 14th Nov. granted the injunction, the defts. now appealed.

Glasse, Q.C. and Kay were for the deft. Yates.—The V. C. relied upon the decision in Orr v. Dickinson, 1 Johns. 1; where Wood, V.C. held the registry not to be binding evidence of a sale, in a case where the sale was not in accordance with the power of sale contained in the certificate; and his Honour thought the same principle applied to this case, the sale to Lockwood being, in his opinion, not a bonâ fide transaction. But the plts. had no right to follow this particular ship; and in this instance no such fraud or collusion had been proved as to enable the court to go behind the registry and set aside the sale to Lockwood, still less to set aside the mortgage to Yates, who was proved to be without knowledge of the transaction.

Baily, Q.C. and Cotton for the plts.—As against Yates, they said there was no authority to mortgage the ship at all; and as against Lockwood they supported the V. C.'s view, that the transaction was not a bonâ fide sale. Yates's suspicions ought to have been sufficiently aroused to have put him upon inquiry; and he must be held to have had constructive notice of the fact that Wright and Co. were the owners of the ship, of which indeed it appeared he had some knowledge, from the circumstance of his requiring their indorsement to Lockwood's certificate.

Glasse, Q.C. replied.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—The plts., by their bill, seek to have it declared that they are entitled to a specific lien or charge upon a particular ship called the Smyrna, and they impeach the mortgage of one of the defts., or rather of the company represented by one of the defts., Yates, and, if that mortgage be held to be valid, they then seek to redeem the mortgage. Now, the first subject of inquiry is the nature of the plt.'s title. The title is rested on two documents. To render them intelligible, it is necessary to state that one of the defts., Mr. Mitchell, a large shipbuilder, and apparently a timber merchant at New Brunswick, was desirous of opening an account with the plts., and having credit with them to the extent of 5000*l.* They agreed to open that account with him, and to give him that credit upon the faith of the engagement entered into in two letters. By one of those letters, written by Mr. Mitchell to the plts., after requesting that he might have credit to the extent of 5000*l.*, he tells the plts. that he incloses them the undertaking of his Liverpool agents, Messrs. Wright and Co., to appropriate sufficient to meet certain bills for 5000*l.*, which it was proposed that his agents should draw, when those bills arrived at maturity, out of the proceeds of ships, deals, &c., "sent to them by me." The undertaking of Messrs. Wright and Co., the agents, which was inclosed in that letter, is, in the material part of it, "We hereby undertake to place you in funds to retire the said bills" (which are previously described to be bills at four months for 5,000*l.*) "at their maturity out of proceeds of ships and deals coming to us from the said gentleman." No ships, no particular cargo, no specific property is mentioned. It is contended by the plts. that the words are sufficient to denote and to include all ships and all cargoes of deals that might be sent by Mr. Mitchell to Wright and Co., whilst any sum of money was due from Mitchell to the plts. I think it would be straining the language very much to give the words that interpretation, but I do not mean to let my decision rest upon that. I will suppose for the purpose of this motion, that the word "coming" shall be interpreted properly to include deals and ships that were not only coming, but might from time to time come, from Mr. Mitchell to Wright and Co. for the purposes of sale. Now, the only engagement and the only title which the plts. can rely upon are the engagements that I have read. It is one single transaction only; it is not that bills are to be drawn from time to time, but that one set of bills shall be paid out of the proceeds of consignments. Assuming, then, that the ship Smyrna, which is the property in question, had not been consigned to Wright and Co. at the time when these letters were written, which is the fact—for it appears by the bill itself that the ship was not despatched from New Brunswick until the month of Aug. 1864—assuming, I say, that the ship comes within the description of "ships and deals coming to Wright and Co.," within the language of this letter, the question is, whether the plts. have, by the subsequent transactions which are alleged and proved, made any case that will entitle them specifically to follow this particular ship? Now I can, undoubtedly, conceive a case of Wright and Co. having received ships and cargoes of deals applicable to the payment of the plt.'s debt, and wilfully refusing to deal with them for that purpose, and fraudulently applying them for their own use. In such a case as that which I have supposed, it might undoubtedly be possible for the plts. to maintain a bill of this sort, to prevent the property dedicated by Mitchell to the purpose of paying the plts.' debt being perverted by the consignees Wright and Co. to another and fraudulent purpose inconsistent with the directions of Mitchell. But is any case of the kind raised by this bill? The only case that is raised by this bill is simply in a few words this: that Wright and Co. received from Mitchell directions to sell this ship the Smyrna, and that being so directed, they thought it more desirable to mortgage the ship than to sell it, and that they were endeavouring to raise money by way of mortgage; but finding that was impossible, they devised a plan of a collusive sale in order that the purchaser might go into the market and mortgage the ship, they receiving the proceeds of the mortgage. Well, that case is a case in which it would have been competent for Mitchell to have had some relief against the mortgagee, against the pretended purchaser, and against his agents Wright and Co. But what title does that give to the plts. to have any relief, unless it be accompanied with allegations, and with proof of those allegations, which are not to be found in the case before me, that this proceeding was designed by Wright and Co. for the purpose of defrauding the plts., and that the money received by Wright and Co. was money that they intended to apply in a manner inconsistent with the directions of Mitchell to pay the plts., and inconsistent with their duty to Mitchell and with the engagement that they had entered into with the plts.? There is no such case alleged upon the face of the bill. The only case made by the bill is, that the money having been received by Wright and Co., they refuse to apply that money in payment of the plts. What title does that give to the plts. to pursue the ship? It may give a title to the plts. to sue Wright and Co. on that engagement, but if the money received upon the mortgage has thus come into the hands of Wright and Co., the refusal of Wright and Co. to apply that money in payment of the plts. could not give the plts. any title whatever to pursue the ship, though it might give the plts. a title to bring an action upon their undertaking against Wright and Co. But that is not the point on which I think the case should be decided. The right of the plt., as against the ship itself, can only arise in a court of equity, provided he is in a condition to show that the defts., against whom he seeks relief, have been fraudulently colluding together to deprive him of his right to receive his money out of the proceeds of the ship. For that purpose it is not only necessary for the plt. to make out a case of such collusion between the defts., but it is necessary for him to prove that the defts. against whom he seeks relief had notice of his equitable title. That is attempted to be alleged by the bill in the twelfth paragraph, but there is not one particle of evidence in support of the allegation that Yates, the mortgagee, against whom the injunction has been directed, had any notice whatever of the title of the plt., or of the right of the plt. as against Wright and Co. But then, when we look at the transaction itself, I am obliged to come to the conclusion that the charge against Yates of having been guilty of fraudulently conspiring with Wright and Co. in a transaction which was either wrong as against the plt. or wrong as against Mitchell, is wholly unsupported. It is, in my opinion, a mere gratuitous, unfounded allegation. The transaction appears to have been of this nature. Wright and Co. applied to Yates, who was the managing officer of a particular commercial insurance company to borrow a sum of money upon this ship. They produced the certificate which had been sent by Mitchell to one of their firm, a gentleman of the name of Harris, containing directions or power to Harris to sell the ship. Yates immediately refused, after consulting his solicitor, to advance money by way of mortgage upon the ship. Some short time afterwards the application for a mortgage of the ship is renewed by Mr. Lockwood, and Mr. Lockwood represents to Yates that he had become the purchaser of the ship for the sum of 3500/., which appears to have been her value, and that he was desirous of mortgaging the ship in order that he might get money to pay off what remained due in respect of that purchase. Now, there is no reason whatever, there is no circumstance whatever assigned or suggested, why Yates, who had refused the first application, should have assented to the second application, save this, that Yates tells us, and I entirely believe him, that he believed the transaction to be a bonâ fide transaction, and that Lockwood was really the bonâ fide purchaser of the ship. Now, there is a circumstance, undoubtedly, that proves to my mind that, as between Wright and Co. and Lockwood, it was a collusive transaction, and that circumstance is, that the engagement between them was, that Lockwood should resell the ship to Wright and Co. for the difference between the money borrowed, namely, 2250/., and the amount of his purchase-money, 3500/.. But that circumstance is not brought home to the knowledge of Yates. There is no person who alleges any circumstances which render it in the smallest degree probable that this particular fact was known to Yates, or suspected by Yates at that time. I can find no reason why Yates, who had rejected the first application, should have acceded to the second application, except that he thought the first application unwarranted, and that the second application was legal and warranted. Well then, the plts. insist upon the fact, that Lockwood was accompanied by Mr. Harris, the partner in the firm of Wright and Co., and that when the mortgage was completed, and the 2250/.. handed over by Yates to Lockwood, Lockwood, in the presence of Yates, immediately transferred the money to the hands of Harris; and it is said that those circumstances were so suspicious that they should have put Yates upon inquiry. I cannot understand how that inquiry could have led Yates to any knowledge of the plt.'s title. If the circumstance was at all suspicious, it could have led Yates only to the conclusion that the authority and directions of Mitchell had not been properly observed and carried into effect by Wright and Co. But I deny that the circumstance which is relied on by the plts. was, under the facts of the case, at all a suspicious one, or a circumstance that should have led Mr. Yates to withhold the completion of the transaction, or to make any further inquiry. Lockwood had told him that he wanted to mortgage the ship to complete the purchase. It was a very natural thing that the vendor should attend in order to receive the mortgage-money, upon the completion of the mortgage. Yates swears that it was a bonâ fide transaction on the part of his company. There is nothing unusual, nothing extravagant, in the terms of the transaction to render it at all probable that it is one in any respect out of the ordinary character of these transactions. No undue advantage was gained by Yates's company. The terms of the loan, made by Yates to Lockwood, are terms in themselves reasonable, and not pretended to be otherwise than in accordance with the ordinary tenor of business transactions of this nature. I must hold, therefore, that there is not the smallest pretence for alleging or for suspecting, from the facts of this case, that there was anything improper in the transaction, or that Yates either knew or believed, or had any reason whatever that should induce him to know or believe, that there was any improper dealing between the parties before him, and that if he had investigated further into that improper dealing, he would have arrived at the conclusion that the plts. had any interest. Before the plts. can bring Yates into this court to answer their bill in respect of a fraudulent transaction, they must undoubtedly prove that Yates had notice of the plts.' title, and that Yates was aware that the transaction was one that was injurious to the rights of the plts. That entirely fails; the impeachment of the transaction itself entirely fails; and I am clearly of opinion that there was no warranty whatever for the granting of this injunction. It is said that the injunction has been continued by the V.C. with a view of having the matter more fully considered at the hearing. That is not a reason why an injunction of this kind should be continued, nor is it any reason why, on the ground of fraud, neither sufficiently alleged, and very far from being in any manner proved, the right of the defts., in respect of the mortgage of this ship, should be taken away. But, further, I am clearly of opinion that there is not in the case any ground for supposing it probable that any further evidence can be adduced for the purpose of elucidating the transaction, or in proving the right of the plt. at the hearing. Affidavits have been made by all the parties that can be brought forward, or that appear to have been implicated in the matter; the important persons have been cross-examined, and it is not suggested on the part of the plt. that there are any materials for further evidence or further explanation of the circumstances that he will be enabled to adduce at the hearing. Now, it is quite unnecessary for me to consider the point that might arise upon the Ships Registry Act, if I had been of opinion that there was anything that might give ground for the court interfering against Wright, and so as to put Wright to the necessity of insisting upon the title that Lockwood had in respect of the bill of sale. If it had been necessary to go into that matter I should have required very considerable argument upon it, and if that were the ground on which I thought it at all probable that the case would turn, why then I should have been of opinion that it might be desirable to keep matters in statu quo till the hearing. But I decide the case upon the ground that the allegation of any fraud or complicity in a fraudulent transaction by Wright and Co., as against Yates, is wholly unwarranted. There is nothing to justify or to make out the truth of the probability of any such allegation, and upon that ground I dissolve the injunction with costs.

BARING v. HARRIS.

Glasse, Q. C. asked his Lordship to include in the order the costs of the motion in the court below.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he could not give the costs of the appeal, but he reversed the V. C.'s order, and substituted for it the order which he thought ought to have been made in the court below, namely, that the bill be dismissed with costs.

Glasse, Q. C. then asked his Lordship that the costs of the appeal might be costs in the cause.

The LORD CHANCELLOR was afraid he could not do that.

Glasse, Q. C. said that the inclination of the court of late years had been very much to consider that the rule of the Privy Council applied, that the wrong-doer should pay the whole of the costs of the litigation.

The LORD CHANCELLOR said he should be very glad if that were the rule of the court.

After some discussion, the case stood over for an interval, to allow of cases being cited.

Glasse, Q. C. then said, they were all agreed that it had been the practice of the Lords Justices in several cases to give the costs of the appeal, as well as the costs in the court below:

Lillie v. Legh, 3 De G. & J. 210;
Ralli v. The Universal Marine, &c. Company, 5 L. T. Rep. N. S. 390; Collins v. Burton, 4 De G. & J. 618;
Beton on Decrees, 1157;
Liedermann v. Schultz, 14 C. B. 52.

Malins, Q. C. (amicus curie) mentioned
Powell v. Lovegrove, Jur. (56), 791.

Baily, Q. C. said he quite admitted that the former rule, not to give the costs of the appeal when the appeal was successful, had been broken in upon, and the Lords Justices in many cases had so given the costs. They had not adopted the rule of the Privy Council, that the costs are to be given in all cases; but they had broken in upon the rule that costs were to be given in no case, and they exercised a discretion whether they should give the costs or not.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—If that be so—and I am very glad to find it is—I think the alteration introduced by the Lords Justices is a very wholesome alteration, and I have no hesitation in giving you the costs of the appeal.

Ex parte CHAVASSE, re GRAZEBROOK.

Contract between neutrals to convey munitions of war to a belligerent power—Rights of neutrals—Royal proclamation.

The rights which the laws of war give to a belligerent for his protection do not involve as a consequence that the act of the neutral in transporting munitions of war to the other belligerent is either a personal offence against the belligerent captor, or an act which gives him any ground of complaint against either the neutral trader, or the Government of which he is a subject. All that international law does, is to subject the neutral merchant who transports the contraband of war to the risk of having his ship and cargo captured and condemned by the belligerent power for whose enemy the contraband is destined.

The object of a Royal proclamation is only to make known the existing law; it can neither make nor unmake the law. Hence, the Proclamation of the 13th May 1861, whereby the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act were enforced, and the subjects of the Crown were warned of the risks they incurred by sending contraband of war to either of the belligerent powers in America, had no effect upon the legality of an adventure for transporting munitions of war to the Confederate States.

This was an appeal from an order of Mr. Commissioner Perry, of the Liverpool district, dated the 29th Sept. 1864, whereby he dismissed with costs a petition of the present apps., Thomas Chavasse, Isaac Jenks and William George Dixon (who were trustees of a trust-deed executed by the below-mentioned Horace Chavasse, of Birmingham, on the 19th Feb. 1864, in the bankruptcy under the following circumstances:

On the 17th June 1863, William Joshua Grazebrook, merchant and commission agent of Liverpool, was adjudicated a bankrupt.

In or about the year 1862, Horace Chavasse, who was a sword manufacturer, agreed with the bankrupt to purchase on a joint account arms and ammunition, and to consign them to Thomas Barrett Power, a friend of the bankrupt, then carrying on business as a merchant at Galveston, and afterwards at Wilmington and Charleston, in the Confederate States of America, to be by him sold in the said States for and on the joint benefit and account of Chavasse and the bankrupt. The arrangement was that Chavasse should purchase the arms and ammunition on the joint account, and that he should draw on the bankrupt, and that the bankrupt should accept bills for a portion of the price, such bills to be from time to time renewed until remittances arrived from Power. In pursuance of this agreement, H. Chavasse made purchases on the joint speculation, for which he drew bills of exchange, which were accepted by the bankrupt as an advance upon the invoice prices of the goods. These goods were consigned by Chavasse to Messrs. Lawrence and Co., the charterers from Messrs. Pearson and Co. of Hull, the owners of the steamer Modern Greece, then lying at that port, for shipment on board the vessel, bound for any port in the Confederate States which Power, who was the supercargo of the vessel, might think it safe to enter. The bills of lading were made out in the name and to the order of the bankrupt alone, but were distinguished from those of his own private consignment.

Ex parte CHAVASSE, re GRAZEBROOK.

The goods, consisting principally of rifles and cartridges, were shipped on board the Modern Greece, and the vessel set sail on the 20th April 1862. In the course of her voyage she was wrecked off Wilmington, a considerable portion of the cargo was totally lost, and the rest much damaged. The portions of the property that were saved from the wreck were taken on shore by Power, and sold by him, realising 64,303 dols. 64c., in which sum the bankrupt and Chavasse were interested, in respect of their joint adventure, to the extent of 48,243 dols. 12c. Of the former amount, 26,616 dols. 64c., equal to 2000*l.* sterling, was remitted by Power in cash; and with the residue he bought 248,179*lb.* of cotton, which was now stored or warehoused in the Confederate States. In this amount of goods the bankrupt was interested to the extent of 77,387*lb.*, and Chavasse to the extent of 120,007*lb.*

The petition, after stating the above circumstances, proceeded to say that none of the bills accepted by the bankrupt had been honoured, and that no remittance had been received in respect of the cotton, and that the petitioners were desirous of having the cotton apportioned between the parties entitled thereto; and prayed the court to make an order enabling the petitioners to obtain possession of and to receive, as such trustees as aforesaid, the proportionate part or share of or to which they were so entitled as aforesaid, of and in the said cotton, or that the court would make such further order as it might think fit.

Since the bankruptcy, the cotton, which was still at Wilmington, had been taken possession of by the assignees.

Daniel, Q. C., De Ger and Thomas Jones (of the common law bar) supported the appeal.—In the first place, whatever unlawful intentions might be attributable to Grazebrook or Chavasse, no such intentions could be imputed to the assignees or trustees of either. But it was said that this petition could not be entertained, because it disclosed that this property was purchased with the produce of the sale of goods which were contraband of war, and which could have entered Wilmington only by the breaking of the blockade. But first, a state of war did not render illegal any dealings between neutrals as regarded contraband of war. Secondly, with reference to all questions that could be raised by belligerents, it could not be alleged on the part or in the interest of any belligerent power, that contracts to do things which were forbidden by the municipal laws of a foreign state were illegal, it could only be alleged that those contracts were illegal which were for doing things forbidden by English municipal law. Thirdly, with respect to international law, no doubt international law was part of the law of England, but only to this extent, that when a state of war arose, any of Her Majesty's subjects who thought proper to run the risk, were subject to the ordinary penal consequences. Every one who exported munitions of war to Wilmington knew that they were liable to lawful capture. But the only risk to which the consignor was exposed, was that of capture by the belligerent without any remedy being afforded by English law. Fourthly, as to the Queen's proclamation of the 13th May 1861, in the first place, that proclamation did not and could not make the law. But, moreover, its single object was to preserve the absolute neutrality of the Government of Great Britain. It was directed to two objects: first, to prevent any violation of the Foreign Enlistment Act; and secondly, to warn British subjects of the risk they ran of confiscation by carrying contraband of war to either belligerent power. Fifthly, in order to render a contract illegal, it must be either malum prohibitum or malum in se. This was not a malum prohibitum. The prerogative only extended to dealing with the rights of the Queen's subjects within the limits of the law. It did not take away the right of the subject to deal in certain articles; it only imposed upon that dealing certain penalties. (Holman v. Johnson, 10 W. R. 341.) There was no illegality whatever in the contract; but if the court should be of opinion that the sale was an illegal transaction, it then remained to consider how far that illegal transaction, having come to an end, could taint with illegality the subsequent purchase; whether the defectum of selling ammunition could be followed into the cotton. (Bird v. Appleton, 6 Term Rep. 566.) Lastly, a mere proclamation was not sufficient per se to constitute a blockade; and in this instance it was notoriously incomplete:

The Belpy, 1 Rob. Adm. Rep. 55.

Apinacoff, Q. C. and Charles Russell, for the resp., the assignees of the bankrupt, supported the commissioner's judgment.—No species of property or interest at risk on a sea venture can be the subject of a valid contract if the course of trade, or the voyage in prosecution of which it is so exposed to risk, be in contravention either of the law of the land or the laws of nations: (Arnould Mar. Ins. 736.) Further, no court of justice can interpose to assist either of the parties to an illegal contract. A voyage to a blockaded port, after notification of the blockade, is an illegal voyage; and in this instance it was admitted that the intention of the master was to endeavour to break the blockade:

The Neptune, 2 Rob. Adm. Rep. 110;

Naylor v. Taylor, 9 B. & Cr. 722;

Medhurst v. Hill, 6 Bing. 224;

The Tulea, 6 Rob. Adm. Rep. 177.

It is one of the duties incumbent on the subjects of a neutral state to abstain from every act that tends directly to the assistance of either of the belligerents in the prosecution of a war: (Duer on Mar. Ins. 623, 726.) The law of nations, where any question arises which is properly the subject of its jurisdiction, is adopted as part of the common law; and where the individuals of any state violate this general law it is the duty of the Government under which they live to animadvert upon them with becoming severity: (4 Steph. Com. 296.) If a voyage be prohibited by law, it follows that any contract to perform that voyage is impliedly and by consequence prohibited; no claim can be supported through the medium of an illegal agreement:

Wilkinson v. Lonsdale, 8 M. & W. 126;

De Meuron v. De Meuron, 12 East. 226;

Thompson v. Thompson, 7 Ves. 478;

Armstrong v. Armstrong, 8 M. & W. 64.

As to the prerogative of the Crown to inhibit the exportation of certain goods by proclamation, see Bac. Abr. "Prerog." B. 405; and as to the statutory power of the Crown to prohibit the exportation of arms and ammunition, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 139. The illegality of the present adventure was shown beyond all controversy by the terms of the Royal proclamation of the 13th May 1861. Upon these grounds, therefore, the petitioners had no locus standi in a court of justice in this country, and the appeal must be dismissed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR reserved judgment.

April 22.—The LORD CHANCELLOR, after reviewing the facts of the case, said:—In the view of international law, the commerce of nations is perfectly free and unrestricted. The subjects of each nation have a right to interchange the products of labour with the inhabitants of every other country. If hostilities occur between two nations, and they become belligerents, neither belligerent has a right to impose, or to require a neutral Government to impose, any restrictions on the commerce of its subjects. The belligerent power certainly acquires certain rights which are given to it by international law. One of these is the right to arrest and capture, when found on the sea, the high road of nations, any munitions of war which are destined and in the act of being transported in a neutral ship to its enemy. This right, which the laws of war give to a belligerent for his protection, does not involve as a consequence that the act of the neutral subject in so transporting munitions of war to a belligerent country is either a personal offence against the belligerent captor, or an act which gives him any ground of complaint either against the neutral trader personally or against the Government of which he is subject. The title of the belligerent is limited entirely to the right of seizing and condemning as lawful prize the contraband articles. He has no right to inflict any punishment on the neutral trader, or to make his act a ground of representation or complaint against the neutral state of which he is a subject. In fact, the act of the neutral trader in transporting munitions of war to the belligerent country is quite lawful, and the act of the other belligerent in seizing and appropriating the contraband articles is equally lawful. Their conflicting rights are coexistent, and the right of the one party does not render the act of the other party wrongful or illegal. There is, however, much incorrectness of expression in some writers on the subject, who, in consequence of this right of the belligerent to seize in transitu munitions of war while being conveyed by a neutral to his enemy, speak of this act of transport by the neutral as unlawful and prohibited commerce. But this commerce, which was perfectly lawful for the neutral with either belligerent country before the war, is not made by the war unlawful or capable of being prohibited by both or either of the belligerents; and all that international law does is to subject the neutral merchant who transports the contraband of war to the risk of having his ship and cargo captured and condemned by the belligerent power for whose enemy the contraband is destined. That the act of the neutral merchant is in itself innocent is plain from the circumstance that the belligerent captor cannot visit it with any penal consequences beyond his judicial condemnation of the ship and cargo, nor can he make it the subject of complaint. This is well explained by Vattel in the following passage. Speaking as a belligerent power, he says: "Quand j'ai notifié aux puissances neutres une déclaration de guerre à tel ou tel peuple, si elles veulent s'exposer à lui porter des choses qui servent à la guerre, elles n'auront pas sujet de se plaindre au cas que leurs marchandises tombent dans mes mains, de même que je ne leur déclare pas la guerre pour avoir tenté de les porter. Elles souffrent, il est vrai, d'une guerre à laquelle elles n'ont point de part, mais c'est par accident. Je ne m'oppose point à leur droit—j'use seulement du mien, et si nos droits se croisent et se nuisent réciproquement, c'est par l'effet d'une nécessité inévitable. Ce conflit arrive toujours dans la guerre." Vattel must here be considered as speaking of the acts of the subjects of a neutral power, and not of the neutral Government itself, for the supplying of warlike stores to a belligerent by a neutral state would clearly be a breach of neutrality. The same doctrine as to the freedom of the commerce of the neutral subject is more explicitly stated by Mr. Chancellor Kent, in the first volume of his Commentaries, page 142, and was most distinctly affirmed in a celebrated decision of the Supreme Court of the United States: (The Santissima Trinidad, 7 Wheat. 283.) The language of Chancellor Kent is clear and comprehensive: "It is a general understanding, grounded on true principles, that the powers at war may seize and confiscate all contraband goods, without any complaint on the part of the neutral merchant, and without any imputation of a breach of neutrality in the neutral sovereign himself. It was contended on the part of the French nation in 1796, that neutral Governments were bound to restrain their subjects from selling or exporting articles contraband of war to the belligerent powers. But it was successfully shown on the part of the United States that neutrals may lawfully sell at home to a belligerent purchaser, or carry themselves to the belligerent powers, contraband articles subject to the right of seizure in transitu. This right has since been explicitly declared by the judicial authorities of this country. The right of the neutral to transport, and of the hostile power to seize, are conflicting rights, and neither party can charge the other with a criminal act." The material passage of the judgment which affirms this, as given in 7 Wheaton's Rep. 340, is the following: "There is nothing in our laws or in the law of nations, that forbids our citizens from sending armed vessels as well as munitions of war to foreign ports for sale. It is a commercial adventure which no nation is bound to prohibit, and which only exposes the persons engaged in it to the penalty of confiscation." I take this passage to be a very correct representation of the present state of the law of England also. For if a British ship-builder builds a vessel of war in an English port, and arms or equips her for war bonâ fide on his own account, as an article of merchandise, and not under or by virtue of any agreement, understanding, or concert with a belligerent power, he may lawfully, if acting bonâ fide, send the ship, so armed and equipped, for sale as merchandise in a belligerent country, and will not in so doing violate the provisions or incur the penalties of the Foreign Enlistment Act. It is true that, under the provisions of the Act of the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, Her Majesty has power by proclamation or Order in Council to prohibit the exportation of certain goods, including arms, ammunition, gunpowder, naval and military stores, but no Order in Council or proclamation was made in the terms or under the special authority of this statute. Great reliance, however, was placed by the counsel for the respondents on the Queen's proclamation of the 13th May 1861. Although it was admitted that it could not be treated as made under the authority of the last-mentioned statute, I need not observe that it is the object of a proclamation to make known the existing law, and that it can neither make nor unmake law. But in truth the proclamation of 1861 is directed, and very properly, to two objects: first, to declare that the provisions of the Foreign Enlistment Act would be strictly enforced; and, secondly, not to prohibit the exportation of warlike stores, but to warn the subjects of the realm that if any subject carried contraband of war to either belligerent he would incur the penal consequences of the law of nations, and would receive no protection or relief from these consequences (that is, from capture and condemnation) at the hands of Her Majesty. The proclamation has no effect whatever on the legality of this adventure. I am of opinion, therefore, that this adventure between the bankrupt and the petitioner was a lawful contract, and that the ordinary rights of property result from it. Consequently, I am of opinion that the goods in which the proceeds of the adventure were invested belong to the petitioner and the bankrupt, according to their several interests in that adventure and their contributions to the same, and I shall remit the case to the commissioner with this declaration: Reverse the order of the commissioner; declare that there was a valid partnership between the bankrupt and the petitioner in the adventure described in the petition, and that the accounts of the partnership ought to be taken, the partnership property sold or otherwise disposed of, the proceeds applied in payment of the debts of the partnership, and the surplus divided according to the interests of the petitioner and the bankrupt respectively.

Ex parte CHAVASSE, re GRAZEBROOK.

GLANVILLE F. BARKER.

Lord Campbell's Act (the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93)—The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), part II., s. 504—The Merchant Shipping Reprol Act 1854 (the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120)—The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 34—The 13 Vict. c. 21, s. 5—Loss of life by negligence at sea—Liability of ship-owners.

A brig called the E. M. wrongfully ran down a collier called the T. B. The collision resulted in the death of eight sailors on board the T. B. The personal representatives of the deceased sailors brought actions against the owners of the E. M. under Lord Campbell's Act (the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93). The defts. at law then instituted a suit in this court to restrain the action, and to have their liability for the deaths ascertained in equity, on the grounds that, under the true construction of the above-mentioned Acts, either no action was maintainable, or their liability was 8*l.* per ton, and not (as the plts. at law contended) 15*l.* per ton of the vessel and freight of the E. M.

Held, that the actions must be allowed to go on, and that the liability of the plts. in equity was 15*l.* per ton.

This suit was instituted by the owners of a vessel called the Edith Murray, to restrain certain actions at law against them. It appeared that in the month of Feb. 1864 the Edith Murray ran into a collier called the Thomas Barker. The result of that collision was, that eight seamen on board the Thomas Barker were drowned. Their personal representatives then brought actions under Lord Campbell's Act, the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, against the owners of the Edith Murray, to obtain compensation by way of damages for the deaths so caused. The plts. at law estimated the amount of their damages at the rate of 15*l.* per registered ton of the freight and vessel, the Edith Murray. That rate, the defts. at law contended, was an excessive one; that, in truth, there was either no right of action at all, or that the liability was limited to 8*l.* per ton, as aforesaid. Under these circumstances the bill in this suit was filed, praying an injunction to restrain the actions, and a direction that the proper amount of the liability might be ascertained in this court.

The question depended upon the construction of the following statutes:

The 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93, ss. 1 and 2;

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), part II., s. 504;

The Merchant Shipping Reprol Act 1854 (the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120), s. 4;

The Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act 1862 (the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), s. 34;

The 13 Vict. c. 21, s. 5.

Holthouse, Q. C. and Druece appeared for the plts. in the suit.

Osborne, Q. C. and Hodder for the defts.

Holthouse, Q. C. in reply.

The nature and effect of the arguments in the case, and the statutes cited in them, are fully stated in, and will sufficiently appear from, the judgment of the M. B., supra.

The MASTER of the HOLLA.—The question in this case relates to the construction of the Merchant Shipping Acts, with reference to the liability of the owners of a vessel which wrongfully ran down another, to make compensation for the loss of life thereby occasioned. In the month of Feb. 1864, the brig Edith Murray ran into a collier named the Thomas Barker, by which all the crew, with the exception of two, perished with the vessel which was run down. The number of persons so lost was eight, and the representatives of those eight persons brought actions at law against the owners of the Edith Murray, to recover compensation under the provisions of the Act commonly called Lord Campbell's Act, and of other Acts. The owners of the Edith Murray have instituted this suit to have the amount of their liability determined in this court. The history of the legislation on this subject is of considerable interest; showing, as it does, the progress of the legislation in adapting itself to the wants of society. Previous to the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93—Lord Campbell's Act—no action was maintainable against any person who by his wrongful act had caused the death of another. Injury to the person only created a right of personal action in the party injured; and if the injury was fatal, the right of action perished with that party. In that state of things Lord Campbell's Act gave a right of action against the wrong-doer to the legal personal representatives of the person killed, for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, or child of that person. The effect of that statute on cases of collision at sea became immediately one of great importance. Prior to that time it had been found necessary to limit the liability of the owners of vessels in respect of injury done by one vessel, which, through the fault of its master, had injured another. That was done by a statute of the time of Geo. 2, whereby the liability of the owners of the vessel which, metaphorically speaking, was the wrong-doer in respect of damage done to the cargo of, and to, the injured vessel, was limited to the value of the freight and of the ship doing the injury. But to personal injuries no limits were affixed by the statute, and the liability for them remained as before, measured only by the extent of the damage done. The reason why no limit was imposed was this, viz., that such actions were extremely rare, inasmuch as the injury done by collisions at sea were usually fatal. In 1847 Lord Campbell's Act, which I have mentioned, was passed. By that statute, after reciting that no action at law was then maintainable against a person who by his wrongful act, neglect, or default might have caused the death of another person, and it was oftentimes right and expedient that the wrong-doer in such case should be answerable in damages for the injuries so caused by him; it was enacted that whenever the death of a person should be caused by wrongful act, neglect, or default, and the act, neglect, or default was such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain an action and to recover damages in respect thereof, then and in every such case the person who would have been liable if death had not ensued should be liable to an action for damages notwithstanding the death of the person injured; and although the death should have been caused under such circumstances as amounted in law to felony. By the 2nd section it was further enacted, that every such action should be for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent and child of the person whose death should have been so caused, and should be brought by and in the name of the executor or administrator of the person deceased; and in every such action the jury were empowered to give such damages as they might think proportioned to the injury resulting from such death to the parties respectively for whom and for whose benefit such action should be brought. That Act imposed no limit as to the extent of damages to be recovered in actions brought by virtue of it; and accordingly, in cases of collision at sea, the liability of the owners of the vessel in the wrong was measured by and limited to the extent of the injury inflicted. The consequence of that was that by virtue of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), part 9, s. 504, the liability of the owner for loss caused to goods or merchandise, or for loss of life or personal injury, was limited to the value of his ship and her freight. The words of the 504th section, so far as it is material to cite them, are these: "No owner of any sea-going ship or share therein shall, in cases where all or any of the following events occur without his actual fault or privity; that is to say (3) where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such sea-going ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat; (4) where any loss or damage is by reason of any such improper navigation of such sea-going ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other ship or boat, be answerable in damages to an extent beyond the value of his ship and the freight due or to grow due in respect of such ship during the voyage which at the time of the happening of any such events as aforesaid is in prosecution or contracted for, subject to the following proviso, that is to say, that in no case where any such liability as aforesaid is incurred in respect of loss of life or personal injury to any passenger shall the value of any such ship and the freight thereof be taken to be less than 15*l*. per registered ton." Subsequently to the passing of that statute, but in the same session of Parliament, another Act, viz., c. 120, was passed, by sect. 4 of which the several Acts and parts of Acts set forth in the first schedule thereto, to the extent to which such Acts or parts of Acts were therein expressed to be repealed, and all such provisions of any other Acts or of any charters, and all such laws, customs and rules as were inconsistent with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, were repealed. In 1862 the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act was passed (the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), by the 2nd section of which it was enacted that the Acts described in table A. in the schedule in that Act should be repealed as therein mentioned, except as to any liabilities incurred before such repeal. That schedule included the 504th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. By the 54th section of the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, it was enacted as follows: "The owners of any ship, whether British or foreign, shall not in cases where all or any of the following events occur without their actual fault or privity, that is to say: (I will read only those parts of the section which are material), (3) where any loss of life or personal injury is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any person carried in any other ship or boat; (4) where any loss or damage is by reason of the improper navigation of such ship as aforesaid caused to any other ship or boat, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board another ship or boat, be answerable in damages in respect of loss of life or personal injury, either alone or together with loss or damage to ships, boats, goods, merchandise, or other things, to an aggregate amount exceeding 15*l*. for each ton of their ship's tonnage; nor in respect of loss or damage to ship's goods, merchandise, or other things, whether there be in addition loss of life or personal injury, or not to an aggregate amount exceeding 8*l*. for each ton of the ship's tonnage; such tonnage to be the registered tonnage in the case of sailing ships, and in the case of steamships the gross tonnage without reduction on account of engine-room." The plts. in equity now contend that the right of the representatives of deceased seamen to bring such an action as is referred to in sect. 504 above mentioned, is either put an end to altogether, or else that their claim is limited to 8*l*. per ton against the vessel in the wrong. But I think that either the right of action is altogether gone, or the liability extends to 15*l*. per ton. The propositions enunciated by the plts. appear to me to be these: First, that by sect. 504 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 a right of action was given in case of the loss of a life, not being that of a passenger, extending to the value of the ship and the freight; secondly, that by sect. 4 of the Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120, of the same session, all acts inconsistent with any of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 were repealed; thirdly, that Lord Campbell's Act is inconsistent with sect. 504 of the Act of 1854, and consequently that it is repealed, so far as regards collisions at sea; and fourthly, that the Act of 1862, which repeals the sect. 504, does not therefore revive Lord Campbell's Act; because, by the 13 Vict. c. 21, it is enacted that where any Act repealing, in whole or in part, any former Act, is itself repealed, such last repeal shall not revive the Act or provision before repealed, unless words be added reviving such Act or provision. In addition to that, the Act of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120, remains still in force. Those considerations, it is contended, show that no action in respect of any collisions at sea can be brought under Lord Campbell's Act. I must say that I dissent entirely from those views. I am of opinion that the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120, s. 4, does not repeal Lord Campbell's Act. That section repealed the provisions of any Acts inconsistent with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854; but in my opinion Lord Campbell's Act contains no provisions whatever inconsistent with the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Lord Campbell's Act merely gave the right of action, saying nothing about the amount to be recovered. The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 limited the amount to be recovered to the value of the wrong-doer's ship and freight. But what inconsistency is there in that? I have carefully read Lord Campbell's Act, and I am unable to find a word in it which requires to be struck out, in order to give the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 full force and effect. On the contrary, sect. 504 seems to have been itself founded on the right given by Lord Campbell's Act. Had there been a clause in Lord Campbell's Act enacting that in every case the liability of the wrong-doer should go to the full extent of the injury done to the family of the person killed, then that clause, so far as it might have extended to collisions at sea, would have been repealed by the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 120, s. 4. If that meaning is properly attributable to Lord Campbell's Act as it stands, precisely as though a clause expressing such meaning in so many words were to be found therein, then to that extent and to that only would it be repealed. But I am clearly of opinion that the right of bringing actions under Lord Campbell's Act still remains unrepealed and in full force. That right was never touched by any of the subsequent statutes; and by the 54th section of the last Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63) the liability in respect of actions so brought for collisions at sea is limited and fixed at 15*l*. per ton of the vessel causing the injury, as the maximum. Moreover, I think that the plts. cannot escape from the dilemma suggested by the defts.' counsel. Either this case falls within the provisions of the Act of 1862 or it does not. If it does, then sect. 54 is distinct in fixing the liability at 15*l.* per ton: if it does not fall within that Act, there is no liability at all. Sect. 504 of the last statute, under which the plts. are proceeding, was enacted in order to avoid multiplicity of suits, and has no application to this suit, the object of which is to ascertain their liability in this court. But the objection is one that can perfectly well be taken at law. The actions must, therefore, be allowed to proceed. I am indeed of opinion that, even if Lord Campbell's Act were wholly repealed, a right of action would still remain under the unrevoked sections of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. Upon the whole case I am of opinion that the plts. in equity have failed in their contention; that their liabilities extend to and are measured by the sum of 15*l.* per ton; and that a declaration must be made to that effect.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.

FOWLER AND ANOTHER v. THE ENGLISH AND SCOTTISH MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY (LIMITED).

Marine insurance—Capture, seizure and detention—Payment as for total loss—Embargo.

By a mutual policy of insurance the defts. undertook to insure a Prussian ship of the plts. against such risks as are excluded by the clause warranted "free from capture, seizure and detention," with a stipulation "to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news of capture or embargo, without waiting for condemnation." An embargo was laid by the Danish Government upon the plts. ship, and all other Prussian ships in Danish ports, and the plts. gave notice of abandonment to the defts., which they declined to accept. Before the expiration of the thirty days after receipt of official news of the embargo, the Danish Government by a decree announced that all enemy's ships should be permitted to depart, under a proviso of reciprocity on the part of the Prussian Government. The Prussian Government did not assent to the decree till after the expiration of the thirty days, but they did ultimately assent to it, and the embargo was taken off before the plts. commenced their action:

Held, that at the expiration of the thirty days, a right of action vested in the plts. to recover as for a total loss, which was not divested by the subsequent removal of the embargo before the commencement of the action.

Declaration upon a policy of insurance, effected by the plts. with the defts., on the ship Ernst Jacob, from Riga to London, valued at 2500*l.*, the insurance being expressed to be "only against such risks as are excluded by the clause warranted free from capture, seizure and detention, or the consequences of any attempt thereof, to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news of capture or embargo, without waiting for condemnation."

Averments, that after the commencement of the risk, and during its continuance, and while the policy was in full force, the ship was seized and detained under an embargo by the King of Denmark, and that before action brought, thirty days after the receipt of official news of the seizure and detention had elapsed, and that the defts. had not paid the 2500*l.*

First plea to the alleged total loss:

The defts. deny that the said ship was detained under an embargo by the King of Denmark until after the lapse of thirty days after receipt of official news of the said seizure, and that the plts. thereby sustained loss within the meaning of the said policy, and that before action brought thirty days after the receipt of official news of the said seizure and detention had elapsed within the true intent and meaning of the said policy.

Second plea:

So far as relates to the alleged detention of the said ship until after the lapse of thirty days after the receipt of official news of the said seizure, and so far as relates to the alleged total loss of the said ship and the amount of action in respect thereof, the defts. say that at the time of the alleged seizure and detention under the said embargo, the said ship was, in the course of the said voyage, lying in a Danish harbour, to wit, Kilsnøre, and was and still is a Prussian ship, and the property of certain persons, subjects of the King of Prussia, and that war had broken out and was then being carried on between the King of Denmark and certain other powers, to wit, among others with the King of Prussia, and that the said ship had been and was seized and detained under the said embargo by the King of Denmark as and being enemy's property, to wit, the property of the said subjects of the King of Prussia. And the defts. further say that after the alleged seizure and detention under the said embargo, and within the period of thirty days therefrom, and before thirty days after receipt of official news of the said seizure and detention had elapsed within the true intent and meaning of the said policy, and before action, to wit, within twelve days after the said seizure and detention, a decree was duly made in that behalf, and promulgated by the King of Denmark, to wit, on the 13th day of Feb. 1864, a correct translation of which decree is in the words and of the tenor and effect as follows, that is to say: "Decree respecting time to be allowed by the enemies' vessels now under embargo for quitting Danish harbours. On a representation being made to the King, His Majesty resolved under date of the 13th inst., that until the 1st April next the enemies' vessels now lying under embargo in Danish harbours and bays shall be permitted to depart unmolested in ballast, or laden with the cargo with which they arrived, and furnished with a letter of safe conduct to any harbour which they shall themselves designate, provided it be not blockaded, under proviso of reciprocity on the part of the Governments interested.—Ministry of Marine, Feb. 13, 1864." And the defts. further say that afterwards and before thirty days after receipt of official news of the said seizure and detention had elapsed within the true intent and meaning of the said policy, and before suit, all the conditions of the said decree were and had been complied with on the part of the Government interested in the said decree and in the said ship, to wit, the Government of Prussia, and the said alleged embargo was by force of the said decree and such compliance with the conditions thereof as aforesaid taken off the said ship, and she was at liberty to prosecute the said voyage, and could and might have obtained, and would, on application, have been furnished with a letter of safe conduct for that purpose, of all which said premises the plts. always had notice, and the defts. further say that the said ship afterwards in fact sailed upon her said voyage, and arrived at London and completed her said voyage in safety.

Under a third plea the defts. paid 2*l.* into court to cover a partial loss.

The case was tried before Erie, C. J., in London, at the sittings after Michaelmas Term, and the following facts were proved: The ship, which was a Prussian ship belonging to the plts., who carried on business at Memel and in London, sailed from Riga for London on the 16th Nov. 1863, and put into Kilsnøre, in Denmark, on the 4th Dec. 1863, for repairs. War between Denmark and Prussia was then imminent, and the policy of insurance declared on was effected on the 15th Dec. War was declared, and on the 8th Feb. 1864 an embargo was laid by the Danish Government on all Prussian ships in Danish ports. The ship Ernst Jacob was then at Kilsnøre. News of the embargo was sent on the same day by telegraph to the plts., and it was known at Lloyd's on the 4th Feb. On the 5th Feb. the plts. gave notice of abandonment to the defts., who refused to accept it. On the 15th Feb. the Danish Ministry of Marine published a decree of the King, allowing till the 1st April for enemies' ships then under embargo to depart, under proviso of reciprocity on the part of the Governments interested. On the 13th March the Prussian Government assented to the decree, and on the same day the embargo was taken off at Kilsnøre. The ship sailed eventually from Kilsnøre on the 17th April, and reached London in safety on the 29th April.

The thirty days from official notice of the embargo expired before the assent of the Prussian Government had been given. The action was commenced on the 21st March, after that assent had been given. The plts. claimed as for a total loss. The defts. maintained that the removal of the embargo operated as a restoration of the ship to the plts. before action brought, and that they were only liable to indemnify the plts. for a partial loss. The ship, on her arrival in London, was by arrangement sold, and realised 1381*l.* 9*s.* 6*d.* The plts. claimed in the action the difference between this sum and 2500*l.* Erle, C. J. directed the verdict to be entered for the plts. for the amount claimed, giving the defts. leave to move to enter it for them. A rule having been obtained accordingly, Lush, Q. C. and Sir G. Honyman showed cause.

HEARD AND ANOTHER v. HOLMAN AND ANOTHER.

Mellish, Q. C. and Archibald supported the rule.

The argument turned on the question, whether or not at the expiration of the thirty days from the official news of the embargo a right of action to recover for a total loss vested in the plts., and whether that right was affected by the subsequent removal of the embargo before action brought.

The following authorities were referred to:

Arnould on Marine Insurance, p. 1071;

Kent's Commentaries, vol. 3, p. 403;

Smith v. Robinson, 2 Dow, 474;

Rotch v. Edie, 6 T. R. 413;

Forster v. Christie, 11 East, 205;

Hamilton v. Mendis, 2 Burr. 1198;

Brotherston v. Barber, 5 M. & S. 418.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that the plt. is entitled to recover for a total loss. There is no dispute as to how the law stood when the parties made the contract, upon the words of which the court has to put a construction. The risks being those excluded by the clause "warranted free from capture, seizure, or detention," the words giving rise to contention are those which follow the statement of the risks, namely, "to pay a total loss thirty days after receipt of official news of capture or embargo, without waiting for condemnation." There is some ambiguity about the words "without waiting for condemnation," and without them the stipulation would be clear, that at the expiration of the thirty days the assured should have a vested right to recover as for a total loss. I do not think that the addition of the words which are ambiguous can alter the meaning of the stipulation. The particular risk insured against seems to have been in the minds of the parties, and they must be taken to have been aware of the law on the subject. This was not a mere temporary embargo, but one laid on in time of war, and I think that the plts. are entitled to recover as for a total loss.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The stipulation would have been perfectly clear but for the four last words, and seems to have been inserted for the benefit of the assured.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. The contract was to pay as for a total loss on the happening of an event which has happened. If the ship had been restored within the thirty days the plts. would not have been entitled to sue at all, but it was not.

Rule discharged.

HEARD AND ANOTHER v. HOLMAN AND ANOTHER.

Ship and shipping—Policy of insurance—Collision clause—Measure of damages—Damages to ship—Damages for detention of ship.

The plts.' ship W. H. having been run into by the ship G., the plts. arrested the latter ship, and prosecuted a suit against it in the Admiralty Court to recover compensation for the damage which they had sustained. The ship G. was insured by the defts. under a policy, one condition of which was, that the defts. should pay the amount of damage or loss by contact which the ship might do to others, provided it did not exceed the amount insured. It was thereupon agreed between the plts., the defts. and the owner of the G., that the plts. should release the ship G. from arrest, the defts. undertaking to pay them "the amount of damage which the said ship W. H. had received from the said collision," and the costs of the proceedings in the Court of Admiralty:

Held, that the word "ship" must be construed to mean the "owners of the ship," and that the plts. were entitled to recover from the defts. under this agreement the same compensation which they would have received if they had prosecuted their suit in the Court of Admiralty, and therefore they were entitled to recover damages for the detention of their vessel, and the costs of the suit, in addition to damages for the injury done to the framework of their ship.

This action was tried before Erle, C. J., at the sittings in London after Michaelmas Term.

The plts. were the owners of the ship Westward Ho, which, in the month of Feb. 1863, was run into off Beachy Head, by the ship Grenfells, belonging to W. T. Mitcheson. The collision was caused by the improper management of the latter ship, and the plts. immediately caused it to be arrested by process from the Court of Admiralty in a cause of collision. The Grenfells was insured in the Western Marine Association for 2000*l.*, under a policy of insurance incorporating regulations, of which the 17th was the following:

In case of damage or loss by contact, which any ship in this association may do to others, this society shall be liable to contribute its proportion, but not beyond the sum insured, and also law costs given in any suit or action defended by the previous consent in writing of the managers upon this policy; but in no case shall this society pay for loss or damage to one or both ships more than the sum insured on policy.

The Grenfells was also insured in the Sunderland Insurance Clubs, of which Mitcheson was manager.

The committee of management of the Western Marine Insurance Association, finding that the damage done by the Grenfells to the Westward Ho would exceed 2000*l.*, the amount of insurance, collected that sum from the members of the association, and handed it to the defts. who acted as managers of the association under the direction of the committee. The defts. were requested by Mitcheson to try to effect a compromise with the plts., and after some negotiation the plts. agreed to release the Grenfells upon the execution of the following agreement:

An agreement made the 13th March 1863, between George Heard, of Bideford, in the county of Devon, shipowner, on behalf of himself and William Heard, his copartner (under the firm of Heard Brothers), of the first part; Charles Thomas Mitcheson, of Sunderland, in the county of Durham, shipowner, of the second part; John Holman and Sons, of Topsham, in the said county of Devon, merchants, on behalf of the Western Insurance Clubs of Topsham aforesaid, of the third part; and C. J. Mitcheson aforesaid, on behalf of the Sunderland Insurance Clubs, of the fourth part. Whereas the said Heard Brothers are the owners of the ship Westward Ho, and the said C. J. Mitcheson is the owner of the ship Grenfells; and the ship Grenfells having run into and injured the ship Westward Ho, the said ship Grenfells has been arrested and now continues under arrest. And whereas, on the application of the parties of the second, third and fourth parts, the said Heard Brothers have agreed to release the ship Grenfell on the terms and conditions hereinafter appearing. Now these present witnesses and the parties to these presents mutually agree with each other as follows: The said Heard Brothers shall forthwith release the said ship Grenfell from the said arrest and in consideration thereof the said parties of the second, third and fourth parts, some or one of them, shall forthwith pay or cause to be paid to the said Heard Brothers the amount of damage which the said ship Westward Ho has received from the said collision. And that the whole of the said parties of the second, third and fourth parts shall be and are hereby declared to be in proportion to their respective interests liable to pay the said amount of damage and also the costs of the proceedings in the Court of Admiralty against the said ship, and it is further agreed between the said several parties hereto that if any dispute or difference shall arise between the said Heard Brothers and the said other parties hereto, or any or either of them, with respect to the amount of damages claimed by the said Heard Brothers by reason of the said collision, the said amount shall be referred to the award and determination of William Richards, Esq., of New City-chambers, Bishopsgate-street, London, whose decision shall be final and conclusive between the parties; and say party hereto may make these presents a rule of any one of Her Majesty's Courts at Westminster. As witnesses the hands of the parties,

Witness, &c.

After the execution of this agreement and the release of the Grenfell, the parties being unable to agree upon the amount of compensation to which the pta. were entitled, the defts. paid the pta. 1800*l.* on account, and Mr. Richards, the arbitrator mentioned in the agreement, was called on to fix the amount due to the pta. The arbitrator at first doubted whether he was empowered to award any compensation to the pta. for the loss which they had sustained by the forced detention of their ship; but eventually, on the 14th March 1864, he made an award reciting the agreement of the 18th March 1863, and finding the amount of the damage sustained by the ship to be 1237*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, and the further damage sustained by the pta. in consequence of the detention of the Westward Ho during the time necessary for repairs, and otherwise by reason of the collision to be 735*l.* 7*s.* 4*d.*

The defts. repudiated their liability under the agreement to pay any portion of this latter sum, and the pta. thereupon brought this action against them to recover 519*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, being 500*l.* the balance remaining in the defts.' hands of the 3000*l.* collected and paid over by the Western Marine Insurance Association, and 19*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.*, the defts.' proportion of the Admiralty costs.

The declaration set out in the first count the facts of the collision and arrest and the agreement of the 18th March 1863, and the sums awarded by Richards, and alleged that 519*l.* 1*s.* 2*d.* still remained due under the agreement. It also contained a count for money paid and money agreed to be paid.

The pleas traversed the material allegations in the declaration, and to the last count alleged payment.

At the trial a verdict was entered for the pta. for the amount claimed, the defts. having leave to move to enter a nonsuit or verdict for the defts. A rule having been obtained accordingly, Lush, Q.C. and W. Williams showed cause.

Mellish, Q.C. and T. Jones supported the rule.

BAILEY, C. J.—I am of opinion that the pta. are entitled to recover from the defts. under their agreement the same amount as they would have recovered in the Court of Admiralty, by which the ship Grenfell was detained, provided it does not exceed the sum insured; that is, they are entitled to recover the amount of the repairs necessary for the framework of the ship and compensation for the loss of the profit which would otherwise have been made by the employment of the ship. They would have had these amounts if the suit had continued in the Admiralty Court. By the agreement they give up the suit and accept the agreement instead. There is no suggestion that the ship Grenfell was not a sufficient security for the amount which the pta. was entitled to recover in the Admiralty Court. Have the pta. then given up their right to recover for the loss of profits caused by the collision? It is said that they have done so, because the damage which, by the agreement, the defts. are to pay to the pta. is the damage to the framework of the ship only. I am of opinion, however, that the damage which the ship Westward Ho has sustained from the collision may be properly held to mean the amount of damage which the owner of the Westward Ho has sustained, i. e. the sum of money which will compensate the owner for the damage which he has sustained by reason of the collision. The agreement is capable of that meaning. The defts. were liable under the 17th of their regulations, as insurers of the Grenfell, to pay to the owner of the Grenfell the amount of the "damage or loss by contact" which that ship had done to the Westward Ho. Loss by contact includes loss of profits which the Westward Ho would have made. It was immaterial to the defts. whom they paid, and they made the agreement with the pta. in order to avoid circuity of action. I have endeavoured to explain the grounds of my judgment, in the hope that the defts. may be held harmless in any other court where the question may arise.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, what is meant by ship. It is said that, although the direct damage done to the ship and the costs of the suit in the Admiralty Court must be paid by the defts., yet, that the intervening damage proceeding from the detention of the ship is not to be paid. We must, however, carry out the real meaning of the agreement, and construe the word ship as meaning the owners of the ship. Mr. Jones says that to do so would be to give a rhetorical meaning to the word. But it is not a forced construction. The word "Cabinet" is ordinarily used to signify the members of the Cabinet. The gentlemen before and behind the bar are signified by the expression, "the Bar." So the "owners of the ship" may be meant by "the ship."

KEATINGE, J.—I am of the same opinion. We must look at the circumstances which existed when the agreement was entered into. The pta. had the security of the Grenfell in the Court of Admiralty, and they gave that up, as appears by the recital of the agreement, on the application of the other parties to the agreement. It is scarcely conceivable that the pta. should have intended to part with their security, if they were to give up any part of the compensation which they would have received by retaining it.

M. SMITH, J.—Looking at the words of the agreement alone, a question might have arisen as to whether or not the word "ship" meant the "owners of the ship;" but, reading it by the legitimate modes of construction, and looking at the circumstances, it is clear that the damage to the ship was meant to express the damage sustained by the owners.

BARKER & M'ANDREW.

[C. P.]

Tuesday, May 10, 1884.

BARKER & M'ANDREW.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Commencement of voyage—Perils of sea—Guarantee for cargo.

A ship chartered to sail to some usual landing place, and after taking in cargo there to proceed to a named port of discharge, commences her voyage on starting to proceed to the landing place, and therefore the ordinary exception, "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers and navigations, of whatever nature and kind soever, during the said voyage always accepted," contained in the charter-party, applies to the preliminary transit from the place where the ship was when the charter-party was made to the landing place.

The word "guaranteed for cargo in all this month," contained in the charter-party, Held, not to prevent the exception from protecting the ship during the preliminary transit.

Action by charterers against shipowners for not receiving a cargo. The first count was on a charter-party, the second on an agreement.

Fourth plea:

The deft. says, that the charter-party in the first count mentioned was and is as follows:—"London, 3rd Oct. 1883.—Charter-party.—It is this day mutually agreed between Messrs. R. McAndrew and Co., of the good ship or vessel called the sea steamer Argos, of the of tons, or thereabouts, now at Newcastle, and Messrs. J. Barker and Co., of London, merchants, that the said ship being tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all convenient speed, sail and proceed to some usual landing place, guaranteed for cargo in all this month, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there load from the factor of the said freighters in the customary manner a full and complete cargo of about 1200 tons of coal, which the said merchants bind themselves to ship, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions and furniture, and being so loaded shall thereupon proceed to Alexandria, Egypt, or so near thereto as she may safely get (cargo to and from alongside, and at merchant's risk and expense) and deliver the same on being paid freight as follows: thirty pounds per load of twenty-one tons and one-fifth, with fifteen guineas gratuity in full of all port charges and pilotage (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers and navigations, of whatever nature and kind soever, during the said voyage always accepted); the vessel to be addressed to the chartered agents, paying the one usual consignment commission of 1%, and to have a lien on cargo for all freight, dead freight and demurrage, to claim to sign bills of lading at any rate of freight, without prejudice to this charter, freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, in cash, at current exchange, one hundred and twenty-five tons to be allowed the said merchant per weather-working day (if the ship is not sooner dispatched) for unloading, and all days on demurrage over and above the said lying days at thirty pounds per day, penalty for non-performance of this agreement estimated amount of freight.—Robert McAndrew, J. Barker and Co., agents. Witness to the signature of both parties, W. Nelson." And that the agreement in the second count mentioned was the same charter-party with an extension of time, mutually agreed on by the plea and deft., for being ready for cargo until the early part of Nov. 1883. And the deft. says, that at the time of the making of the said charter-party and agreement, the said steamer was being at Newcastle as in those counts mentioned, was at a place there for distant from the usual place there for loading, to which the said steamer was to sail and proceed; and the said steamer, before reaching such usual place, would necessarily be exposed to diverse dangers of sea, rivers and navigations, all which the plea and deft. at the said time well knew; and the said voyage in the said charter-party mentioned and referred to was a voyage from the place at Newcastle at which the said steamer was at the time of making the said charter-party and agreement, to the said usual place at Newcastle for loading, and from thence to Alexandria, and that the said steamer during the said voyage, that is to say, during each part of the said voyage as each place before the said steamer sailed or proceeded from the said usual place on her way to Alexandria, and after she had received on board part of the said cargo, and before any breach of the said charter-party or agreement, was hindered and prevented, by the danger of the sea, rivers and navigations, these happenings, from receiving and loading on board and from being ready to receive and load on board the residue of the said cargo, and was thereby greatly and necessarily delayed therein, which are the supposed breaches of contract in the first and second counts respectively complained of.

Demurrer on the ground that, according to the true construction of the charter-party, the voyage had not commenced at the time when the steamer was hindered and prevented, as in the plea mentioned; and consequently, that the exception did not apply.

Herreys Lloyd, for the plea, contended that the voyage did not commence till the vessel started from Newcastle with the cargo on board, and that the exception protecting the defts. from accidents resulting from the perils of the sea, did not apply to the preliminary transit to the landing place. He relied on

Crow v. Falk, 8 Q. B. 407;

Valente v. Gibbs, 8 C. B., N. B., 270; 39 L. J., 223, C. P.

Hess, for the defts., relied on Brace v. Nardacqui, 11 Ex. 189.

WILLIAMS, J.—I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the defts. The action is founded on a charter-party, by which it was provided that the defts.' vessel, being then at Newcastle, should proceed to some usual landing place, guaranteed for cargo in the month of October, and there take in a cargo and proceed thence to Alexandria. The charter-party contained the usual exception of "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, restraints of princes and rulers, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea and rivers and navigations, of whatever nature and kind soever during the said voyage." I presume, from the state of facts disclosed by the pleadings, that the vessel broke ground to proceed to the usual place of loading. I will assume, also, that it is not clear whether she arrived at the usual place of loading or not, though she is said to have taken on board part of her cargo. It is unnecessary, however, so to construe the pleadings, as it is clear that she did break ground to proceed to the place of loading, and was prevented from fulfilling the terms of the charter-party by arriving there so as to take a cargo on board within the stipulated time, by dangers of the sea, rivers and navigations. Then the questions which arise are, first, whether the word voyage in the clause containing the exception includes the vessel's preliminary transit to the place of loading; and, secondly, whether, assuming that the word voyage would otherwise have included that preliminary transit, the parties, by using the words "guaranteed for cargo in all this month," have shown that they did not intend the exception to apply to the preliminary transit. The first is a general question; the second relates to the construction of this particular charter-party. The first is in effect whether, when a charter-party provides that a vessel shall proceed to a port without cargo, take a cargo on board there, and then proceed on a voyage to a port of discharge, the exception of the perils of the sea and so forth, applies only to the voyage with the cargo on board, or includes the preliminary transit. To determine this satisfactorily, it is necessary to consider the meaning of the exception. Shipowners carrying goods by sea are common carriers, and but for the exception, would be liable for all accidents but the acts of God and the Queen's enemies. This was well known to be the rule of the English law, but it was not the universal rule of maritime law. Therefore, to limit the liability of English shipowners under the English law, this exception was introduced large enough to include every case of accident arising without fault of the shipowner or the master employed by him. That being so, the reason for the exception, when we consider its object and scope, applies to the preliminary voyage as much as to the voyage with cargo. There is no reason for applying it to one part of the voyage more than to another. Is the preliminary voyage then a part of the voyage? That comes to be a question only of language. The voyage is nothing more than the passage of the vessel over the agreed journey. Mr. Llyod, for the plts., said that the contrary has been decided in two cases. But, I think that there is only one decision on the exact point, and that one is against him. Crow v. Falk was a case in which there was no preliminary transit. There was no voyage till the vessel broke ground, and for that reason the court held that the exception did not apply while the vessel was at the port of loading. Valente v. Gibbs was a peculiar case. It was an action brought to recover penalties for delay, and all that was decided was, that delay at the port whence the vessel was to start was not within a contract to pay penalties for delay on the voyage. It is true that the Lord Chief Justice and Crowder, J. expressed an inclination of opinion that the voyage did not begin till the vessel reached the port from whence cargo was to be taken; but this was on the construction of the particular instrument, and not on the ground that cargo was necessary to the voyage. Here the charter-party is in the ordinary form. Not only is there no authority against the plts., but Bruce v. Nicolopulo is an authority in favour of the defts. I do not concur with what is there said of Crow v. Falk, but it was held that the preliminary voyage was to be considered as part of the voyage within the clause relating to restraints of princes. That was a decision of importance, and in accordance with good sense. The guarantee for cargo "in all this month" merely means that the vessel will be ready for cargo within a month, provided it is not prevented by some accident, without fault on the part of the shipowners. Mr. Rew argued that the guarantee was merely introduced to enable the charterers to throw up the charter-party if the vessel were not ready by the end of the month. It is not necessary to decide if that was so or not, though his argument in support of that view was strong. The guarantee must be taken with the context, as subject to the condition that the guarantors were not prevented by the accidents contained in the exception. I think, therefore, that the plea is a good plea.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question is, what is meant by the exception? The word voyage, standing alone, is a very extensive word. It means a passing by water from one port or place to another. That explanation would assist us little, but the legitimate rule for the construction of instruments is to look at them with regard to the existing facts. The plea informs us that at the time of the making of the charter-party and agreement the steamer was at a distance from the place of loading, and would necessarily be exposed to perils in proceeding there, as the plts. and defts. well knew. The parties must be taken to have contemplated those facts when they made the charter-party, but in face of the distance and perils the ship engages with all convenient speed to sail and proceed to the loading place. There was a contract binding the ship to proceed on that preliminary part of the voyage and to face those dangers. The charter-party further provides that the ship, being tight, staunch and strong, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall sail to the loading place—not that she sail to the loading place, and thence, being tight, staunch and strong, sail on the voyage to the port of discharge. There are only two places in the charter-party where the word voyage occurs, and the first must necessarily include the previous part of the voyage. The word "sail" is a very strong and almost technical word. It means "starting on the voyage." There is a distinct authority to that effect in the language of Willes, J., in Valente v. Gibbs, that when the vessel sails the voyage commences. I have no hesitation in saying that the plea is good. I say nothing more about the guarantee, which may be, as my brother Willes says, subject to the exception, or it may be the usual guarantee, and not intended to limit the exception.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. Under this charter-party, for some purposes the voyage commenced when the ship started from the place where she was when the charter-party was made. There was an obligation in the charter-party on the ship to start and sail to the loading place with all convenient speed and without deviation. The parties knew that she would have to sail over the intervening distance between her actual place and the loading place and face the dangers of that journey. Why should not the exception attach to what was not a preliminary voyage, but a preliminary part of the voyage? Each party contemplated that these perils would have to be encountered. As far as authority goes it is in favour of the defts. We must give effect to the intention of the parties to be collected from the whole charter-party, and I think that we shall be doing so in holding this to be a good plea. I agree with my brother Willes with respect to the guarantee, which is only an emphatic word signifying the intention of the parties.

ADMIRALTY COURT. IRELAND.

THE ROTHSAY CASTLE. (a)

Salvage—Signal of distress—Costs.

In this case, where there was no personal risk or any danger, but which was an ordinary salvage service performed with skill, good conduct and complete success to a vessel in imminent peril of being totally lost, the Court awarded to the salvors a sum of 375l., or "one-fourth" of the admitted value and costs.

This was a suit instituted by the registered owners of the Holyrood, a screw steamer of 533 tons burthen and 100 horse power (Captain Fudge), the property of the London, Limerick and Liverpool Steamship Company, against the river steamer Rothsay Castle, of Glasgow, the property of the Oriental and Inland Steam Company (William C. Mahon), master, to recover compensation for salvage services alleged to have been rendered to the impugnant vessel a few miles off the Tuskar upon the south-east coast of Ireland. The impugnant vessel, including stores, &c., was admitted to be worth 1500l., and one-half that amount was claimed for salvage. The salving vessel and cargo were stated to be worth 16,800l. The case was by consent heard vis à voce, and the facts appear fully in the judgment of the court.

Drs. Townsend and Chatterton, Q.C. for the salvors.—It was a case of merit, and deserved the marked approbation of the court, which should award at least one-half the value of the property saved. They cited aid for, but the amount claimed was most exorbitant.

KELLY, J.—This case has been spread out in the pleadings perfectly free from exaggeration, and spoken to on both sides so as to assist the court very materially. No question of law has arisen, and the single duty devolved upon the court is, to ascertain what amount of compensation should be awarded to the petitioners for the services proved by the evidence to have been rendered by them. That evidence is singularly corroborative, presenting one uniform narrative, without contradiction by witnesses at either side upon any material point. The Rothsay Castle, it appears, is a long river steamer, intended for inland navigation in India, and early in November last was stripped of her engines and machinery, and rigged as a three-masted schooner to proceed to Calcutta under canvas, the company who owned her having deemed that the most advisable course, her boiler and steam machinery having been shipped for the same destination in the Earl of Lincoln. For the purpose of avoiding the delays of the Channel navigation, the Rothsay Castle had been towed from Lamlash to Queenstown; and then, on the 13th Nov., from the latter harbour to the Old Head of Kinsale, for the purpose of giving her a good offing. Scarcely had she been cast off, and made a little to westward of Cape Clear, when the wind came on to blow heavily from S.W., and by W. to N.W., and she was brought round to run up Channel. The next day the step of the foremast gave, and the weather became so thick and dark, the master could not tell where he was. He was unable to take an observation, and his expression is, "He was puzzled to know where he was going, it was so dark and thick, and the vessel was drifting like a bladder on the water." At this most embarrassing juncture, the crew, refusing to work, came aft, and insisted on the master making for the nearest port. He asked them to give him one day's time to see if it would clear, and thus matters then stood. Through the course of that night an American vessel passing him, the master endeavoured to make sail after her, and threw out signals, but she passed on unheeding him. The next morning it cleared, when he found himself off the coast of Waterford, instead, according to his own calculation, of being to the west of Cork, having, to use his own words, made more way than he anticipated to leeward; in plain language, having drifted upwards of fifty miles to eastward of his then intended port. At this moment of time, viz., noon on Thursday, the Holyrood screw steamer, on her voyage from Liverpool to Limerick, with a valuable cargo, had passed the Tuskar, sighted the Rothsay Castle, then distant about seven miles, and seeing her ensign union downwards, at once shaped her course to come up with her to assist her. The position of the Rothsay Castle was then sufficiently perilous, the Saltees being under her lee, the strong current of the flood tide, which was then making, setting fast towards them; and the Hook, the entrance to the only harbour available, full eight miles to the north, the wind blowing nearly a gale from W.N.W., and a heavy sea rolling, the foremast of the vessel herself disabled, and her crew terrified and mutinous. The evidence of the master is, that he could not have cleared the Saltees; and the evidence of the other witnesses is, that he could not have fetched the Hook. The Holyrood, having hailed her, was asked to tow her to the nearest port, yet for that purpose the master of the Rothsay admitted he had not on board a rope sufficiently strong. That want was speedily supplied by the vigour of the master of the Holyrood, who, after two ineffectual attempts, one of them not without personal risk to himself, succeeded in getting his own towline made fast to the Rothsay Castle and the vessel herself in tow. The Holyrood then, abandoning the further prosecution of her own voyage, turned back, towing the Rothsay Castle on towards the Hook, and then up the river to Passage, where, after a labour of about five hours, and a traverse of about nineteen miles, she left her at anchor in perfect safety. The master of the Rothsay Castle—the best witness on the point—made no secret of his sense of that providential rescue, having said to the master of the Holyrood, "that he thanked him for saving his life and his ship," and to the witness Philips, that it was "a lucky thing he had met the Holyrood, or he did not know where he would be then." An occurrence which took place but a few hours later that same evening gives particular force to those last expressions. The wind had been blowing strong, nearly a gale, during the morning, but that night it increased to an entire gale. The words just referred to had, therefore, fearful and substantial import; as, had this disabled schooner not met with her salvors then and there, she must, under the circumstances, have been driven on the Saltees, for she had not sufficient ground tackle, even had she had the ground, to ride out that gale at anchor. From that great peril her rescue was complete; and here is the first element of salvage proper. It does not appear to the court that so great a merit is diminished because it has been accomplished without loss of life or limb to the salvors. At the same time it is not to be denied that it might be enhanced by such undesirable accompaniments, not in its intrinsic value to the owner of the rescued property, but in the amount of the reward then so justly to be increased by the salvors. The time occupied was short, but was effective, and all the more so when the change of weather that night is borne in mind. The court in all such cases will ever keep in view the fact that steam power—the cause and the forerunner of so many important and beneficial changes in all things connected with its influences—has, in regard to salvage, effected two great boons in favour of navigation and the world of commerce, namely, the saving of human life and property, with nearly entire immunity and with almost certain success. The petitioners in this case are the owners of a steamer of high value, and were the carriers at the time of a full cargo—all was risked in the service in question, and the voyage itself delayed. These in themselves are ingredients in their favour, and are to be weighed along with and against other circumstances. The admitted value of the Rothsay Castle and her stores is 1500*l.*, and, according to the law of salvage, a just proportion of that sum—just to owners equally as salvors—is now to be awarded. The Court, then, estimating the services of the salvors in this case but as ordinary services in respect of personal risk or daring, or of labour, and in regard of the object achieved, that it was achieved with skill, good conduct, and complete success; keeping also before it the policy of encouraging in such enterprises the aid and co-operation of great steam-packet companies, will award to the petitioners one-fourth of the value of this vessel and her stores, being a sum of 375*l.*, with the costs of suit.

Reported by R. D. BENEDICT, Proctor and Advocate in Admiralty.

THE ANN CAROLINE.

Collision in narrow channel—Vessel on privileged tack sometimes bound to give way.

Where two vessels were beating up a narrow channel, both close-hauled on the larboard tack, and the one which was to leeward suddenly came round on the starboard tack, and ran on till she struck the other vessel, which did not change its course:

Held, that the injured vessel, not being able to go about because of her nearness to a shoal, and being so far to windward and ahead of the other one in the channel that if she had ported her helm she would have been in imminent danger of colliding, the other one was not in fault for keeping her course, though on the larboard tack:

That the other vessel might have gone about or might have starboarded her helm and gone under the stern of the injured vessel, and was, therefore, under the circumstances, in fault for keeping her course, though on the privileged tack.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York. The libel was filed in the District Court by the owner of the schooner John C. Wells, to recover the damages occasioned by her being run into and sunk by the schooner Ann Caroline, in Delaware Bay, on Feb. 11, 1854, about 3 p.m.

The facts of the case were substantially as follows: There were, on the day in question, eight vessels beating up Delaware Bay. The channel runs about north, being about a mile wide, and having the Jersey shore on the east and Crow Shoal on the west. The wind was a full-sail breeze from the N.N.W., and the vessels were beating up, making their long tacks towards the Jersey shore. The John C. Wells was deeply laden, and the Ann Caroline was light. The Wells had tacked near Crow Shoal, so near as to stir up the mud with her centre-board, and, with six other vessels, was running on her larboard tack, the Ann Caroline being the furthest eastward of these; and the libellant alleged that, in this position of affairs, the Ann Caroline unexpectedly, without running out her tack, came round on the starboard tack, and running across the bows of three of the other vessels, struck the Wells about ten feet forward of her stern, sinking her instantly.

The District Court made a decree dismissing the libel. The libellants appealed to the Circuit, which reversed that decree, and gave a decree in favour of the libellant; and from this decree the claimants of the Ann Caroline appealed to the Supreme Court.

The appeal was argued by E. C. Benedict for the libellant, and by C. Donohue for the apps.

The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice CLIFFORD.—Having stated the case, he proceeded as follows:—The theory of the claimants is, that inasmuch as their vessel had come round on to the starboard tack, it was the duty of the vessel of the libellant to give way and pass to her right. The general rule of navigation undoubtedly is, that a vessel on the starboard tack, if close-hauled, has a right to keep her course, and that one on the larboard tack, although she is also close-hauled, must give way or be answerable for the consequences: (St. John v. Paine, 10 How. R. 581.) But it is insisted by the libellant that the rule has no application to the relative position of the two vessels, as shown by the evidence in the case. His proposition in that behalf is, that his vessel was to the windward of the vessel of the claimants, and so far ahead of her in the channel that if those on board of his vessel had observed the general rule and ported her helm a collision would necessarily have followed. Granting that the position of the two vessels was such as is assumed by the libellant, then it is clear that the rule of navigation under consideration cannot apply, and that the views of the libellant are correct. The proximity of the libellant's vessel to the shoal was such that it rendered it unsafe for those in charge of her to attempt to go about, because the danger was, that if they should do so she would be wrecked on the shoal. She could not therefore starboard her helm and go about, and if, as assumed, she was ahead of the claimant's vessel, and to the windward, then it is clear that she could not be required to port her helm and attempt to go to the right, as in doing so she would have to cross the bows of the vessels astern, and must incur the imminent danger of collision with the vessel of the claimants. The principal question of fact therefore is, whether the theory assumed by the libellant is correct, because it is obvious that if the facts are so, the conclusion deduced from them must follow. Two controverted facts are assumed in the proposition of the libellant: first, that his vessel was to the windward; secondly, that she was ahead in the channel. Argument is not necessary to show that the libellant is right on the first point, as the whole current of the evidence when properly understood is that way, but there is much conflict in the testimony on the second point. Where the conflict of testimony in respect to a disputed point is between the witnesses on board the respective vessels, and no others are examined in the case, it is sometimes difficult to form any satisfactory conclusion. No such embarrassment, however, arises in this case, as there were four witnesses examined, who were on board the other vessels in the same company. Those witnesses concur in the statement, not only that the vessel of the libellants was to the windward of the claimants' vessel, but that she was above her in the channel, and in view of the whole case we adopt that conclusion as the correct one from the evidence. The vessel of the claimants was also in fault, because she had no look-out, and the evidence tends strongly to the conclusion that the disaster is mainly attributable to that cause. The testimony shows beyond controversy that she had no look-out at the time of the collision, and that the master, after the vessel was put about and filled away on the starboard tack, went below, and when he came on deck just before the disaster occurred, he inquired, with evident displeasure, if no one had seen the vessel of the libellant, and it is clear that he had abundant reason for dissatisfaction. Usual precautions were then too late, and in a very short time the vessel of the claimants struck that of the libellant, and the latter sank in the channel. Plainly, the vessel of the libellant could not avoid the collision; because, if she had attempted to go about, she would have gone on the shoal, and if she had ported her helm and attempted to go to the right, she would have collided with the vessel of the claimants. On the other hand, it is clear beyond doubt, that the vessel of the claimants might have avoided the disaster without any peril. She might have gone about, as she had ample room to do, or she might have starboarded her helm and gone under the stern of the other vessel. For these reasons we think the conclusion of the Circuit Court was right on the merits.

Decree affirmed.

TRAYNE AND ANOTHER v. WORMS.

1 shipping—Marine insurance—Liability to contribute to general average—Advances on freight—Average.

The plaintiff chartered a ship of the plaintiff for a voyage as charter-party, by which it was stipulated that should be paid in advance, less a certain sum paid on delivery of the cargo, and also less the insurance to be effected by the charterers at expense. The defendant paid the stipulated portion freight in advance, and the ship in the course of voyage was damaged and incurred expenses which formed general average charges:

At the meaning of the charter-party was, that the plaintiff should retain the portion of the freight paid, whether the ship arrived at her destination and therefore that it was at the defendant's risk, inasmuch as, that he was liable to contribute to general average in respect of the freight advanced, as in respect of the cargo.

The case stated after issue joined and before consent of the parties, and by order of declaration contained indebitatus counts for average, money paid, &c. The defendant pleaded nil issue, payment, the Statute of Limitation a special plea setting up an American title. The last plea was demurred to, and, on the 1st, held by the court to be bad: (see the 8 C. B., N. S., 149.) The amount claimed was £1007l. 13s. 11d., with interest at 4 from the 20th June 1854.

The special case stated the following material

On the 21st April 1853 Edward Oliver, the then owner of the ship Hibernia, effected a charter of the ship to the defendant for a voyage with coal from the defendant to San Francisco. The cargo was to be paid "on being paid freight at and after the rate of 10s. British sterling per ton of twenty cwt." And with respect to the freight it was stipulated, "the freight to be paid by the defendant approved bills on London at six months' date of sailing, less costs of insurance, to be paid by the charterers at ship's expense, or under discount equal thereto at charterers' option in either case 800% which is to be paid in cash at the current rate of exchange."

The ship, under the charter-party loaded on board of 1246 tons of coal; and according to the charter-party he, in payment of the freight payable under the charter-party, less the 800% mentioned therein payable on delivery of the cargo, gave two bills of exchange amounting to the sum of 4518l. 6s., being the balance freight less the insurance thereon, which amounted to 288l. 14s. A receipt for 4807l. stated the sum of these two sums of 4518l. 6s. and 288l. 14s. was indorsed on the bill of lading as paid on account of the within freight, to be paid from freight at San Francisco. Both the bills were paid at maturity. The owner of the ship, Oliver, on the 14th July 1853, transferred and the benefit of the charter to the plaintiff, and subsequently transferred their interest in the ship to the plaintiff. The special case set out the facts between these parties, but they are unnecessary for the purposes of this report.

The ship shortly after the shipment of the cargo sailed on the voyage, and during the course of it sustained considerable damage, and was, for the safety of the general adventure, compelled to put into Valparaiso, where she arrived on the 7th Jan. 1854, and remained till the following March. Expenses were necessarily incurred there in the repair of the ship, the particulars of which appeared in the average statement set out in the case, and it was agreed between the parties that the portion put down to general average in the statement were general average charges. The master, not having funds at his command to defray the expenses, on the 10th March 1854, properly borrowed the requisite amount at Valparaiso, and executed a bottomry bond in the ordinary form, binding the ship, the cargo and the freight to be earned.

After the completion of the repairs the ship proceeded on her voyage to San Francisco, where she arrived in June 1854, and delivered the cargo. The plaintiff, on hearing of the injury sustained by the Hibernia, transmitted to San Francisco the sum of 1000l. towards defraying the bottomry bond. On the ship's arrival at San Francisco an average statement was duly made out in accordance with the law, but this statement was not to preclude either party from raising the question who was to contribute in respect of freight. The defendant duly paid the 800l. balance of the freight, and also the sum of 912l. charged on the cargo in the average statement.

The defendant, on the 21st and 25th July 1853, effected two policies of insurance in France for 130,000 francs on advances made on freight of the cargo. The policies were stated to provide for reimbursement of the advances in all cases of fortune of the seas which might have for consequence the deprival of the said advances from the person assured. No other policies were effected in respect of the advances.

The plaintiff, or their transferee James, paid the amount advanced under the bottomry bond, and claimed from the defendant the sum charged by way of general average on the freight paid in advance in the average statement. The question for the opinion of the court was, whether or not the plaintiff were entitled to recover this sum? The court had power to draw inferences of fact.

Sir G. Honyman (M^r Lead with him) for the plaintiff.—In respect of the freight paid in advance, the defendant is the proper person to contribute. This is not a case of a sacrifice of any part of the ship, but of a money payment made for the benefit of all persons concerned in the ship, freight and cargo. By the terms of the charter-party the defendant was to insure the freight. Whether he did so, or whether he preferred to put the premiums, or a portion of them, into his own pocket, so as to become his own insurer, is nothing to the plaintiff. The clause relating to the insurance puts the parties into the same position as if the words "ship lost or not lost" were in the charter-party. The freight so paid in advance was not under any circumstances liable to be returned by the shipowners. Therefore the defendant must contribute in respect of the value of his goods increased by that amount of freight. If he has insured the freight he will recover it from the underwriters, and if not, it is not the fault of the plaintiff. He referred to

Arnould's Marine Insurance m. 343, 344, 349;

Mellish, Q.C. (M^r Lead, Q.C. with him) for the defendant.—The first question is, at whose risk the advanced freight was. By the terms of the charter-party freight is to be paid at the rate of 10s. per ton "delivered" i. e. at San Francisco. The subsequent clause about payment of a certain portion of the freight in advance is to be reconciled with this, by taking the payment in advance to be made simply on account of the freight which would be earned if the goods were delivered at San Francisco, and would be liable to be returned if they were not so delivered. [WILLES, J.—Has it not been decided that where the charterer is to insure, the freight paid in advance is not to be returned? Hogman referred to Hicks v. Shield, 7 E. & B. 639.] The next point is, that the freight paid in advance ought not to contribute at all. It was not in reality at risk at all, and therefore did not benefit by the amount expended:

Phillips on Insurance, 4th edit. p. 154, a. 1404;
Arnould's Marine Insurance, 1st edit. a. 348.

ERLE, C. J.—The general rule respecting contribution to general average is well understood. With respect to this advance of freight, it is clear from the language of the charter-party that it was not in any case to be returned; therefore, the 4800*l.* which was in the hands of the shipowner was no longer at his risk. It is clear that that portion of the freight is to contribute, but the question is, who is the party interested in it. I am of opinion that the charterer is the party interested, and that he had an interest in the ship's arriving at the port of destination to the extent of the value of the cargo increased by the advance which he had made on the freight. I need say nothing more than that, according to the general rules, the charterer is to contribute.

WILLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. With respect to the question whether the money advanced was to be returned, it is concluded by the terms of the charter-party. The charterers were to insure, and it is clear from that, that the advance was not to be returned if the ship did not arrive at her destination. The charterer must seek from the underwriters the indemnity which the charter-party contemplated that he would have. The second question is, whether a person who has advanced money on account of freight and shipped goods on board is liable to contribute to general average in respect of the sum advanced. I apprehend that he is. It is not a question between the charterer and the underwriters of the cargo and freight. The law lays it down that general average must be contributed to by persons interested in the freight and cargo. The debt was interested in the freight advanced in the same sense as a shipowner who had fitted up a ship with goods would be interested in the carriage thereof, so as to enable him to insure his interest, though it would not strictly be freight. I think that this is a clear case of general average, and therefore that judgment must be for the plts.

BYLES, J.—I am of the same opinion. The charterer is really the purchaser of part of the freight, and his purchased freight has been saved. Another point of view from which it may be looked at is, that the debt's goods have been augmented in value by the payment made. It is not, however, necessary to put it on this ground.

M. SMITH, J.—I am of the same opinion. According to what seems the proper construction of the charter-party, the advance was not under any circumstances to be repaid. Both the advance, therefore, and the cargo were at the debt's risk, and he is liable to contribute in respect of both of them.

REG. v. BJORNSEN.

Murder on the high seas—British ship—Register of ship—Prima facie proof—Alien owner—17 & 18 Vict. c. 104.

A murder was committed on board a ship on the high seas, sailing under the British flag, and the accused brought to England in custody, and put on his trial for the crime. To show jurisdiction in the courts of this country it was sought to establish that the ship was a British ship, and the register of the ship at the port of London was put in evidence, wherein the owner's name was stated to be C. A. Rehder, of 14, Lombard-street, City of London, merchant. It was proved, however, that Rehder was alien born, and it did not appear that he was a denizen of this country or naturalised. It was further proved that the ship was foreign built, and that the officers and crew, including the accused, were foreigners:

Held, that although the register might be prima facie evidence of the facts stated therein, and that the ship was a British ship, yet the proof that the owner was alien born rebutted the inference from the register that he was a British subject, and he was therefore disqualified by the Merchant Shipping Act (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104), s. 18, from being the owner of a British ship:

Held also, that it would not be presumed that he was denizenised or naturalised.

Case reserved by Channell, B.

The prisoner Arolph Bjornsen was indicted before me at the last Winter Commission for the county of Southampton, for the wilful murder, on the high seas, of one Heinrich Leonard Paul Scherck.

The jury acquitted the prisoner of murder.

They found him guilty of manslaughter.

This verdict is to be taken for the purposes of the present case to be correct, subject to the point of law hereinafter stated respecting the jurisdiction of the court to try the prisoner for the offence.

The offence was committed on board the barque Gustav Adolph, on the 21st June last, on the high seas, at a point about five days' sail from Pernambuco, and about 200 miles from the nearest land.

In opening the case to the jury the counsel for the prosecution stated that since the prosecution had been instituted doubts had arisen as to whether the Gustav Adolph was a British ship, so as to give jurisdiction to the Court to try the prisoner for an offence committed on board the barque on the high seas, and that he should place at the disposal of the prisoner's counsel, if desired by him, all the documents in the possession of the prosecution for clearing up those doubts.

The facts relating to the commission of the offence on board the ship having been proved, it was further proved that the ship in question was built at Kiel, in the duchy of Holstein, in the spring of the year 1864. That she sailed from Kiel to London, thence on the voyage in the course of which the offence was committed.

All the officers and crew were foreigners; the prisoner being second mate, and the deceased the master. The ship was sailing under the English flag on the 21st June 1864. The crew were told before sailing that Mr. Rehder was sole owner. He was not a born Englishman.

A certified copy of the register of the Gustav Adolph, under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, was put in by the counsel for the prosecution.

It was objected that the qualification of Mr.

Hoo. a. Bjoernsen.

My dear Sir,

I hereby make over to you, on the 31st May, A.C., by C. L. Beck, shipowner of Kiel, and myself, the delivery of the vessel therein connected, the sole owner of the barque-ship called Gustav Adolph having dimensions—

London, 13th Jan. 1864.

My dear Sir, I hereby make over to you, on the 31st Dec. last, I your responsibility in a contract signed by your good self and Mr. C. L. Beck, shipowner of the barque-ship Gustav Adolph, construction at or near Kiel. As sole owner of the vessel, I have full power of attorney, and request enough to undertake the whole and entire above-named ship Gustav Adolph, declaring that I shall be satisfied with all and everything do or come to be done in or to her, and being intended for the China trade, I am sure that you will be kind enough to sign, and in consideration of these services on that you charge no interest on any part of the above vessel for which you remain under promise, make over and transfer to you as between us, 6-7th, my six-seventh parts arising out of this venture. On the other side, however, as that in case any losses should ensue you share in them to the same extent as my six-sevenths (6-7th). As regards may be a favourable one, I remain, Sir, acted by the counsel for the prosecution was not a natural-born British subject, had no evidence of his having been denizenized or having been naturalized.

sitting on the part of the prisoner showed a partnership in the vessel and Ehlers, and that it was shown in 18th, the 18th, and other sections of Shipping Acts, that the owner of a ship in a British ship must be qualified as the owner of a legal interest; hitting the registration of the ship in Ehlers by the proper officer to be prima facie evidence of his being an owner, it could be no evidence of Ehlers' and therefore the letters proving in the ship rebutted the prima facie evidence that the ship was a British ship. The 106th Act was also referred to.

I resented sentence upon the prisoner, who is now in custody, till the next assizes, and reserved for the consideration of this court the following questions:

1. Whether I ought to have received the certified copy of the register of the ship as prima facie evidence that the ship was a British ship.

2. If it was rightly received as prima facie evidence, whether the letters of the 31st Dec. 1863, and of the 13th Jan. 1864, taken with the admission as to the status of Paul Ehlers, rebutted that prima facie evidence.

3. Whether, upon the evidence, there was sufficient proof that the Gustav Adolph was a British ship.

Harington for the prisoner.—It is submitted that the conviction was wrong. There was no sufficient evidence that this was a British ship. The register is only prima facie evidence of the matters contained or recited in the register or indorsed on it: (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 107.) The register describes Rehder as sole owner, and it was proved at the trial that he was alien born. He could not, therefore, be the owner of a British ship, because sect. 18 enacts that no ship shall be deemed a British ship unless she belongs wholly to owners of the following description, that is to say, first, natural-born subjects; second, persons made denizens by letters of denization or naturalized; third, bodies corporate established under, subject to the laws of, and having their principal place of business in the United Kingdom or some British possession. There was no proof that Rehder was denizenized or naturalized. The Merchant Shipping Amendment Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 68), s. 2, shows the intention of the Legislature to exclude unqualified persons from the ownership of British ships and the privileges incident thereto. Accordingly, when a British ship is transferred to any person not qualified to be the owner of a British ship, that fact is to be notified to the registrar and the certificate of register is to be delivered up. Sect. 106, which enacts that unregistered ships shall be treated as British ships in respect of offences committed on board thereof, is limited to ships owned by persons qualified to be owners of British ships. It will be contended that as by sect. 38 no person shall be registered until he has made a declaration of ownership containing a statement of his qualification to be an owner of a British ship and other particulars, it must be presumed that Rehder has made that declaration. But sect. 97 enables the registrar for reasonable cause to dispense with such declaration. No such presumption can be made, therefore, in this case. (Reg. v. Snel, 8 Q. B. 161.) A register is not a document required by the law of nations as expressive of a ship's character. (Le Chénier v. Pearson, 4 Tann. 367.) As to what gives the character of a British ship independently of statute, there is no case to be found reported. The case stands thus, the prima facie evidence of the ship being a British ship is rebutted by the proof of Rehder being an alien born:

The Eagle, 1 W. Rob. 346;

The Fortuna, 1 Dods. Adm. 81, 85;

First v. Anderson, 4 Tann. 662;

Liverpool Borough Bank v. Turner, 1 H. & J. 120;

2 D. O. F. & G. 102.

A certificated ship and a British ship are not convertible terms.

Fridoux (M. Bore with him) for the prosecution.—The conviction ought to be affirmed. There was evidence that this was a British ship. The question is not whether this was a British ship within the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, for a ship may be entitled to the protection of the British laws although it may not be within its provisions. The Admiralty Courts hold that the laws of a ship being a British ship are the residence of the owner.

C. CAS. R.]

REG. v. BJORNSEN.

[C. CAS. R.]

in the British dominions and the ship sailing under the British flag. The case shows that Rehder, the registered owner, was resident in London, and that the ship sailed from a British colony and carried the British flag. From these facts the court will infer that this was a British ship. It will be inferred that the declaration of ownership required by sect. 38 of 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104 was made previous to the ship being registered. [BLACKBURN, J.—Why so? The fact was not proved, and sect. 97 enables the registrar to dispense with it on reasonable grounds.] Sect. 42 requires certain particulars to be entered in the register-book, and among them the several particulars as to the ship's origin stated in the declaration of ownership. And on the principle omnia rite acta presumuntur it must be presumed that as the Act directs a public officer not to register a ship until such declaration is made, it will be presumed that it has been duly made. Illegality is not to be presumed, nor anything that would subject the ship to forfeiture.

Butler v. Allnutt, 1 Stark. R. 222;

Van Omerson v. Dorick, 2 Camp. 44;

Sissons v. Dixon, 5 B. & C. 758.

The court will further presume that the party who made the declaration of ownership was qualified according to his declaration. [BLACKBURN, J.—I own I have great difficulty in a criminal case against a third person in making any such presumptions. Sect. 107 carefully avoids saying that the register and declaration shall be proof of the contents, but says that they shall only be prima facie evidence of the matters therein.] It is not to be presumed that a party has committed the indictable offence of making a false declaration and unduly assuming a British character: (sect. 103). [BLACKBURN, J.—The truth of a statement is not to be presumed against a stranger on the ground that the party making the statement is not to be presumed to have committed a crime.] In Rex v. Hunkins, 10 East, 211, it was held that the presumption of law being that every person has conformed to the law till something appear to rebut that presumption, it was to be taken that a person elected to a municipal office had duly taken the sacrament within a year as required by the 13 Car. 2, c. 12. [MELLOR, J.—But in this case it is an admitted fact that Rehder was not born in England. CHANNELL, B.—Suppose that a declaration of ownership had actually been put in evidence, would there have been any presumption of the truth of its contents?] In Rodwell v. Redge, 1 C. & P. 220, a theatre was presumed to have been licensed from the fact of performances having taken place there; and in Sichell v. Lambert, 15 C. B., N. S., 781, a Roman Catholic chapel was presumed to have been licensed for the celebration of marriages from the fact of marriages taking place there. A somewhat similar presumption was made in McMahon v. Ellis and others, 14 Ir. C. L. Rep. 499. By sect. 97 the declaration of ownership can only be dispensed with where the registrar is satisfied that from any reasonable cause it cannot be made, and in that case the registrar, upon production of such other evidence, and subject to such terms as he may think fit, may dispense with the declaration. So that it is to be inferred either that the declaration of ownership was duly made, or that evidence equivalent thereto was produced before the registrar. [BLACKBURN, J.—Supposing there had been no statutory enactment affecting the question, what is the definition or character of a British ship at common law?] There is no abstract definition to be found in the books:

The Indian Chief, 3 Rob. 13, 33;

The Matchless, 1 Hag. Adm. Rep. 103;

Fidles v. Bundebeck, 3 B. & P. 207;

The Vigilantia, 1 C. Rob. 12.

On the whole it is submitted that in this case this was a British ship for the purpose of giving jurisdiction to the Admiralty to prosecute for offences committed on board of her, and it would be dangerous to hold the contrary.

Harington in reply.—It is not found as a fact that Rehder was an English merchant or resident in London. Carrying any particular flag is evidence against the owner, but not for him, and is not a circumstance from which jurisdiction can be presumed against a foreigner.

ERLE, C. J.—I am of opinion that this conviction cannot be sustained. The prisoner was convicted of manslaughter committed on the high seas, and the question is whether there was any jurisdiction to try the prisoner in England. The crime was committed on the ocean thousands of miles away from British territory, and the ground on which the prosecutor relies for jurisdiction to try in England is that the crime was committed on board a British ship, which carries with it British law, and that the case is therefore as if the crime had been committed on British land. The whole question is whether the ship was a British ship. I am clearly of opinion that there was prima facie evidence that she was a British ship. There was evidence of a certificate of registry in London, wherein Rehder was described as the owner at that time as resident in London, and the ship was sailing under the British flag. But Rehder was described therein as sole owner, and I take it to have been proved at the trial that he was alien born. That reduces the question to this, whether the prima facie evidence of its being a British ship was rebutted by the negative proof that Rehder was alien born. I am of opinion that it was. Then is the proof that he was alien born disposed of by the presumptions relied on by Mr. Prideaux in his argument, viz., letters of denizenship or naturalisation, and is the court to make such presumptions because Rehder, being alien born, would have become liable to be proceeded against for penalties under the Merchant Shipping Act, for registering the ship as belonging to a British owner? I am of opinion that there is no presumption to justify us in inferring that letters of denizenship or naturalisation were granted to Rehder. I limit my judgment to the question of evidence, the point reserved is merely a matter of evidence.

CHANNELL, B.—I also am of opinion that the conviction cannot be sustained. The offence was committed on board a ship of which the captain, mate and crew, including the prisoner, were foreigners. In one sense the ship may be taken to have been the property of Rehder, who, it was clear, was not a British-born subject. The question is, whether an English court has jurisdiction to try the foreigner for this offence. An English court can have no jurisdiction unless it is to be presumed that this was a British ship, and I can see no ground for inferring that this was a British ship. On the Merchant Shipping Act I cannot come to that conclusion, but on the evidence I agree that there was prima facie evidence that the ship was British; but the ordinary rule that prima facie evidence may be rebutted applies in this case. I must look at the case then as presenting this fact, that the owner was an alien born. If letters of denizenship or naturalisation had been produced they would have removed that difficulty, but they were not. I see no ground on which the court may draw the inference that one or the other may have been granted. It was then said that the ship might be a British ship, independent of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, but I can see no ground for any such inference. Some doubt might arise on sect. 106 as KBURN, J.—I am of the same opinion. It is held that if a ship is a British ship, it carries the notion that it is part of the British ter- and crimes committed on board thereof may l in England. I agree that the facts of the iling under the British flag, and being as a British ship, and being registered in l, were prima facie evidence that it was sh ship. The register was prima facie evi- that apparently Rehder was sole owner, was proved that he was alien born. There be no pretence for saying that this was sh ship, but from the circumstance of the : stating Rehder to be resident in this r at the time of the registry. That fact shows that he owed a temporary allegiance country, and in the case cited of the Indian that was the effect of the decision. For hat appears, he might have left this country, his allegiance here would have ceased. The nt Shipping Act requires an owner to be h subject, and sect. 106 does not apply where e owner is a foreigner. I do not think, e, that this ship could be said to be a British as to make it part of British territory.

OR, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will d that Mr. Prideaux, while citing the cases ie brought before us, and which are unques- was losing sight of the admitted fact in this at the owner was alien born.

I, J.—I am of the same opinion. To prove tion, the register of the ship in London was vidence, but when it was proved that the as a foreigner, the prima facie effect of the e in the register was rebutted. The decla- of ownership is prior to the register rawn up, and if the effect of the evidence of ster is got rid of it can hardly be said that ng done prior to it is not also rebutted.

Conviction quashed.

at there was no evidence to go to the jury.

was an action against an executor for work our, and on account stated. The deft. never indebted.

e trial at Leeds before the under-sheriff of re, it appeared that the plt. was a ship- at Goole, and the testator, who resided 1 in Lincolnshire, was the registered owner loop Ocean. In Dec. 1863 the Ocean arrived rt of Goole and discharged her cargo. The then called on the plt. and stated that he owner of the ship, and asked him to do certain repairs. Nothing was said about credit at this time. The plt. did the repairs, and sent in his bill amounting to 16*l.* 19*s.* 1*d.* to the master, who thereupon asked him to give him credit till he got to London, when he would send him the money. This the plt. consented to, and nothing more was done till Nov. 1864, when the master wrote from Dundee saying that he could not send the money. The plt. then wrote to the master, inclosing a bill at one month, which the master refused to accept. On the 13th Jan. 1865 the plt. having heard that Nell, the testator, was the owner, wrote to him inclosing the account for the repairs and asking for payment. This letter was answered by the deft.'s attorneys, who stated that Nell was dead, and his estate was not liable for debts contracted by the master, as he had never authorised him to pledge his credit. The plt. in cross-examination stated that he had headed the account in his books "To Capt. Chappel," the master.

The plt. and a witness who introduced the master to the plt. were the only witnesses called. The register was put in by which it appeared that Nell the testator was sole owner of the ship, and it was admitted that the charge was reasonable, that the repairs were necessary, and that the deft. was then in possession of the ship, but there was no evidence that the testator had appointed the master, or indeed any other evidence than that he was registered owner, and that the repairs were ordered by the captain. The jury found a verdict for the plt. for the full amount.

Pearce, on the 12th June, obtained a rule calling on the plt. to show cause why there should not be a new trial on the ground, first, that no evidence was adduced at the trial to show that the deft.'s testator authorised Capt. Chappel to employ the plt.; secondly, misdirection of the learned assessor in not directing the jury, that on the evidence the said Capt. Chappel was the person liable to the plt.; and thirdly, on the ground that the verdict was against evidence.

Prentice now showed cause.—There was evidence to show that the repairs were ordered by the captain, and I submit the captain has authority to bind the owner for repairs. [CROMPTON, J.—It always used to be a question of contract, and now Mitcheson v. Oliver, 5 E. & B. 419; 25 L. T. Rep. 258, has brought it back to that.] These were necessary repairs, and the captain has implied authority to bind the owner in the absence of anything to the contrary. [MELLOR, J.—You must show more than that. You must show that the captain was appointed by the owner, and made the contract with his privacy.] The captain says he is the principal owner: Myers v. Willis, 17 C. B. 77; in error, 18 C. B. 886.

Middleton, in support, was not called on.

CROMPTON, J.—I think that according to the case of Mitcheson v. Oliver, which all courts must be bound by, and which I think is grounded on sound principles of law, this claim is founded on contract and not on ownership; it may depend to a certain extent on the exigency of the occasion; but that point does not arise here. It would be absurd to say that if a ship was on fire a captain could not employ men to put it out. But I think we should leave that question open, as the court did in Mitcheson v. Oliver. There Parke, B. says the verdict was against evidence; and, further on in his judgment, he says that there was some evidence for the jury. There the facts were that there was some evidence that the deft. appointed the captain. Here we must see what is the effect of the whole evidence. There is no suggestion that the jury are not to believe the plt.'s evidence, and on that we are to see if there is any case to go to the jury. It has long been settled that a nonsuit may proceed on the plt.'s and the def.'s undisputed evidence, but here it is perfectly clear that there was no case for the jury; and when I say the def.'s evidence, I mean that part of the plt.'s evidence which is favourable to the def. If a master in an English port orders repairs, that is only general prima facie evidence. In Mitcham v. Mavor the def. had really appointed the captain, and it was said that there was some evidence. But here the case is conclusive; there was no evidence of a contract with the def. At the time of the contract there was no mention of the def., and the bill was sent in to the captain, and entered in the plt.'s books in the captain's name. Afterwards the plt. sees the captain, who applied for time, and afterwards he draws a bill giving him time; but he does not apply to the def. till long afterwards. Therefore there is no doubt that the contract was with the captain, and for that reason I think there should be a rule for a new trial on the ground of there being no evidence, or, in other words, on the ground of misdirection. We cannot enter a nonsuit, as leave was not reserved. The case will go down for trial without payment of costs.

MELLOS, J.—I am of the same opinion. The only evidence by which it is sought to charge the def. is proof that his name was on the register, and that Chappel acted as captain, but there is no proof that he acted as the def.'s captain or with his knowledge. It appears to me that credit was entirely given to the captain, and all the circumstances show that the plt. treated the captain as the real person with whom he had contracted. There was no application to the def. till after the delay, and, therefore, I think there was no evidence for the jury, and that the rule for a new trial should be made absolute. There will be a new trial without costs, as if leave had been reserved we should have entered a nonsuit.

Rule absolute.

COURT OF ADMIRALTY.

Wednesday, April 26, 1865.

THE ANNIE SHERWOOD.

Seamen's wages—American dollars—Sterling and currency payments.

Where in a seaman's articles it is covenanted to pay wages in dollars, sterling and not currency value is to be assumed as intended, and the wages are to be paid at the rate of 4s. 2d. per dollar.

Where it was alleged that there was a specific covenant in seamen's articles, duly read over and explained to the crew, that the wages when due should be "payable in United States currency or its equivalent."

Held, that the court would not enforce such a condition against the seamen, from the fact of its being contrary to equity and justice, and an imposition upon such a class of men as mariners.

Brett and Vernon Lushington appeared for the plt.; Dr. Deane and Potter for the defts.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which came before the court on a claim made by the late chief mate and steward of the barque Annie Sherwood, for their wages. From the plt.'s petition it appeared that on the 15th March 1864 the Annie Sherwood was lying at the port of New York, chartered on a voyage from thence to Cuba, then to Liverpool and back to Cuba or the West Indies, and then to a final port of discharge in the United States; the time not to exceed eight months; that her master hired the plt. Drinkwater as chief mate, and the plt. Beckett as cook and steward, Drinkwater's wages to be forty-five dollars per month, and Beckett's forty dollars per month; that accordingly the plt. entered into the service of the ship in their respective capacities; that Drinkwater signed the ship's articles on board the ship, and subsequently signed another set of ship's articles at the British consul's office at New York; that Beckett signed the ship's articles at the shipping office of a Mr. Ferras; but that neither of the engagements were made, nor did either of the plt. sign the articles, in the presence of the British consul at New York, according to the provisions of the 180th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854. That on the 23rd March the ship, having taken in a cargo of coopersage, sailed with the plt. on board, and about the 20th April arrived at Cienfuegos, in Cuba, and discharged cargo there, and about the 16th May sailed from thence with a cargo of sugar for Liverpool, which port she made on the 3rd July with the plt. on board, and there docked and discharged her cargo; that Drinkwater continued on board the ship, performing his duty until the 17th Nov., when his period of eight months expired, and he then left and was discharged from the ship; that Beckett continued on board the ship performing his duty until the 21st Nov., when his time expired, and he left and was discharged; that the master did not deliver to the plt., or to either of them, or to the shipping master, an account of wages, as required by the 171st section of the Merchant Shipping Act, and the master had not paid them the respective wages due to them for the voyage, though often applied to and requested so to do. The petition then prayed the court to pronounce for 70*l.* 10*s.* as due to Drinkwater, and 67*l.* 9*s.* 11*d.* as due to Beckett, and to give them each ten days' double pay, under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act, and their costs. The answer for the deft., after admitting the sums at which the plt. were hired, pleaded that it was further agreed that any sums to become due for wages under the agreement should, when so due, be payable in United States currency or its equivalent; that the agreement provided for the service by the plt. on board the vessel on a voyage from New York to Cienfuegos (Cuba), thence to a port or ports in Europe, as the master might direct, with the privilege of returning to the United States via a port or ports in the West Indies, the final port of discharge to be a northern port in the United States; and the agreement was limited to eight calendar months; that it was untrue that Drinkwater signed two sets of articles; that both Drinkwater and Beckett signed articles on the 19th March 1864, in the presence of a consular officer of Her Majesty at New York, and at the time of such signature fully understood the terms of such articles, and that at such time the consent of the consular officer to the engagement of the plt. had been obtained, and all conditions required with respect to such engagements had been fulfilled; that the master delivered to the shipping agent accounts of the balance of wages due to both the plt., and that the deft. had always been ready and willing to pay to the plt. the balance appearing by such accounts to be due to each of them respectively, according to the terms of the said agreement, and was so ready and willing within the time fixed for such purpose under the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, but that the plt. alleges

THE NORTHUMBERLAND v. THE ANDALUSIA.

refused to accept the same; that at the expiration of the eight months to which the said agreement was limited, the plts. claimed their discharge, although the master was perfectly willing to have taken them back to a northern port in the United States of America, and at that time the equivalent of a dollar of the United States currency at the then rate of exchange did not exceed the sum of 2s. 1d. of British money; that the deft. had brought into court the sums of 7l. 10s. 10d. and 7l. 16s. 7d., being the sums due to Drinkwater and Beckett respectively for balance of wages according to the terms of the said agreement. The court was then prayed to pronounce for the sums tendered, with costs. The reply for the plts. alleged, that if it appeared in the agreement that the wages should be payable in United States currency or its equivalent, such provision was fraudulently inserted, without the knowledge of either of them; that by custom, seamen engaged in the United States at dollar wages were, if paid off in the United Kingdom, paid off at the rate of 4s. 2d. sterling per dollar, and such custom was binding in the present case; that it was never intended by the owners, or by the master of the ship, that the final port of discharge of the ship should be a northern port in the United States, but it was intended by them that the ship should be discharged and the plts. paid off in the United Kingdom. The rejoinder for the deft., after denying the statements in the reply, concluded the pleadings. Upon this state of facts, the true question which the court was called upon to investigate and decide was, what was the contract made between the parties who are suing in this court for their wages, and those who had the authority to ship them? When an agreement of this description, which is the agreement for foreign-going ships selected by Board of Trade with reference to the statute, is certified by the vice-consul and the parties whose names are here mentioned, it is prima facie evidence that such was the contract which was really entered into between the parties; and if it stood unquestioned and undisturbed by the evidence in the case, the court would be inclined to give such construction as appeared consistent with equity and the terms of that agreement, presuming that when it was signed it was in the state it is now in. But there is this question, which is, whether or not the court can come to the conclusion that this agreement was, in all respects, precisely in the state in which it now is at the time when the plts. signed it, or when they are alleged to have been present at the time. In considering this question, it is not simply to take the word of the chief mate, who swears positively that he did not see these words at the time, though he read the paper through, and consequently he swears in substance that the words did not exist, but must have been inserted afterwards. The Court would be exceedingly cautious in taking the evidence of a person of this description, generally speaking, against the words to be found in a written instrument. But there remains behind another consideration—what is the nature of the stipulation, and how far it is consistent with probability, how far with justice and equity, for these words to have been inserted? Now let us see what is the purpose of these words, as contended for by the owners of the ship. It is that the mariners who entered into the contract should be subjected to receive payment only according to the currency which happened to exist at the time in the United States at any one period, whether they might happen to be paid off either in the United States or elsewhere. That the seamen should voluntarily and knowingly have entered into such an agreement is open to great doubt, more especially as it has been proved to the satisfaction of the court that the universal custom was that they should be paid, not after the rate of the currency value of the dollar, but after the rate of 4s. 2d. per dollar; that it has also been proved by the shipping master, who stated that he had been concerned in no less than 500 cases, that such has been considered the justice and equity of the contract, and that, even where the articles have been in the shape and form in which these stand, there has been payment after the rate of 4s. 2d. In addition to this, there is the evidence of the deputy-consul of the United States in London, who says, in all contracts of seamen of this description 4s. 2d. was the rate after which they were paid. This being so, the court must first inquire whether this is not a special agreement of such a character and such a kind that it would require, in order to satisfy the court it was consistent with justice and equity, that there has been the fullest explanation given to the seamen (who were going to enter into the contract) of the nature of the contract, of the loss they would be subjected to, and that such a contract was a violation of the universal custom with respect to mariners in their condition. Now it is highly improbable that such clause was inserted after a full and complete and entire explanation. It is true that the vice-consul states he explained it; but that is merely the usual form and usual phrase adopted on these occasions, though perhaps the court is not altogether satisfied by the mere adoption of it; but it is the usual form and phrase that the thing said to be done was substantially carried into execution. That the court is not satisfied of; and unless it be assumed the chief mate was guilty of perjury, such a conclusion could not be arrived at. The result is, that the court is not compelled to decide the question whether or not the words were there at the time the articles were signed, but it bases its judgment upon the fact that it is not satisfied that the articles as contended for are consistent with justice and equity. It is the principle of this court, and there are many cases which show how rigidly this principle has been adhered to, that the mariner shall not be subjected to any hardship of this kind, of which previously he was not cognisant and aware of the consequences. Seamen are a peculiar class of people, who according to the doctrine of the Admiralty Court are entitled to protection. Their very ignorance, haste, total disregard of forms, and their being totally unaccustomed to matters of this description, induce the court to guard them against their own want of care and caution. Now the court is not satisfied that these articles were sufficiently explained to the men, and, even supposing that they were so explained, there is no sufficient reason why they should be enforced against them. Such a condition as here set up is in direct violation of a clearly established custom, acknowledged at least, as the evidence in this case proves, in two of the greatest ports in England, viz., London and Liverpool, and, for any evidence to the contrary, generally prevailing; and this court, therefore, will give such a condition no countenance or support, but will pronounce for wages after the rate of 4s. 2d. the dollar instead of 2s. 1d.

THE NORTHUMBERLAND v. THE ANDALUSIA.

Salvage—Service by steamship.

Where salvage services are rendered by steamships, the amount of salvage which the court will award is not necessarily affected by the fact of the services performed occupying only a short time; the Court now

Holding, that with respect to steamships it is better that the service should occupy a short space of time than the length of time it used to occupy from the delay which arose to enable sailing ships to make the manœuvres necessary to perform the service.

Brett and Clarkson appeared for the Northumberland.

The Queen's Advocate and Dr. Deane for the Andalusia.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was a suit instituted by the screw steamer Northumberland against the screw steamer Andalusia, for salvage services rendered to her off St. Goven's Head, on the coast of Pembrokehire. From the evidence it appeared that the Northumberland, whilst on her way from Newport with coals for Liverpool, being at the time under charter to make five voyages between those ports as expeditiously as possible, after encountering heavy weather, during which part of her bulwarks were washed away, on the morning of the 14th Sept., the weather having become clearer, though the sea was still heavy, fell in with the Andalusia (from Cardiff, with coals for Liverpool) in a state of distress, and with a signal of distress hoisted, her pumps choked, and her engine fires extinguished, and having shipped a great deal of water. After several attempts by the Northumberland to take the Andalusia in tow, during one of which the ship came into collision, and upon another occasion, owing to the Andalusia steering heavily, the second mate had a narrow escape of being drowned (being suspended by the hawser, to which he clung until some of the crew extricated him), the Northumberland at last succeeded in taking the Andalusia in tow, and ultimately conducted her to Milford Haven, where the tow ropes were cast off. The value of the Northumberland, her cargo and freight was stated at 8650*l.*, and that of the Andalusia at 5750*l.* A tender was made of 350*l.* by the owners of the Andalusia, which the owners of the Northumberland refused to accept; and it was contended for the owners of the Andalusia that 350*l.* was a sufficient sum for the aid their ship had received, the service occupying only eight hours. The most important question for the court to consider was, what was the degree of danger, if any, to which the Andalusia was subject at the time when the assistance was rendered to her by the Northumberland? According to the protest, it would appear that at 10.40 a.m., which was the period when the assistance was commenced to be rendered, it was blowing an increasing gale. In the pleadings it was stated that the danger was not very severe, or not very likely to be destructive, inasmuch as the crew of the Andalusia might have drained the vessel of the water and lighted the fires, and, of course, proceeded again to steam; but, if that was the state of things, it is singular they resorted to the means they did in order to obtain salvage assistance, viz., hoisted a signal for assistance, and representing, as they did represent, that they must be taken in tow in order to save them from risk of loss of life. The Court was of opinion that the Andalusia was in very considerable danger. In the evidence it was stated that the Andalusia was very low in the water, which would probably be one of the reasons why the danger was greater than otherwise would have taken place. The Andalusia did not appear to have made any particular leak, or anything of that kind, but seems to have made water to an extent which undoubtedly created danger, because she was a steam-vessel, and at the time the fires were extinguished and the water came in it was clear a considerable amount of danger was likely to occur; and it was also clear that somehow or other, though not perhaps by a leak, the vessel was making water: for it is averred in the protest, that "on sounding the pumps found the vessel making water, which obliged them to get assistance from shore to bale her out," so that, after the Andalusia had been brought to anchor in Milford Haven, she was in that condition that it was necessary to get assistance from the shore to bale the water out of her. Taking all the facts and circumstances into consideration, the court came to the conclusion that the Andalusia was in considerable danger, and that looking at the state of the weather, there must have been considerable difficulty in towing her to Milford Haven. It was admitted on all hands that no blame was to be attributed to the salvors for want of skill or any improper conduct. No doubt the representation was substantially true, that there was considerable difficulty in getting the hawser attached; for, first an attempt was made with one hawser, and then with two, and there was much difficulty in performing the service. Respecting the duration of the service, it was short, and did not exceed eight hours; but that is a question, where steam-vessels are employed, which the court does not consider operates against the claim for remuneration, because the court has held that it is better the service should occupy a short space of time than the length of time it used to occupy from the delay which arose to make the manœuvres requisite to perform the service. As to the question of detention, the Northumberland, it is admitted, was not detained long. She went to Liverpool, but she lost her turn. Looking at all the circumstances, the Court is of opinion that 360*l.* is an inadequate reward, and will give 510*l.*, allotting to the owners 300*l.*, because it was their vessel that performed the service, and that she was compelled to deviate from the course she was pursuing, and they have incurred some inconvenience, and probably some loss, from the detention and loss of time which has been mentioned. The Court would also give a considerable sum to the master, because of the responsibility he undertook, viz., 100*l.*; and will award 100*l.* to the crew, to be distributed according to their ratings.

THE SPLENDID, THE THOMAS BAILEY AND THE QUEEN OF THE EAST v. THE MARTIN LUTHER.

Salvage awards as to derelicts.

Former practice of the court to allow one-half of the value of the derelict property in salvage awards no longer observed, the present practice being for the court to be guided by the degree of merit of each particular case as it arises.

Dr. Deane and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the salvors; the Queen's Advocate and V. Lushington for the owners.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, of which the facts as adduced in evidence were as follow:—On the 9th Nov. 1864, about nine o'clock in the morning, the fishing-smack Thomas Bailey, whilst engaged in fishing in the North Sea about 120 miles E.N.E. of the Spurn, the wind blowing E.N.E. with a heavy rolling swell, fell in with the barque Martin Luther, dismasted, abandoned by her crew, waterlogged, and only kept from sinking by being timber-laden. Part of her mizen-mast was standing; she had no boats or ropes on board; her jibboom was partly chopped as if an attempt had been made to cut it away; her wheel had been carried away, and she was otherwise in a deplorable condition. The Thomas Bailey then began to tow the barque for the Humber, and, as the water was level with the barque's deck and there was a heavy swell, she was a great drag upon the smack and her trowl-warp, and they made very slow progress. In the afternoon of the same day the fishing-smacks Splendid and Queen of the East came up, and an arrangement was made between the master of the Thomas Bailey and the masters of the Splendid and Queen of the East, that they should assist in the salvage to get the barque into port as soon as possible. The smacks then commenced towing ahead of each other, the Thomas Bailey being next the barque, and a man from each smack having been sent on board her to assist in her management. On the morning of the 10th the strain upon the Thomas Bailey and her hawser being very great, the Queen of the East was cast off and her trowl-warp also attached to the barque, and they again towed ahead; but that did not succeed, for the wind having suddenly dropped, the jibboom of the barque passed through and tore the mainsail of the Queen of the East. The Splendid and Queen of the East were then cast off, and the Thomas Bailey alone towed the barque until the 11th, when the Queen of the East took her place next the barque, with a rope from either bow. The Splendid was placed ahead of her, and the Thomas Bailey ahead of the Splendid. They so towed the vessel till about 4 a.m. of the 13th, when the wind blew so strong from the S.S.E. that the tow-rope of the Queen of the East broke, and the three smacks parted from the barque and she was in danger of getting ashore. The Splendid, however, got hold of her again and towed her for an hour and a half alone, whereby her bridles, valued at 5*l.*, were so damaged that they were condemned. The Thomas Bailey and Splendid then continued to tow her, and the Queen of the East was sent to Grimsby for a steam-tug, and having returned with a tug an agreement was made with that vessel to assist the barque into Grimsby for 30*l.*, and the tug and the smacks Splendid and Thomas Bailey then towed ahead, the Queen of the East lying by. Meanwhile the owner of the Splendid and Queen of the East, residing at Hull, engaged the tugs Superb, Lady Londesborough and Sir William Scott to proceed from Hull to the assistance of the barque under certain agreements. Two of the tugs took hold of the barque, together with the tug before mentioned; the smacks were cast off and the barque was safely towed into Grimsby dock about 5 p.m. on that day, and on the following day (Monday) the barque was hauled into the middle of the dock and placed in charge of the receiver of wreck. For these services the fishing-smacks now prayed to be compensated, as also for the loss and damage arising from the performance of the services. The claims of the tugs had been previously settled. The Martin Luther was a derelict, and it was the habit of the court in former days to give a moiety, but of late it has given a reward proportionate to the service rendered. The Court considered the service rendered in the present case was a most meritorious one, lasting a great length of time, and depriving the smacksmen of their occupation of fishing; and the Court would, therefore, give the sum of 600*l.*, directing it to be distributed according to the tonnage and number of the crew on board the smacks, giving the Thomas Bailey 7 per cent. in addition to the others, and allowing costs.

THE INDIAN v. THE JESSIE.

Collision—Foul berth.

A clipper-built ship has no right to place herself in such a berth as would make it inevitable that she must take the ground on an ebb tide, to the probable risk of other vessels moored in the vicinity.

A clipper-built ship not being able to get up to her discharging berth at a wharf, owing to the number of ships before her, moored herself in an anchorage ground outside, in a berth where there was not sufficient draught of water for her to lie afloat at low tide, in consequence of which she listed over on a vessel anchored alongside:

Held, that the clipper ship so mooring herself was answerable in damages for the injuries sustained by the vessel anchored alongside of her and berthed previously to the time of the clipper ship taking up her moorings where she did.

Brett and Dr. Pritchard appeared for the Indian; Dr. Deane and E. C. Clarkson for the Jessie.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the barge Indian against the schooner Jessie, to recover for loss arising from a collision between them in Battlebridge tier (which is on the south side of the river Thames, below London-bridge), about nine p.m. on the 25th Nov. 1863. It was agreed that the wind was from the westward and the weather fine. The case for the Indian set forth that she was laden with about thirty tons of stone, but had an ample free board, and that while so laden she was properly moored at the Pickle Herring upper tier, her starboard side being alongside a vessel called the Wool Packet, and shortly afterwards the Jessie arrived at the tier, and was brought up and moored alongside the port side of the barge; that the Jessie at such time drew about thirteen feet of water; that it was high water at the tier about two p.m. of the day in question, and at low water there was about eight feet of water only at the inner side of the tier where the Jessie was moored; that as the tide ebbed the Jessie listed over upon the barge, and in consequence thereof the barge sank and the Jessie subsequently settled down upon and utterly destroyed her. The defence of the Jessie represented that on her arrival in London with a cargo of figs from Smyrna, she proceeded to Fresh-wharf, which is on the north side of the river Thames, to discharge her cargo; that it being found impossible for her to do so, owing to the number of vessels there, she went to Battlebridge tier, where she was moored in the usual manner with her head down the river, and in the second berth from the shore; that at such time another schooner, called the Charlotte, was moored in the same tier, inside and on the starboard side of the Jessie, and in the first berth from the shore; that at the time when the Jessie was so moored it was about high water; that in the fourth berth in the tier from the shore the Wool Packet was moored, and the Indian was, contrary to the rules and by-laws duly made and promulgated by the Conservators of the River Thames, and then lawfully in force, fastened alongside the Wool Packet and between the Wool Packet and the Jessie, and receiving broken granite from the Wool Packet; that the Indian being loaded on the port side only, her gunwale on that side was close to the water, whilst her starboard side was considerably elevated and rested against the Wool Packet; that after the Jessie had been moored a further quantity of stone was discharged from the Wool Packet into the Indian, and placed on her starboard side, but no proper precautions were taken, whilst the ebb tide made, to keep the Wool Packet off from the Indian, and enable the latter to right herself; that the Indian remained in this position (with no person on board her) between the Wool Packet and the Jessie, and although she could and ought to have been taken out from between the Wool Packet and Jessie (her lading having been completed) at slack water, she was suffered to remain between them, and when the flood tide made it flowed into the Indian, and although, when this was discovered by those on board the Jessie, they and also the persons on board the Wool Packet endeavoured to get her out from between the two vessels, they were unable to do, and at about 9 p.m. the Indian sunk under the quarter of the Wool Packet. The real question for the consideration of the court was, what was the immediate cause of the barque sinking? was it occasioned by the Jessie or some other cause? One of the witnesses on behalf of the Jessie, when he was pressed, stated that even if the Jessie had been out of the way this barque might have sunk in consequence of her cargo being so entirely out of the level. According to the evidence of the Indian, pains had been taken to bring her more to the level, and they continued at work later than usual to effect that end. The evidence for the Jessie is, that the Indian was so much out of the level that that really was the occasion of her sinking. Probably, and in the opinion of the court the fact is, it is not that she was exactly, on the level, but that she was not so much out of the level as stated by the other parties. The medium probably was the fact, and it is said that nothing but that or the Wool Packet could have caused her to sink. It is stated in the petition that the Jessie drew thirteen feet of water, and it is not contradicted in the answer. The mate of the Jessie states it was about twelve feet she drew, and I think the extreme depth of the water stated by any of the witnesses at low water at the place where she was is eleven feet, one foot less than was sufficient for her to float according to the estimate of the mate. The defence of the Jessie is, that "after the Jessie had been moored, a further quantity of stone was discharged from the Wool Packet into the Indian, and placed on her starboard side, but no proper precautions were taken whilst the ebb tide made to keep the Wool Packet off from the Indian, and enable the latter to right herself; that the Indian remained in this position, with no person on board her, between the Wool Packet and the Jessie, after she could and ought to have been taken out from between the Wool Packet and Jessie, her loading having been completed at slack water." Now, if it be true that the loading was completed at slack water, and if it could be shown it was the duty of those on board the Indian her to remove her from the position she was in then, between the Jessie and the Wool Packet, that might have been an excellent defence; but that seems to fail altogether, for nothing can be clearer from the evidence than that the lading was not completed, for she had only thirty tons of granite, and was capable of carrying forty-five tons; therefore that defence must be put out of consideration, and the defence argued here must be reverted to. It is said that the Jessie was perfectly justified in taking up her position where she did; but if she did take up her position there, knowingly or unknowingly, was it not her duty to take care that she did not do damage to a vessel which had precedence of her, and was lying there to take up cargo. It did not appear that anything whatever was done on board the Jessie for the purpose of taking precautions against the danger that might possibly arise from her taking the ground. It seems clear from the evidence she did take the ground upon two occasions, both on that night and the next morning; and if she did take the ground, then the question is whether that was not the necessary cause, or the moving cause, of the destruction of the Indian. As to the bye-laws, there is a specific penalty of 5*l.*; and if the barque fell within the 29th bye-law, and that penalty was incurred, it does not necessarily follow that she must be considered as a wrong-doer in this collision. It does not appear that there was anything in the conduct of those on board the barque for which blame can be imputed to them. They began to load in the usual and accustomed manner, first on one side, then turned round and loaded on the other, for the purpose of putting the cargo as conveniently as they could do to keep the barge on the level, and having the trouble of putting the cargo all on board at once, as there might be mischief, and, independently of that, there might be trouble in levelling it; and therefore they attempted to do it, as far as they could, in a convenient manner. The two questions, therefore, which the court submitted to the Elder Brethren were, first, whether the Jessie was not the cause of the loss of the Indian; and, secondly, whether she was not to blame for such loss? Having conferred with the Elder Brethren (represented on this occasion by Captain Bax and Captain Nesbitt), the Court stated that those gentlemen were of opinion that the Jessie was solely to blame, she being too sharp a vessel and drawing too much water to take up such a position for an ebb tide.

MARITIME LAW REPORTS.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT, LIVERPOOL.

Tuesday, April 10, 1866.

(Before MELLOR, J. and Jury.)

USSELL v. THE COMMERCIAL UNION INSURANCE COMPANY.

Marine insurance—Imperfect disclosure of known facts.—Policy of marine insurance based on assumption that all material facts known to the owner in respect to his ship are disclosed at the time of insurance.

Subsequently to an application to underwriters to insure a ship on her voyage from a port in Ireland to the port of Nassau, and previously to the terms of insurance being agreed on, the owner of the ship received information that the ship had put into an intermediate port to repair, and the owner omitted to advise the underwriters of the same:

Held, that the owner of the ship was bound to communicate to the underwriters all material facts known to the owner at the time of insurance, and during the progress of the negotiations between him and the underwriters; that the withholding of such facts deprived the underwriters of a fair opportunity of judging of the condition of the ship, and of calculating the risks run by them in insuring; and that the non-disclosure of such facts, even where there was no fraudulent concealment, voided the policy.

This was an action brought to recover the sum of 1475*l.* upon a policy of insurance on the steamship Red Jacket, on her voyage from Queenstown, Ireland, to Nassau, and Tampico in Mexico. The insurance company pleaded that they had been induced to issue the policy on the fraudulent representations of the plts. and the parties interested in the risk, and the fraudulent and improper concealment of certain material information known to the plts. and the parties interested, but unknown to the company, and which ought to have been communicated to them.

The pleadings having been formally opened by Quain on the part of the plts.,

Edward James, Q.C. stated the case for the defendants as follows.—The ship in question had been built in the year 1842, but had changed her names on various occasions, having, since the American war commenced, been engaged in running the blockade. She left Liverpool in May 1863 with a cargo for Nassau; but, in consequence of considerable damage sustained at sea in the early part of her voyage, she put into the port of Cork, from whence she sailed in the latter end of July. It was a well-known fact that for voyages such as that on which the Red Jacket was bound, viz., to Nassau and Mexico, the season between the beginning of August, and the UZIELLI v. THE COMMERCIAL UNION INSURANCE COMPANY.

[ADM.]

January following was the most dangerous; so much so that it was often stipulated in policies of marine insurance that the ship insured should not sail during that period. The Red Jacket belonged to a Mr. Dronke, who was the real plt. in the case, Mr. Uzielli being merely a nominal plt. The ship having sailed from Cork in July, Mr. Dronke wrote from Liverpool to Messrs. Uzielli and Co., of London, to insure the ship from Queenstown in ballast, the ship having discharged her cargo in the port of Cork and sailed thence for Nassau in ballast. Mr. Uzielli, on receiving this information from Mr. Dronke, called in the beginning of August at the office of the Commercial Union Insurance Company, where he saw the underwriter of that company, who referred to Lloyd's List, and finding no ship of the name of the Red Jacket inserted there, required to have further information, and remarked on the lateness of the season for such a voyage. Mr. Uzielli upon this wrote to Mr. Dronke on the 5th Aug. for the required information, and on the following day Mr. Dronke wrote back to the effect that the Red Jacket had been built in 1842; that her tonnage was 159 tons; that she was a paddle steamer of 100 (nominal) horse power, in thorough repair and in splendid condition. The premium which Mr. Dronke had empowered Mr. Uzielli to pay was five guineas; but on the 7th Aug., when Mr. Uzielli called on the defts. and showed the letter he had then just received, the defts.' underwriter stated that, considering the lateness of the season, the age of the steamer, and the risk that would have to be run, the sum named was not enough, and should, in fact, be doubled. Mr. Uzielli, upon this, wrote and informed Mr. Dronke of the increased premium required, and that gentleman wrote back declining to give ten guineas, but authorising Mr. Uzielli to offer six. In this letter Mr. Dronke again stated that the ship was in first-rate order; urged that the season was still a favourable one; and asserted that he expected that the ship would arrive at Nassau or Tampico before the end of the month, or not much later. Some further correspondence then took place, Mr. Dronke offering seven guineas; but eventually agreeing to give eight guineas, at which premium the insurance was effected. It now appeared that on the 6th Aug. Mr. Dronke had received a telegram from the captain of the Red Jacket, stating that the ship had put into Ferrol, in Spain, in consequence of having broken her crank, and that he expected the repairs would be completed in a few weeks. This circumstance Mr. Dronke never communicated to the underwriters, though it would be shown that it would have had a material effect on their mind in regard to the terms of insurance. With regard to policies of insurance there was no law more clearly laid down than this; viz., that if from any cause whatever, whether from ignorance, mistake, or fraud, any material information which it was within the power of the owner to give, and which the underwriters were entitled to, was withheld, the underwriters were not bound by the insurance; and for the simple reason, that the underwriters expected, and were entitled, to have all material information in order that they might consider, first, whether they would take the risk; and secondly; if they did take it, upon what terms they would do so. And if anything material be withheld, even though it be through ignorance on the part of the owner, the underwriters were not bound by the contract. Now it appeared that the Red Jacket, whilst on her voyage, in the month of October, struck upon a sunken reef and became a total loss. It then turned out that she had sailed from Liverpool under the name of the Dundroon Castle, and had followed the usual practice of blockade runners in changing her name with the view of escaping detection and capture. After sailing from Queenstown she put into the port of Corunna, in Spain, to coal; and then into the port of Ferrol, in consequence of having broken the crank of her engine; and was, in point of fact, detained there for six weeks, so that she resumed her voyage at the very worst part of the season. The telegram, therefore, which Mr. Dronke had received on the 6th Aug. (the very day he had written to Mr. Uzielli stating he expected she would arrive at Nassau by the end of the month), announcing the fact that the ship had put into Ferrol with a broken crank, was a very material piece of information for the underwriters; and Mr. Dronke by withholding this information had rendered the contract of insurance null and void. Mr. Dronke might, and would, say that he did not think it was material; but Mr. Dronke's opinion or belief in this respect would not affect the real question for the jury, which was, whether the information was actually material for the underwriters to be put into possession of.

Mr. Saunders, the underwriter to the defts., stated that the information with regard to the breaking of the crank and the consequent putting into Ferrol was most material; and that, in fact, if he had known it, he would not have advised the insurance of the ship by his office. Other underwriters gave opinions to the same effect, and in support of Mr. Saunders' views.

Capt. Hepburn, who had sailed from Liverpool in command of the Red Jacket, stated that the registered name of that ship was the Dundroon Castle, and that the name of Sea King was painted on her paddle-box, although she had sailed from Liverpool under the name of the Red Jacket. After leaving Liverpool in May she sprang a leak, and put back to Holyhead. She was there repaired, and some fifteen or twenty tons of her cargo being taken out she sailed from Holyhead, but, in consequence of bad weather, put into Cork. She remained at Cork for two or three days, and again sailed; but was obliged to put into Crookhaven, where she remained for three or four days until the weather permitted her continuing her voyage. On resuming her voyage the weather again became very bad, the sea breaking over the ship, the cargo becoming wet, and combustion taking place amongst it, so that the ship was compelled to put back to Cork. At this period he (Capt. Hepburn) ceased to have command of the ship.

Mellish, Q.C. on behalf of the plt., contended, in the interest of the owners of the ship, that the breakage of the crank, and the delay which such a casualty entailed, had nothing to do with the subsequent loss of the ship, inasmuch as she was wrecked in calm weather in consequence of accidentally having struck on a sunken reef, which was not laid down in any chart. He called Mr. Dronke as a witness for the plt., who stated that he did not think that the information in the telegram was at all material to be communicated to the underwriters.

MELLOR, J. left the question to the jury as to whether the telegram of the 6th Aug. and the information therein contained were material to be communicated to the underwriters, who were about to insure the ship, so that they might have an opportunity of calculating for themselves the risks which the ship would run? A contract of insurance was one which required the utmost good faith. He did not say that there had not been good faith in the case; but, even if Mr. Dronke himself believed bonâ fide that this information was of no importance, he was not the less bound to communicate it, in order that the underwriters might be enabled to calculate the risk that the ship would run. In calculating the risk incurred, the underwriters took into consideration all the circumstances attendant on the voyage. The person insuring was not bound to mention to the underwriters those general matters which the latter might be presumed to know themselves; but, if the owner of the ship (or the person insuring on his behalf) had any special knowledge with regard to the state of the ship at the time of the insurance, he was bound to communicate it. The real question for the jury was, whether the information contained in the telegram of the 6th Aug. was material or not.

Mellish, Q. C. and Quina appeared for the plt.

Edward James, Q.C., Peter Williams and R. G. Williams for the defts.

The jury found their verdict for the defts. on the ground that such information was material and ought to have been communicated to the underwriters; the jury at the same time expressing a unanimous opinion that there was no fraudulent intention on the part of Mr. Dronko in withholding such information, and that he did so under the impression that it was not material as affecting the insurance.

DUBLIN, Thursday, April 27, 1865.

THE ROSALIND, OF LIVERPOOL, AND CARGO.

Salvage services—Deficiency of salvage tender—Ship coming up when all danger over, but with the intention to assist, though not entitled to salvage, entitled to costs.

A ship, driven from her anchors, was drifting on shore. The master sent up ensigns for assistance. Two whaling boats went to the ship's assistance and managed to keep her off the shore by means of warps, until more efficient aid came up, when the ship was got into deep water and moored in safety.

Held, that the service of the whalers was highly meritorious, and that they were entitled to material salvage reward, upon the principle laid down by the Privy Council in the case of the Atlas, "that where a salvage is finally effected, those who contributed to that result are entitled to a share in the reward, although the part they took, standing by itself, would not in fact have produced it."

Dr. Todd and Dr. Townsend (with Mr. Richardson as Proctor) appeared for the petitioners.

Dr. Elrington and Dr. Boyd (with the Queen's Proctor) for the defts.

KELLY, J., in delivering judgment, said:—The facts as proved in this case are as follows: The barque Rosalind, 456 tons, with seventeen hands, from Havana for Queenstown, with a cargo of sugar, when off the south coast of Ireland, having encountered stormy easterly winds, had on Saturday the 21st Jan. last borne up for Crookhaven, a harbour usually resorted to by homeward-bound ships as a safe refuge under such circumstances, and had there come to anchor opposite the Coastguard-station on the north shore. On the following Saturday, preparing to get ready for sea, her port-anchor had been hove up, but the wind increasing from the southward towards the evening, it was again let go, but according to the evidence of the coastguard, with about ten fathom of cable, the starboard anchor being hove to twenty-five fathoms, and so she was trimmed to lay for the night. On that evening the weather, which had been boisterous and squally, blew a gale from S.S.W., being right on shore, and continued so during the whole of the night and following morning of Sunday, the sea running with violence outside the harbour, and, at its entrance breaking along the coast and even within the harbour, the gale causing a very heavy roll of the sea. About four o'clock that morning the chief mate reported to the master that he thought the barque was getting too near the shore. This apprehension soon became a certainty, the coastguard on board soon after perceiving that the ship was dragging her anchor and drifting gradually towards the rocks on the north shore of the harbour. These rocks, as described by the witnesses, were slaty, jagged and broken rocks, with upright pieces projecting from them, and of such a nature that the primest built ship in such a gale and so heavy a sea as then prevailed must inevitably have broken up shortly after striking upon them. Now the value of the ship and cargo, then gradually drifting towards these rocks, is admitted to be 8700*l.*, and the evidence of one of the coastguards is, that when he boarded the ship at that time he sounded and found but twelve feet of water astern; that the ship drew twelve feet, and that he consequently concluded that she was about touching. The master's evidence is that the ship was then but twenty fathoms from the shore. The master, at last alive to the threatening danger, at the first break of day ran up the ensign for assistance from the shore. The crew of the Lord Clinton and the American Union, two whale boats, and the prominent salvors in the cause, conjecturing that some casualty might have occurred during the gale, had been, as it appears, on the beach before daybreak, and at once perceiving that the barque had been drifting from where she had lain the night before, launched their boats and proceeded towards her. The crew of the American Union reached her first, and put their best hands on board, but finding, according to their affidavit, that she was within thirty or forty feet of the rocks, and her anchors, as they were down, perfectly useless for the purpose of heaving her from her perilous position, they determined to request the assistance of a steam-tug then in the harbour, leaving it to their consort boat, the Lord Clinton, then coming up, to render help until their return. The steam-tug, it appears, refused to comply with the request for assistance, but these men, undeterred by the refusal, at once pulled on shore, and landing one of themselves, sent him to the house of the agent of the steam-tug to give information of the imminent danger of the barque, and to request that the steam-tug might be ordered to go to her assistance. Failing to obtain a compliance from the agent of the steam tug, they pulled back to the barque, the master of which had during their absence despatched the coastguard to both steam-tug and agent for the tug's assistance, but with no better success. It having, therefore, become necessary to adopt other measures to save the barque, at the suggestion and with the aid of the crews of the two whale boats, two warps were got out from the barque, and being carried (one coiled up in each of the boats) across the harbour to the south or weaker shore, one end of the heavier warp was made fast round a solid perpendicular rock, and some hands being left to watch it, the boats then returned, and half-way back they joined the other end of that warp to an end of the second one, so as that the two stretching across the harbour should reach the barque in their united length. The end of the warps thus joined they placed round the capstan of the barque. Two other warps were then procured and bent in a similar way along the entire warps, so as to double their power of resistance to the strain. The capstan and windlass then being manned by the united crew of both whale boats, assisted in this by the barque's crew, they hove on the warps, and the barque was

THE FLYING FISH.

got about thirty fathoms from the north shore and over her anchors, which were then hove up, and by dint of the continuing strain was settling more over into the deep water toward the south shore, when the rock to which the shore end of the hawsers had been made fast gave way, shooting out of its bed, and the hawsers became useless for their purpose. The anchors were at once let go, but the barque again began to drive. It was now ten o'clock; the ensign was again run up for assistance, and not in vain on this occasion, as in about half an hour before the rock gave way, and whilst the barque was still gaining ground towards the south shore, the third boat claiming as a salvor, and called the Little Meteor, with her owner Mr. Notter, had arrived; and he at once, seeing the necessity of the steam-tug's assistance at so critical a juncture, went in his boat to her, and, having got the agent on board, at last, by his influence with that official, got the steam-tug under weigh to give the barque her long withheld assistance. A line being got from the starboard bow of the barque and taken by the Little Meteor to the tug, was bent upon her hawser, which was then forwarded to the barque and made fast, the weight of it having been carried by the Little Meteor. The barque, thus at last taken in tow by the steam-tug, was, in less than one hour, anchored in perfect safety. Immediately before the towing by the steam-tug began, the fourth boat (the Kate) claiming to be a salvor came up and put five hands on board the barque. Five hands of the Little Meteor were also there, two being on board the steam-tug, which was short-handed. It is to be observed that, as the case of these four boats is alone before this court, the court is not called upon to pronounce any opinion on the conduct or service of the steam-tug, whose case is before another tribunal. Still, as it cannot but be observed that the salvage of this vessel and her cargo was finally effected by that steam-tug, it is right to state that no difficulty is cast upon the court, either by the facts themselves, or by the law as it stands declared in the recent case of the Atlas, referred to in the arguments of both sides, in dealing with the petitioners before the court as actual salvors. The proposition of the law laid down in that case—a case in appeal, too, before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, was, "that, where a salvage is finally effected, those who contributed to that result are entitled to a share in the reward, although the part they took, standing by itself, would not, in fact, have produced it." But the main fact of the present case is a stronger one than that of the Atlas, as in the latter case the first schooner was a stranger, and acting without the authority or acquiescence of the earlier salvors; but, in the case before the court, the final salvor, the steam-tug, was solicited and invited, and at last proceeded to give the necessary aid through the influence of the earlier salvors, and some hands were even lent to make up a sufficient complement for the steam-tug. This distinction is so substantial that it influences the mind of the court to mingle the acts of the earlier and the final salvors to a certain extent, and at all events to consider such invitation or influence as an additional ingredient in the merits of those earlier salvors who employed it. There is no reason, arising from the evidence of the facts, to preclude the court from these conclusions, that of the second mate being merely hearsay, and that of the master passing by the circumstances most loosely, almost evasively. For the service, admittedly rendered to the debts, by the Lord Clinton and the American Union, a tender of 50*l.* to each boat has been made. The debts, doubly altogether the services of the Little Meteor and the Kate. But, when the court considers the services of the two former—their promptitude, always to be considered an important ingredient in determining a salvage award—their ready resources, their skilful management, their exposure to some hazard, and the great value of the barque and her cargo, which they saved, at all events, from certain destruction at the time, when being so close on the rocks: and that in twelve feet of water they warped her off more than thirty fathoms; and then the exertions made by one of them, the American Union, in the morning, to procure the aid of the steam-tug—the court cannot consider these tenders as sufficient. Still, the court is fully aware that the time occupied was short, and still more, that the whalers were not the final salvors. Under all views of the case, the court will award to each of the whale boats the sum of 20*l.*, in addition to the 50*l.* tendered, and 10*l.* extra to the American Union for her efforts to procure the aid of the steam-tug. To the Little Meteor the court will award the sum of 50*l.*, 30*l.* of which is to be paid to Mr. Notter, personally, for his special services. To the Kate the court can award nothing, inasmuch as she arrived when all danger was over; still, the circumstance of her hands going on board and pulling a chance-rope, although it constitutes no salvage service—the crew of the barque and the three other boats being quite sufficient for all the ship's purpose—yet, it shows that her intention was to render useful service if she could, and the court will so far recognise the meritoriousness of such intention as to give the Kate her costs. The Lord Clinton, the American Union, and the Little Meteor must also have their costs.

KNIGHT BRUCE and TURNER, L.J.J.)

THE FLYING FISH.

Ship—Collision—Damage—Subsequent negligence of injured ship—Amount of damages.

The F. gunboat at midnight ran into the W. vessel making a hole in her stern six feet above water line, whereupon the master of the W. stood in for land. The coastguard about two hours afterwards visited the W. on her reaching land, and told the master of her position, and that the vessel could be got off, giving good reasons for their advice. The master refused repeated offers of the same kind, and the vessel broke up next morning:

Held (reversing the order of the Court of Admiralty), that there being strong grounds for believing that if the master of the W. had accepted the offers of assistance they would have been successful, the F. was responsible only for the damage directly occasioned by the collision, and not for what happened after the refusal of assistance by the master of the W.

This was an appeal from an order of the High Court of Admiralty.

On the night of the 30th Nov. 1861, Her Majesty's gunboat Flying Fish ran into the Dutch vessel Willem Eduard, and in consequence of the damage the Willem Eduard ran ashore about five miles west of Rye Harbour, where she broke up soon afterwards. The value of the ship in its original state was 10,910*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* and the wreck sold for 2623*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* The Willem Eduard sued the Flying Fish in the Admiralty Court, and the debts set up a case that the master of the Willem Eduard might have got off his vessel if he had accepted the assistance offered to him by the coastguard service, and therefore that a great part of the damage was due not to the injury caused by the Flying Fish, but to the master's subsequent negligence and want of skill.

The judge of the Admiralty Court made the following observations as to the bearing of the law on the facts of the case.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—This case comes before the court upon an objection to the report of the registrar and merchants. The objection is preferred on behalf of the owners of the Willem Eduard, a Dutch vessel, who had prosecuted to a successful issue a cause of damage against the Flying Fish. The damage in question having occurred almost immediately after the collision, the presumption of law is that it arose from the collision itself, and upon the plts. making out a sufficient prima facie case, the onus of disproving it would fall on the defts., who are in the eye of the law wrong-doers. The defts., however, allege, and the registrar and merchants have found, that a very large part of the damage was not to be attributed to the collision, but was solely occasioned by the master's refusal to accept assistance. To substantiate this defence, it must be shown not only that the master did refuse assistance as a matter of fact, but that such refusal arose from gross want of nautical knowledge or crassa negligentia. It must be shown, not only that the acceptance of the particular offer of assistance, which in this case was laying out an anchor and chain, was probably the best mode of proceeding, but that there was no reasonable ground for doubt as to what ought to have been done. The master had a discretion, and to impose blame in a matter of such discretion the court must be convinced that the course pursued by him was so manifestly wrong that no person in his position could have adopted such course, save from culpable ignorance or gross negligence. Before addressing myself to the particular circumstances of the case, it is proper to state that I must consider all the evidence which has been produced, both that before the registrar and merchants, and also that which has been subsequently produced before the court itself. I am well aware that much may be said as to the inconvenience of producing evidence after the report, but that practice was sanctioned by Lord Stowell after consideration: it has always prevailed in this court, and certainly I cannot depart from it in any particular instance; at the same time I may add, that were it necessary to discuss the question there are strong reasons for the practice, as well as strong reasons against it. The collision occurred a few miles off Hastings; the vessel was run on shore three or four miles to the west of Rye, Nov. 30th, 1861. The next day the ship went to pieces, but a portion of the wreck and cargo were recovered and landed. The value of the ship and cargo, as claimed, was 10,910*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.*, and the net proceeds of the sale of the wreck and cargo amounted to the sum of 2623*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.*, leaving a clear loss of 8286*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.* The registrar and merchants, in their report, have disallowed the whole of this sum 8286*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*; and they have allowed a sum of 610*l.* (upon the principle that the ship might have been saved), as the probable cost of the repairs, and the expenses of discharging and reloading the cargo, demurrage and port charges; and they have also allowed a sum of 500*l.*, which the registrar supposed might have become due by way of salvage, if proper assistance had been accepted. Now, what is the result of that evidence? The witnesses are, the harbour-master, who must have been thoroughly conversant with the locality; the master of the tugs usually lying in the port of Rye, and, of course, occupied along this part of the coast; and an experienced shipbuilder, and I think that no possible imputation of corrupt intention, or desire to mislead, can be imputed to them. Their evidence most strongly expresses the exceeding danger in their opinion of the experiment proposed by the coastguard, and as I think that that danger arose more particularly from the state of the locality, I deem them to be most worthy of belief. They say that the ship, if held by the anchor, would have been beaten on the hard sand and her bottom would have been broken out, and then they say that the experiment suggested by the coastguard would have ended in the destruction of the ship and cargo. With this evidence before me is it possible for me to come to the conclusion that the master was guilty of gross nautical ignorance, or of gross negligence? It may well be that men of nautical knowledge might reasonably say that the measures suggested by the coastguard were fit to be adopted. But such opinion would not decide the question at issue, for it is not, I must repeat, whether the measures proposed were right, but whether they were so clearly right that the master was guilty of gross ignorance or negligence in refusing to allow them to be carried into execution. I am of opinion that, as against a wrong-doer, which, in legal estimation, the Flying Fish must be taken to have been in this case, it cannot be maintained that there was no reasonable doubt as to the course to be pursued. The master entertained exactly that opinion which the harbour-master himself entertained, and which the master of the tug has expressed in such strong language, and if this be so the claim of the owners to be indemnified cannot be prejudiced by the judgment of the master in circumstances of such great difficulty. I must therefore send back the report to the registrar to allow the amount which shall be found to be fairly due for the loss sustained by the owners; but as the case on the part of the owners, I know not why, was left derelict before the registrar and merchants, and as the report of the registrar and merchants might be well founded upon the evidence before them, I shall, with regard to costs, make this decree: that the plts. shall pay all the costs of the reference, and that there shall be no costs of the present appeal.

The deft. (the Flying Fish) thereupon appealed to Her Majesty in Council.

The Queen's Advocate (Phillimore), Dr. Twiss, Q.C. and Phinn, Q.C. for the app.

Dr. Deane, Q.C. and Brett, Q.C. for the resp.

Lord CHELMSFORD.—In this appeal no question has been raised as to the app.'s liability for damages arising from the collision, which was the subject of the action, but he objects to the decree of the judge of the Court of Admiralty so far as it renders him liable to a portion of the damages which he contended was the result, not of the collision itself but of the absence of nautical skill on the part of the captain of the resp.'s vessel in making no effort to rescue her from the peril in which she was placed by the immediate consequence of the collision, and of his want of prudence and judgment in refusing assistance which was offered to him, and which if it had been accepted would probably have prevented all the damage which afterwards ensued. The collision happened about twenty minutes past nine p.m., 30th Nov. 1861, in the English Channel, off Hastings, by Her Majesty's gunboat Flying Fish, of which the app. was commander, running with her stem and port bow into the port quarter of the resp.'s vessel the Willem Eduard. It is admitted that the blame of this collision must be attributed solely to the app. The effect of the blow received by the Willem Eduard was that a hole was made in her stern about five or six feet above the water line, and the steering gear was disabled. The master believing that the vessel was making water, and was in danger of sinking, rigged a temporary steering apparatus, and stood in for the land, which he reached at about midnight of the same day, and ran her ashore three miles from Rye Harbour. The tide was then about half-ebb. The night was dark, the wind being W.S.W., and the weather cloudy and squally. The coastguard, who were on duty at a station near Rye, being desirous of rendering assistance, and the surf on the beach being heavy, carried their boat and launched it abreast of the vessel, and got aboard of her about two o'clock in the morning. Attersoll, the chief boatman, in the presence of Tremble, a commissioned boatman of the coastguard, told the captain of the Willem Eduard, that he was three miles from Rye Harbour, that where his vessel was lying was sand and no rocks, and that if he would give him charge of her he had no doubt that he could get her safe into Rye Harbour. But the captain refused this offer, stating "It would be of no use trying." Attersoll then asked to be allowed to get out an anchor, but the captain said "No." He then inquired what he intended to do; the captain replied, "It is no use, the wind will be from the south-west, and the ship will go to pieces." Attersoll, after waiting some time longer to see if the captain would allow him to do his best to get the vessel into a place of safety, at about three o'clock got over the side of the vessel, and walked ashore, the tide having ebbed and left her high and dry. After Attersoll quitted the vessel, Tremble, who stayed behind, pointed out to the captain that the wind was two points off the land, and that they could get the vessel off, she being three miles to windward of the harbour but he still refused to let them try. Attersoll returned to the vessel at four o'clock, when he and Tremble procured a light and walked round the vessel, which was still dry, and all the damage they could discover was on her stern and quarter about five or six feet above the water line, and they asked the captain to give them some canvas and nails for the purpose of nailing the canvas over the damaged part, which he refused to do. When Attersoll got on board again, he asked the captain what he intended doing, and he answered, "The vessel will go to pieces." And upon Tremble proposing to get her port anchor out, he replied, angrily, "No anchor—no good." At five o'clock the tide began to flow, when Mr. Groom, the receiver of wreck for the port of Rye, and Mr. Buck, the chief officer of the coastguard station, went alongside the vessel, and repeatedly urged the captain to accept the services of the coastguard men, but he still refused all offers of assistance. At five o'clock the captain and the crew left the vessel, the men carrying their clothes and chests with them, and the captain taking away his chronometer. As the tide rose the vessel floated, and a little before seven o'clock, the port wing of the foresail and gaff of the fore trysail not being properly bailed up, the wind caught these sails, and carried the vessel on to the beach. As she was driving in to the beach the mainmast went overboard. At seven o'clock, after the vessel was on the beach, there having been no one on board from five to seven o'clock, and nothing having been done during that time, the captain said the coastguard might try their best, and he gave charge of the vessel to them; but it was then too late for any effectual services to be rendered. When the vessel was seen about half past nine, she was lying broadside on to land, full of water, and the sea breaking over her. She afterwards went to pieces on the beach, and the greater part of her cargo was destroyed. The total value of the ship and cargo was 10,910*l.* 11*s.* 8*d.* The net proceeds of the sale of the wreck and cargo was 2623*l.* 13*s.* 2*d.* Upon the hearing of the cause, the learned judge, assisted by two of the Elder Brethren of the Trinity-house, pronounced for the damage sued for, and referred the question of amount to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to report upon. The resps., before the registrar and merchants, claimed compensation for a total loss, amounting to 8286*l.* 18*s.* 6*d.*, after giving credit for the net proceeds of the sale of the wreck and of the cargo recovered. The apps. denied their liability for the damage consequent upon the refusal of the master to accept the services of the coastguard. No affidavits were used by the resps., nor were any witnesses produced by them before the registrar and merchants, but they relied entirely upon the written evidence filed in the cause. On the part of the app. six witnesses were examined, all of whom had been present when the services of the coastguard were tendered and refused, and they were cross-examined on behalf of the resps. The registrar reported that he was of opinion, for the reasons which he set forth in an exhibit to his report, that there was due to the resps. in respect of the damage proceeded for the sum of 1110*l.*, together with interest thereon at 4 per cent. The reasons for this opinion were stated to be that the master showed a great want of ordinary nautical skill in not taking any measures to save the vessel before the tide rose, and gross neglect of duty in not accepting the services of the coastguard men; that, therefore, the damages to which, in the opinion of the registrar and merchants, the resps. were entitled were, first, the cost of the repairs to the vessel at the port to which she might have been taken, including the discharge and reloading of the cargo, and the demurrage and port charges, which they estimated at the sum of 610*l.*; and, secondly, a reasonable sum for the services of the coastguard, and of the steam-tug in rescuing her from the shore, and taking her to a port of safety; and as the whole value of the ship and cargo was estimated by the owners at 10,910*l.*, they thought that 500*l.* would have been a proper remuneration to the salvors for their services. This report was objected to on the part of the resps., and they filed a petition praying the judge to refer it back to the registrar for amendment, and the app. filed an answer praying the judge to confirm the report. At the hearing of this petition the resps. proposed to produce witnesses who had not been examined before the registrar and merchants. This was objected to on the part of the app., but the learned judge overruled the objection, and five new witnesses were produced by the resps. One witness who had been examined before the registrar and merchants was produced and examined by the app. The judge, by order, referred back the report to the registrar, assisted by merchants, for amendment, condemned the resps. in the costs incurred at the reference before the registrar and merchants, but made no order as to the costs incurred by the objection to the report. The learned judge was of opinion "that the app. had not substantiated his allegation, that a large part of the damage was not to be attributed to the collision but was solely occasioned by the master's refusal to accept assistance. That to establish that defence, it ought to have been shown not only that the master did refuse assistance as a matter of fact, but that such refusal arose from gross want of nautical knowledge or crassa negligentia. That the true issue in the case was not whether the assistance of the coastguard or others, and the laying out of the anchor, might have been successful, but it was whether there was such reasonable doubt on the part of the master, who refused the adoption of such measure, that he was justified in declining to run the risk; or, put it in other words, whether, looking to the condition of the ship, the cargo, the weather, and the locality, he was guilty of gross nautical ignorance or gross negligence." The learned judge stated, that "had the case come before the court solely upon the evidence produced before the registrar and merchants, he thought it most probable—indeed, he entertained little doubt—that the court would have come to the same conclusions, as to matters of fact, as they did.” But after adverting to the evidence of the witnesses produced by the resps. on the hearing of their petition, he added, “with this evidence before me, is it possible for me to come to the conclusion that the master was guilty of gross nautical ignorance, or of gross negligence?” and he concluded by expressing his opinion that, as “against a wrong-doer, which in legal estimation the Flying Fish must be taken to have been, it could not be maintained that there was no reasonable doubt as to the course to be pursued.” Upon the hearing of the appeal from this judgment, two points were insisted upon by the counsel for the app.: first, that the learned judge ought not to have received fresh evidence upon the objection to the registrar’s report; and, secondly, that such evidence was not sufficient to lead to a decision contrary to such report. As to the admission of additional evidence, the counsel for the app. did not attempt to maintain that the learned judge had no power to admit such evidence, but they contended that he thereby exercised his judicial discretion improperly. And they referred to former expressions of opinion of the same learned judge strongly condemnatory of the course of withholding evidence at the reference, and making a new case before the court, particularly in the cases of the Sir George Scymour, 1 Spinks Admiralty Reports, 67; and the Glenmanna, 1 Lushington’s Reports, 122. They also insisted that the new rules made in pursuance of the Acts of the 3 & 4 Vict. chaps. 65 and 66, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 78, which came into operation on the 1st Jan. 1860, had introduced a new practice with respect to references before the registrar, had armed him with more authority in conducting the inquiry, and had enabled the judge to know the oral evidence taken before the registrar, by a transcript of the shorthand writer’s notes, and therefore had considerably limited the discretion previously exercised as to admitting additional witnesses. Their Lordships do not think that these rules have at all the effect of restraining the power of the judge, or of fettering his discretion as to the admissibility of fresh witnesses upon these occasions—a discretion which, it is unnecessary to say, must always be exercised with great caution, and with a careful regard to the peculiar circumstances of each case. With respect to the value of the evidence produced before the learned judge upon the hearing of the objection to the registrar’s report, it must be observed that not one of the five witnesses who were called saw the Willem Eduard until she was on the beach, and at that time when it was admitted by all the resps.’ witnesses that it was too late to do anything to save her. Although, therefore, they are witnesses of perfect respectability and of competent experience, and although they express themselves with great confidence as to the impracticability of saving the vessel in the place where she first grounded, yet it is impossible to give as much weight to their conjectures (for they amount to nothing more) as to the evidence of the app.’s witnesses, persons also of skill and experience, who saw the vessel where she was first lying, and who formed their judgment of the measures to be adopted upon the spot, and with the best opportunity of judging whether they were likely to be successful. Taking, however, the whole of the evidence on both sides into consideration, can it be said that the conduct of the captain of the Willem Eduard, after he had run his vessel on shore in consequence of the collision, did not exhibit a want of nautical skill and gross neglect of duty? The learned judge thought that, in order to exonerate the app. from liability to the subsequent damage to the vessel, it was necessary to show that the master was guilty of “gross nautical ignorance, or of gross negligence.” It appears to their Lordships that the principle upon which the owners of a vessel are to be exempted from liability for the acts or omissions of their master is not here laid down with perfect accuracy. The blame imputed to the master of the resps.’ vessel in this case is, that he made no effort to save her, and that he refused all offers of assistance which were made to him; and the proper question seems to be, whether in so acting he did, in the words of Parke, B., in Tindal v. Bell, 11 M. & W. 232, “what a reasonable man would do under similar circumstances, where he had no other judgment but his own to resort to;” or, in the words of the learned judge of the Court of Admiralty himself, in the case of the Linda, 1 Swab. 306, upon a question of abandonment, “whether the master had wilfully abandoned the vessel when he might have saved her, or had abandoned her through a want of ordinary nautical skill and resolution.” It is to be observed that this was not the case of a sudden emergency, leaving no time for deliberation, when great allowances should be made for any error in judgment which may occur. In this case there was no danger to life, nor any immediate apprehension of the loss of the vessel, and the captain had some hours to decide what course was best to be adopted. The learned judge was of opinion that “as against a wrong-doer, which,” he says, “in legal estimation the Flying Fish must be taken to have been, it cannot be maintained that there was no reasonable doubt as to the course to be pursued.” But treating the Flying Fish as a wrong-doer is really begging the whole question. For the collision, and for all the consequences of that collision, the app. is responsible. But if the subsequent damage resulted from the acts or omissions of the captain of the Willem Eduard, for that portion of the damage the app. is not only not a wrong-doer, but he is not even to be regarded as the doer of the act which occasioned it. It is quite true, as the learned judge has said, that “if there was a reasonable doubt on the part of the master whether the measure proposed, or any other measure, would be successful, he was justified in declining to run the risk, and would not be guilty of nautical ignorance or gross negligence.” But the master appears to have exercised no judgment at all in the matter, but at once to have abandoned himself to despair, and to have regarded all efforts to save the vessel as hopeless. He seems, from the first, to have formed an erroneous notion of the extent of the injury she had sustained from collision. He says that he ran her aground because after she had been struck by the Flying Fish he found she was making water very fast, and was in danger of foundering. And yet Attersoll, the coastguardman, says that when he was on board, two hours after she was aground, he asked the master “if she made any water,” and he answered, “No.” And Tremble, another of the coastguard men, says that the master told him she was not leaking. To reconcile these different statements the counsel for the resps. allege that though the vessel made water while they were running to the shore after the collision, yet when the vessel was high and dry on the sand, the water ran out of her. But this explanation can hardly be accepted, because, if she was so much shaken by the collision as the suggestion assumes, the vessel would have made water again while she was drifting to the beach; and yet, after she arrived at the beach, the well was sounded, and there was no water in her, and the lee bilge (that is, the bilge on the side that was lying over) was examined, and no water was found there. The vessel, therefore, was clearly not in a state in which all attempts to save her were hopeless; and this must be taken into account in considering whether the master really exercised his judgment

THE FLYING FISH.

THE LAURA.

all in the matter. Offers of assistance were made him as early as two in the morning; he said it was no use, "the wind will be from the south-west, and the vessel will go to pieces." He was asked at four o'clock for a piece of canvas to nail over the deck above the water-line; he refused to give it. At five o'clock offers of assistance were repeatedly made him, which he as repeatedly refused. All this time he appears not to have been doing, or attempting, or suggesting anything to save the vessel; and at five o'clock he and the crew abandoned her without leaving a soul on board, and some of the sails not properly brailled up, and thus, when the vessel floated, the wind catching these sails carried her in 300 or 400 yards, and she again grounded on the beach. These circumstances furnish a strong ground for believing that, if the offered assistance had been accepted, it might have been successful. There were two modes suggested by which attempts to save the vessel, or, at all events, the cargo, might have been made: one, by carrying out anchors and holding the vessel till she floated, and then, with the assistance of a tug, carrying her into Rye Harbour; the other, as suggested by one of the witnesses for the resps., to have forced her further on the shore. Whether either of these modes would have been successful, it is impossible to do more than conjecture, though the witnesses for the app. speak very confidently of their expectation of success in their proposed experiment. But, however this may be, the master of the Willem Eduard never seems to have considered even for a moment any plan suggested to him, nor to have turned his own mind to the thought of how the vessel might be saved, but once, resigning himself to his fate, he abandoned her to the mercy of the wind and waves, by which she was helplessly carried to her destruction. Under these circumstances it is impossible for their Lordships to arrive at the conclusion that the master exercised any judgment at all upon the possibility of saving his vessel. It appears that he attempted nothing, because he had persuaded himself that nothing could be done, and that he rejected all offers of assistance, not after weighing the measures proposed, but because he had hastily determined that the state of his vessel would make every effort to save her unavailing. Their Lordships, therefore, agree in the conclusion to which the registrar and merchants arrived, as to the master having shown want of ordinary nautical skill and neglect of duty, and they think that the witnesses produced before the judge by the resps. did not alter the case, and that the learned judge ought to have confirmed the report so far as it limited the damages to the immediate consequences of the collision; but they agree with the learned judge in his objection to the conjectural estimate of the measure of damages made by the registrar and merchants. They ought not to have formed any judgment as to the reduced damages except upon the evidence of witnesses. By which of the parties these witnesses should have been produced was made a question in the course of the argument. It seems clear that the resps. could not have been expected to be prepared with proof of the description upon the reference. They claimed the entire value of the vessel and cargo, minus the amount of the proceeds of what had been sold, and they could not know that the registrar and merchants would reject that claim before their report was made. On the other hand, the app. contended that the resps. were not entitled to damages beyond the amount which would be attributed solely to the collision, and the proof of the amount of those limited damages would seem more properly to have been a part of their case. But no evidence at all having been given, their Lordships think that the registrar should have reported to the judge his opinion that the app. was responsible only for the damages directly occasioned by the collision, and not for any which happened after the refusal of the master of the resps.' vessel to accept the assistance which was offered to him, and that as to the amount of those limited damages no evidence had been given. If the judge had adopted the view of the registrar, he would have confirmed the report, but referred the matter back to the registrar to ascertain the damages upon that footing, and then the onus of proving the amount to which the resps. would be entitled upon this restricted view of their claim would have fallen upon them. Their Lordships, upon the whole of the case, will humbly advise Her Majesty that the decree appealed from should be reversed, except so far as it condemned the resps. in the costs incurred on the reference before the registrar and merchants; that the cause be retained, and that it be referred back to the registrar, assisted by merchants, to ascertain the amount of damages to which the resps. are entitled down to the time when the master of the Willem Eduard first refused the assistance which was offered to him, and that there should be no costs of the appeal on either side.

THE LAURA.

Ship—Flag—Nationality—Register.

The register, flag and pass of a ship carry with them a presumption that they are true and correct, and the owner is estopped from averring against them.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Antigua condemning the ship Laura and her cargo as forfeited to the Crown for breach of the statutes for suppression of the slave trade.

Deane, Q. C. and Lushington for the app.

The Queen's Advocate (Phillimore) and Swabey for the Crown.

Dr. LUSHINGTON.—A preliminary objection has been taken by the counsel for the app. They contend that the court below had no jurisdiction to try the question which it has decided. The case may be reduced into the shortest possible compass. The Laura originally belonged to New Orleans. She was sent on a voyage to Cuba, and while there at Havanna was sold to Nicholas Dionissis the present claimant. Dionissis, it would appear, was anxious to obliterate all traces of the nationality of the vessel which he had purchased. Having been at one time a native of Cerigo, one of the Ionian Islands, the best course seemed to him to be to apply to the British Consul for the purpose of obtaining a British register. Mr. Crawford, Her Majesty's Consul General at Cuba, refused at first to comply with the claimant's request, and there is some doubt as to the precise grounds of his refusal. It is, however, quite clear that the claimant did eventually receive from him a provisional register. Now it appears to their Lordships that in the giving of this register, and in the receipt of it by the claimant, there is no reason to suspect fraud on either side. It was necessary alone which induced Dionissis to make his application. The question remains, what is the effect of this register? It was contended by the app. that it was wholly void, and that therefore the court had no jurisdiction. But the operation of such a register may be very different under different circumstances. It may be that in a civil court this vessel would not be entitled to the privileges or advantages usually enjoyed by British ships. But it is a very different question whether she can escape all the consequences which follow upon the adoption of the flag under which she sailed. We apprehend that it is a proposition which has never been disputed, that the register, flag, and pass of a ship carry with them a presumption that they are true and correct, and that the owner is not at liberty to aver against them. We should therefore upon this general principle hold that the argument of the app. is not well founded. But even assuming such an argument to be well founded, and that the register was a nullity, and nothing but waste paper, the vessel would not appear to be justly entitled to claim the protection of any flag or nation. Now by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 73, s. 1, power is given to the Courts of Admiralty to adjudicate upon such vessels when captured by British cruisers. Their Lordships are therefore of opinion that this objection to the jurisdiction cannot be supported.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Reported by JAMES PATERSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

ROBERTS v. BRETT.

Contract—Condition precedent—Mutual covenants—Damages—Action.

R. agreed forthwith, at his own expense, to procure a ship to go to M. and to take up and carry a cable, R. to fit the ship for such service, the ship to be ready on 15th July, failing which R. to pay 200l. per week as liquidated damages. B., on the other hand, covenanted to pay to R. 1000l. seven days after the ship arrived at M., and 4000l. at later dates. And, for the true performance of the covenants by R., he was to give to B. a bond, with sureties for 5000l., within ten days after agreement executed, and deft. to do the like, but the bonds were not to prejudice other rights of the parties under the agreement:

Held (affirming the judgment of the Ex. Ch.), that the true construction of the agreement was, that the giving of the bond on either side was a condition precedent to the party suing for a breach, and that the default of one party to give a bond did not excuse the other from giving his, and that it was not inconsistent with the hypothesis of the bond being a condition precedent, that part of the contract may have been performed, and a breach have occurred before the ten days.

This was a suggestion of error on a judgment of the Ex. Ch.

The action was brought by the plt. in error, Julius Roberts, a Captain in the Royal Marine Artillery, against the deft. the gerant in this country of a joint-stock company, established in France, called the Mediterranean Submarine Electric Telegraph Company, to recover damages for breach of an agreement under seal, entered into between the plt. and deft. on 15th May 1855, as to the laying down by the plt. of 150 miles of submarine telegraph cable called the African and Sardinian Cable, and which cable the plt. undertook to lay down between Cape Tabague on the northern coast of Africa and Cape Spartivento, in the island of Sardinia.

By the agreement the plt. was bound forthwith at his own expense to procure a frigate called the

Cornwall, or some other suitable ship or vessel, and to stow the cable on board, and which cable was in the agreement expressly stated to be then lying at Morden's Wharf, East Greenwich: the plt. was also bound, at his own expense, to rig, complete, fit out, provide and provision the said ship with all things necessary, as set forth in the agreement, and to pay 600l. towards insuring the cable for 60,000l. The agreement then stated that the plt. was to have the ship ready for sea at the Nore on the 15th July then next, and in the event of the plt. failing to have the ship fully equipped at the Nore on or before that day, the deft. was to be at liberty to retain out of any moneys payable to the plt. under the agreement 200l. a-week as liquidated damages for every week, and so in proportion for less than a week of such default. The deft. covenanted to pay to the plt. the sum of 5000l., as follows:—1000l. on or before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the ship at Morden's Wharf, the sum of 2000l. further part thereof on or before the expiration of twenty-one days after the ship should have arrived alongside Morden's Wharf, and the sum of 2000l., the remainder of the said sum of 5000l., as soon as the said ship should have proceeded to sea from the Nore; and besides these money payments the plt. was to have five hundred 10l. paid-up shares in the said company delivered to him. By the agreement it was also agreed and declared that for the true performance of the covenants by the plt., and for securing any penalties which he might incur, the plt. and two responsible sureties should, within ten days after the execution of the agreement, give and execute to the deft. a bond in the penal sum of 5000l.; and that for the due performance of the covenants on the part of the deft., the deft. and two sureties should within ten days from the execution of the agreement give and execute to the plt. a bond in the penal sum of 5000l.; and that the said bonds so to be given should not in any manner prejudice or affect the respective rights or liabilities of the plt. or of the deft. under or by virtue of the agreement.

The plt. in his declaration, after setting out the agreement and averring performance of all conditions precedent, alleged as breaches of the agreement, that before the time arrived for the plt. to bring his ship alongside Morden's Wharf for the purpose of taking the cable on board, the deft. refused to perform his contract and dispensed with the said ship being brought alongside the said wharf, and would not stow the cable on board the ship, but caused the same to be stowed on board another ship, and thereby prevented the plt. from completing the said contract on his part. There was also a further breach assigned, that the deft. did not, in pursuance of the covenant on his behalf in the said agreement contained, give a bond with sureties to the plt. in the penal sum of 5000l.

The deft. pleaded—1. That the plt. did not procure a suitable ship. 2. That the plt. did not rig, complete, fit out, and provision her. 3. That the plt. was not ready and willing to provide and pay officers, and crew, and workmen. 4. That the plt. did not give a bond with two sureties to the deft. in the penal sum of 5000l. 5. And finally, in answer to the breach respecting the deft. not giving his bond to the plt., the deft. paid into the court the sum of 1s.

Upon the three first and fifth pleas issues in fact were raised, and to the fourth there was a demurrer.

The demurrer having been argued, the Court of C. P. gave judgment for the deft.

The issues in fact came on for trial before Cockburn, C.J., when the jury found that the plt. did procure a suitable ship, properly equipped according to the contract, and was ready to provide the officers and crew, and found all the issues in fact in favour of the plt., and they assessed the damages at 2300*l*. The plt. brought error on the judgment of the Court of C. P. on the demurrer, when the Ex. Ch. affirmed the judgment of the C. P.

Bovill, Q.C., M. Dawson and Beasley, for the plt. in error, contended that the giving of the bond by the plt. was not the consideration for the plt.'s agreement, and was not a condition precedent to the plt.'s right of action for breach; that a day was appointed for payment of the first instalment of the 1000*l*., which event was contemplated by the parties as likely to happen before the ten days allowed to execute the mutual bonds had expired. That the agreement as to giving mutual bonds was distinct and independent of the covenants entered into by the deft. for the performance of the contract on his part, and formed a part only of the consideration for his covenants, the breach of which might be compensated by a cross-action:

Stacers v. Curling, 3 Bing. N. C. 355;

Boone v. Eyre, 1 H. Bl. 273, n.

The question whether there was a condition precedent depended on the nature of the contract, and how far the non-observance of the alleged condition tended to make the contract nugatory:

Turrabochia v. Hickey, 1 H. & N. 183;

Kingdon v. Cox, 2 C. B. 661;

Muttock v. Kinglake, 10 A. & E. 50;

Campbell v. Jones, 6 T. R. 570;

Dicker v. Jackson, 6 C. B. 103.

The declaration showed that the deft. dispensed with the plt.'s performance of any condition. The interchange of the bonds were to be concurrent acts, and therefore, before the deft. could claim the plt.'s bond, he ought to have averred his readiness to give his own bond.

Cur. adv. vult.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—My Lords, the question in this appeal is, whether having regard to the true construction and intent of the agreement of the 5th May 1855, the stipulation that the app. should within ten days after the date and execution of the agreement give a bond with sureties for the due performance of the covenants on his part, be a condition the previous fulfilment of which, unless waived or released, was necessary to enable the app. to maintain any action upon the agreement. The case has been learnedly argued at the bar, and many decisions were cited, but the question depends on simple principles. First, having regard to the subject-matter of the agreement between the app. and the resp., who was the representative of a company, it is reasonable to suppose that the company who were about to entrust the app. with the laying down of a very valuable telegraphic cable should require from the app. security for the due fulfilment of his contract, and the requisition that the bond should be given within ten days is sufficient to show that it was intended to precede any material action under the agreement. The app. indeed contends that if he had brought the Cornwall frigate or some other suitable vessel alongside Morden's Wharf on the day of the date of the agreement, or the next day, the sum of 1000*l*. would have been payable to him by the resp. within a week afterwards, and thus he insists that a material part of the contract might have been performed before the expiration of the ten days allowed for the bond, and that therefore the giving of the bond is not a condition precedent. I cannot think that any such great expedition, if it was possible, was contemplated by the parties, or that the app. was bound to act with any such rapidity. This engagement is that he will forthwith, at his own expense, procure the Cornwall frigate, or some other suitable ship or vessel, for the purpose required; the word "forthwith" does not necessarily imply that this was to be done by the app. before he had received the bond of the resp. and his sureties, that is, before the expiration of the ten days. But if the app. had brought a suitable vessel alongside the wharf so expeditiously as to have entitled himself to the sum of 1000*l*., and had received that sum (which must be the hypothesis) within ten days, and before the time for giving his bond expired, I should not have thought that it affected his liability to give the bond within the appointed time. It is urged that in the state of things supposed, the 1000*l*. might not have been paid as stipulated, and so a breach of covenant by the resp. might have occurred within the ten days. If it did, I should still be of opinion that the app. was bound to give or tender his bond to the resp. within the prescribed time. The right to have the security of two responsible sureties for the performance of the app.'s covenant was a very material thing to the resp.'s company, and of the essence of the contract, and I do not think it could be affected by anything voluntarily done by the app. within the ten days. It was also contended by the app. that the covenants to give the bonds by the app. and resp. respectively were mutual covenants dependent one on the other, and that there was no default by the app. until that instant of time at which there was a like default by the resp., and that the resp., being in a like default, could not defend himself by pleading the default of the app. But I fear that this is not the true meaning and effect of the contract. The engagements to give the bond are not entered into in consideration one of the other; but the fulfilment of his own engagement by each of the parties is a necessary preliminary to his right to recover on the agreement. It is the true intent and object of the agreement that each party should find security within the time prescribed. If this be not done by either party, both may be in effect released from the contract, which may fall to the ground; but neither party can recover for breach of the contracts in the agreement unless he has performed this precedent obligation. I therefore move your Lordships that the judgment of the court below be affirmed.

LORD CRANWORTH.—My Lords, I think that the judgment of the House ought to be for the deft. in error. I agree with the opinions of the learned judges that the giving of the bond must have been intended to be a condition precedent to any right of action for breach of any of the covenants contained in the indenture. On any other hypothesis the bond would be useless. No doubt, as there was a covenant by each party with the other to give a bond with sureties within ten days if default was made in giving a bond, a right of action would accrue for breach of that covenant, but such an action could produce no fruit to the party recovering in it. If brought before breach of any of the other covenants, it could only result in nominal damages. If brought after a breach, no damages could be recovered, except such as would have been recoverable in an action founded on the breach itself. It would give no right against any sureties, the obtaining of which right was the sole object of the bond. It was argued that the circumstance that the bonds were to be given, not immediately, but within ten days, was inconsistent with the hypothesis of a condition precedent. A breach, it was suggested, might occur within the ten days, and so a right of action might accrue before any bond need have been given. This does not appear to me inconsistent with the hypothesis.

of a condition precedent. Probably the parties knew that practically no breach could occur within the ten days. But even if that is not so, the party injured by a breach of covenant within ten days might, by giving his bond, put himself in a condition to sue for the breach, for it would certainly be no answer on the part of the deft. sued for the breach to say that he had not given his bond. Suppose, for instance, the plt. had on the day of the date of the indenture moored a proper ship alongside Morden's Wharf, but that after the expiration of seven days the deft. refused to pay him the 1000*l.*, the plt., if he had given a proper bond with sureties to the deft., would then have been in a condition to maintain an action for breach of covenant against the deft., whether he had or had not given a proper bond to the plt. But it was argued that, even assuming the giving of the bonds to be conditions precedent, still they must be treated as mutual and dependent conditions, and that the deft. who had given no bond to the plt. could not insist on the want of such a bond from him. I do not feel the force of this argument. There is nothing in the indenture making it obligatory on either party to apply to the other for his bond. By giving the required bond the party giving it puts himself in a condition of enforcing, if he thought fit, the performance of the covenants. If neither party, as was the case here, gave any bond, neither party could sue for any breach of covenant. This was the opinion of the courts below, and in that view of the case I concur.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—My Lords, I agree with the decision in the Court of Ex. Ch. affirming the judgment of the Court of C. P. The question is, whether the fourth plea is an answer to the action, or in other words, whether the giving of the bond by the plt. was a condition precedent to his right to recover damages from the deft. for his non-fulfilment of his part of the agreement. The only parts of the deeds necessary to be noticed are, first, the covenants of the plt. that he would forthwith, at his own expense, procure the Cornwall frigate, or some other suitable ship or vessel, and should and would stow, or cause to be stowed, on board the said ship or vessel, the submarine telegraphic cable, which was 150 miles in length or thereabouts, and was then at Morden's Wharf, East Greenwich, and should do various acts in fitting out and provisioning the ship or vessel, and providing sufficient officers and crew, and should and would do and perform all the several acts thereafter covenanted to be performed by him the plt., and have the said ship fully equipped in all respects and ready for sea at the Nore, on or before the 15th July then next: secondly, the covenants of the deft. to pay to the plt. 5000*l.* by the instalments and at the times thereafter mentioned, that is to say, the sum of 1000*l.* on or before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the said ship or vessel alongside Morden's Wharf aforesaid, the sum of 2000*l.*, on or before the expiration of twenty-one days after the said ship should have arrived alongside Morden's Wharf aforesaid, and the sum of 2000*l.* the remainder thereof, when and so soon as the said ship should put to sea from the Nore; and lastly, the stipulation for mutual bonds in these terms: "And it is hereby agreed and declared that for the true performance of the covenants by the plt. hereinbefore contained, and for securing any penalties which he may incur under these presents, the plt. and three responsible sureties shall within ten days from the execution of these presents give and execute to the deft. a bond in the penal sum of 5000*l.*; and for the due performance of the covenants on the part of the deft. hereinbefore contained the deft. and two responsible sureties shall within ten days from the execution of these presents give and execute to the

plt. a bond in the penal sum of 5000*l.*" The learned counsel for the plt. argued that the covenant on the part of the plt. to give the bond could not be intended to be a condition precedent, because he was forthwith bound to procure the ship or vessel, so that he was to do an act before the ten days had expired within which the bond was to be given, and also that the deft. having covenanted to pay the plt. 1000*l.* on or before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the ship or vessel at Morden's Wharf, and the money being appointed to be paid on a day which might happen before the expiration of the ten days within which the bond was to be given, the giving of the bond could not be a condition precedent according to the first rule upon the subject of dependent and independent covenants laid down in the notes to Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 320. They also contended that the case fell within the 3rd rule stated in these notes, as it was a covenant going only to part of the consideration the breach of which might be paid for in damages. These rules are not proposed for the purpose of absolutely determining the dependence or independence of covenants in all cases, but merely as furnishing a guide to the discovery of the intention of the parties. For, as Lord Kenyon said in Porter v. Shepherd, 6 T. R. 668, "conditions are to be construed to be either precedent or subsequent according to the fair intention of the parties to be collected from the instrument, and technical words (if there be any to encounter such intention) should give way to that intention." Now what may fairly be considered to have been the intention of the parties upon the whole scope and object of the deed in question? Putting the agreement into a short form it amounts to this: The deft. says to the plt., "In consideration of your doing certain acts and giving me a bond with sureties to secure the performance of your covenants to do these acts, I will pay you a sum of 5000*l.* and give you a bond with sureties to secure the payment." And the plt. on the other hand covenants to do the acts and to give the bond in consideration of the performance by the deft. of the covenants on his part to be performed. Upon this short summary of the deed there could scarcely be a doubt that either party might refuse to perform his part of the agreement until he was secured by the bond of the other. But the counsel for the plt. say that the particular terms of the deed show that this could not be the intention. In particular, they lay great stress on the word "forthwith" in the plt.'s covenant to procure the vessel, which they interpreted to mean "immediately," and they urged this as a proof that the giving the bonds could not be meant to be conditions precedent, because this act of the plt. must necessarily have been done before the expiration of the ten days, to the last moment of which the deft. was at liberty to delay the execution of the bond. And they also insisted upon the clause for payment by the deft. of 1000*l.* before the expiration of seven days after the arrival of the vessel at Morden's Wharf, which might have happened within the ten days, and therefore they argued that the case in both these respects was within the first rule in the notes to Pordage v. Cole. It appears to me that too great force was attributed to the word "forthwith" in the agreement, and that all that was meant by it was, that the plt. was without delay or loss of time to procure a suitable vessel for receiving the telegraphic cable, and to quicken his diligence the deft. covenanted to pay him 1000*l.* within seven days after the arrival of the vessel at Morden's Wharf. Out of regard to his own interests, too, the plt. would use all expedition in commencing the performance of the agreement, because, unless he had the vessel, with the cable on board, equipped and ready for sea by the 15th July, he would have been liable to pay pilots for the navigation of the port, harbour and roads of Leith in the same way and manner as they did and do enjoy the same.

In the year 1821 an Act, entitled "An Act for the regulation of the corporation of the master and assistants of the Trinity-house of Leith," was passed, which confirmed the rights and privileges granted by the above charter, and that Act contained a schedule of the rates to be received by the pilots licensed by the said corporation. The licence granted to Capt. Hossack by the Leith Trinity-house set forth the authority of that corporation to license pilots for the limits mentioned in the charter, and that Capt. Hossack having been examined and found duly qualified to act as pilot, was thereby appointed by the master and assistants of the Trinity-house of Leith to take charge of any ship or vessel from Leith Road eastward to St. Abb's Head, and southward along the east coast of England to Orfordness, thence to the Nore, and vice versa. It was said that the Leith Trinity-house had been in the habit of granting licences to masters of vessels and others to pilot vessels in the form set out above, but the Trinity-house of London had never been aware of the granting of such licences, or that the power to grant such licences was ever claimed by the Trinity-house of Leith. By sect. 1 of the 5 Geo. 2, c. 20, after reciting that the Trinity-house of London, by long usage, and by virtue of divers letters patent, granted to them by the Crown, had been authorised and empowered to appoint pilots to conduct ships and vessels out of the river Thames and Medway through the North Channel to or by Orfordness, and round the Longsand Head into the Downs, and from and by Orfordness up the North Channel and the rivers Thames and Medway, it was enacted that from and after the 24th June 1732, if any person should take upon himself the charge of any ship or vessel as pilot down the river Thames, or through the North Channel to or by Orfordness, or round the Longsand Head into the Downs, or down the South Channel into the Downs, or from or by Orfordness up the North Channel or the rivers Thames or Medway, other than such person as should be licensed and authorised to act as a pilot by the Trinity-house of London, every person so offending and being lawfully convicted should, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of 20*l*.

The 48 Geo. 3, c. 104, s. 2, required the Trinity-house of London to license pilots for the purpose of conducting ships navigating "up and down or upon the rivers Thames and Medway and all and every the several channels, creeks and docks thereof and therein, or leading or adjoining thereto, as well between Orfordness and London-bridge as from London-bridge to the Downs, and from the Downs westward as far as the Isle of Wight, and in the English Channel from the Isle of Wight up to London-bridge;" and such vessels were to be conducted and piloted by such pilots so appointed and licensed, and by no other pilots or persons whomsoever, except appointed by the society or fellowship of the Trinity-house of Dover (commonly called Cinque Port pilots), within the limits therein mentioned. This power of the London Trinity-house to license pilots to conduct ships and vessels within the limits, as mentioned, between "Orfordness and London-bridge," was confirmed by the 52 Geo. 3, c. 39, and the 6 Geo. 4, c. 125, the latter Act providing that all ships navigating within these limits (with certain exceptions set forth in the Act) should be conducted and piloted within the limits aforesaid by such pilots so to be appointed and licensed, and by no other pilot or person whomsoever.

Upon this statement of facts the opinion of the court was sought on appeal as to whether Capt. Hossack, the master of the Oscar, was on the occasion above mentioned qualified by the licence of the Leith Trinity-house, held by him as described, to pilot the Oscar between the Nore and Orfordness?

The Solicitor-General (with him Maunder) contended, on behalf of Gray, the London Trinity-house pilot, and in support of the Thames magistrate's decision, that Captain Hossack had no authority to act as pilot in navigating his ship to Orfordness, the charter bestowed on the Leith Trinity-house not giving that body any pilotage power beyond their particular local limits; that the Leith Trinity-house claimed their powers under their charter of 1797, but that for a considerable time previous to that charter the London Trinity-house had the exclusive authority under Act of Parliament to license persons to act as pilots to Orfordness; that it never was intended that the words "along the adjoining seas" were to give the Leith corporation power to license persons to navigate ships some distance from their own district on the English coast, and near to the mouth of the Thames to London. It was never contemplated by the statute 1 Geo. 4, c. 57, that the Leith Trinity-house was to come in conflict with the London Trinity-house, and the Leith schedule of pilotage charges proved that that was not intended. The 370th section of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854 provided that the London Trinity-house should continue to license pilots from London to Orfordness on the north and Dungeness on the south. But, even if the Leith charter gave the right to license the master to pilot his own ship, the licence held by Capt. Hossack was not of the character required by the 340th section of the Merchant Shipping Act, which provided that it must be a licence to pilot his particular ship, whereas Capt. Hossack's licence was a general licence to pilot ships; that the conviction of the Thames magistrate must be supported, first, upon the ground that the Leith Trinity-house had no authority to grant Capt. Hossack a licence to pilot his ship to Orfordness; and secondly, because Capt. Hossack did not possess a licence authorising him to pilot as master in the London Trinity-house district, in compliance with the terms of the Merchant Shipping Act of 1854.

Coleridge, Q. C. (with him Turner) contended that the Thames magistrate's conviction should be quashed; and that both under the charter and the Act of Parliament the Leith corporation had authority to license pilots along the German Ocean as far as it went, and that was to the mouth of the Thames. The terms of the charter were, that "it would tend to increase good government and navigation in these realms;" clearly meaning that their authority to act was not to be confined to Scotland, otherwise, why was the word "realms" introduced? The 1 Geo. 4 confirmed the jurisdiction of the Leith Trinity-house along the Northern and the German Oceans; and that being so, the app. had committed no breach of duty in acting as pilot under such licence between the Nore and Orfordness, and the app. came within the terms of the Merchant Shipping Act, which confirmed all pilotage powers existing before that Act and not expressly abrogated by it. With respect to the expression "adjoining seas," that must be read in connection with and as bearing out the contention as to the force of the words, "these realms." It might be that the London Trinity-house had authority over some portion of the same district as the Leith Trinity-house, but that would not do away with the concurrent jurisdiction of the latter.

The Solicitor-General having replied,

COCKBURN, C.J. said:—I think it is quite clear that

Q. B.]

HOBBACK v GRAY. THE SHIP OSCAR.

[Q. B.]

the Leith Act of Parliament and the charter were intended to limit the jurisdiction of the Trinity-house of Leith to Scotland. In the first place, there was at the time of the charter being granted to the Trinity-house of Leith an Act of Parliament in existence which rendered it penal for any one to undertake to navigate or conduct a ship as pilot between the mouth of the Thames and Orfordness, going northwards and coming southwards, without a licence as pilot from the London Trinity-house. It never could have been supposed that the Crown, who is a party to every Act of Parliament, could have intended to grant authority or to confer on the Trinity-house of Leith an authority to grant licences to navigate vessels within the particular districts as to which the prior Act of Parliament was in force, and to legalise by charter that which was, by Act of Parliament, declared illegal. Then, if we look at 1 Geo. 4, which is an Act of Parliament relating to the Trinity-house at Leith, it is plain, so far as the pilotage jurisdiction is concerned, that what that Act intended to do was to confer and give additional force and effect to the charter. It could not be supposed that it was intended to do away with the statute of Geo. 2, conferring the authority on the London Trinity-house, without actually repealing or expressly repealing the authority conferred by that statute on the London Trinity-house; it could not be supposed that it was intended, by a side wind or by implication, to repeal that Act of Parliament. When we look at that Act of Parliament it is plain to my mind that it must have been the intention of the Legislature that the authority in pilotage matters which this conferred or confirmed by Act of Parliament, should be limited to Scotland, inasmuch as we find that all the rates of pilotage as settled here, in the schedule, which are so important a matter to prevent disputes between masters and pilots and the owners of vessels, and to prevent the extortion that might arise in many instances—that all those rates for piloting are confined to the different ports along the coasts of Scotland, and for navigating vessels between those ports, making it plain to my mind that the intention of the Act was to confer jurisdiction solely with regard to the coasts of Scotland. As I have just now pointed out, the whole system has been to confer local jurisdiction only within those limits of navigation within which the discretion of the persons who are to confer the licence was supposed to be limited. It certainly would seem to be an extraordinary thing to confer on the Trinity-house of Leith that which is not conferred on any such port in this country, namely, the power to grant licences to extend along the whole of the coasts of England. The only real difficulty arises from the insertion of the words in the charter and in the Act of Parliament referring both to the coasts of the German and Northern Oceans, and also to the coasts of Scotland. I cannot help thinking that was put in by way of extra caution in order to include everything, and must be taken clearly to be surplusage. To give to it any other interpretation would lead to great conflict and to unfortunate consequences, if licences were to be granted to pilot this southern end of the eastern coast of these realms to persons whose local knowledge of those parts, while it would render them admirable pilots as far as the coast of Scotland was concerned, might make them very insufficient ones so far as it related to the southern or eastern parts of England. I cannot but hold that the true construction is, that the Leith charter of incorporation is confined to the coasts of Scotland and cannot conflict with the jurisdiction of the Trinity-house of London between Orfordness and the mouth of the Thames. I therefore think that this construction was right.

CROMPTON, J.—No one can read the first charter without seeing what the intention must have been; and when we remember also (as my Lord has observed) the general policy and the rules relating to general pilotage which the Legislature has enacted, I should think no one could doubt that they were intended to have only the effect which the Solicitor-General would give them. Now, unfortunately, there is a loose word or two, and Mr. Coleridge in his argument rests on "German and Northern Oceans." Taking those words together, I think from the observations made on them as to the general policy and the clear intention of the charter, if they stood alone, I should have been disposed to give them the construction that one must give to an Act of Parliament. Considering the state of the law when this Act of Geo. 4 was passed, I cannot entertain a doubt that any additional power that Mr. Coleridge wants to give to the jurisdiction of the Leith Trinity-house at that time, has been confined entirely to Scotland, and more especially so when we take the passages which my Lord has referred to as to the rates; and nothing can be stronger than the rates given in these pilotage Acts. We are now considering whether the Trinity-house of Leith could license pilots to navigate vessels into all the channels and all the ports throughout England, and, for aught I know, probably into the Thames. Now, when we look at the Act of Parliament, it is quite clear that the matters all refer to Scotland. In the first place, no bye-laws are to be made but those sanctioned by the Lord President, the Lord Justice Clerk, the Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and His Majesty's Advocate of Scotland. Could it be that it was intended to exclude the law officers here, and yet that it was to apply to England by granting a power to the Scotch courts, and those Scotch bodies, to grant licences all through England with a power of this kind? Then, again, before being sanctioned they are to be hung up in the Custom-house, the Act giving them a power to hang them up in all custom-houses where these pilot matters are to prevail; and it also says that they are to be subject to the Lord President, who shall cause the same to be so hung up in the several custom-houses of Scotland, and in the Trinity-house of Leith. Then the notices of appointments are to be affixed in the Trinity-house of Leith; and then there are penalties attaching to these parties. Now, supposing Mr. Coleridge's argument to be good, and if a party who took charge of a vessel on the English coast were to be guilty of drunkenness or incapable, he is to be fined and punished, but there is no power of punishing him except by taking him, according to the provisions of the subsequent Act of Parliament, before the penal jurisdiction of Scotland. It seems quite inapplicable to any such case. Considering that, and considering all the provisions of the Act, and that it is confined to the northern ports of England, one cannot suppose it was the intention of the Legislature by the statute to give the Trinity-house of Leith a power of granting such licences as would allow Scotch pilots to come down to pilot a vessel between the Nore and Orfordness, and all the branches of the seas and the coasts that are referred to there. I think it is clear that the resp. is entitled to our judgment.

SHEE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

MARITIME LAW REPORTS.

VICE-ADMIRALTY COURT, CAPE TOWN.

March 16 and 17, 1865.

THE ALICIA ANNIE AND THE AMINTA v. THE SCINDIA.

Salvage service and wrecking—Demands of excessive salvage; security discouraged—Old and new practice as to the mode of granting awards—Court now guided, not so much by value of the property saved as by the meritoriousness of the service rendered—General review of extreme awards—Court not necessarily bound to the extent of the salvage amount actually tendered and paid into court.

Where two ships claimed as salvors of a derelict ship, and it was proved that the master of one of them abstracted goods from the derelict with an evident intention of not restoring or accounting for them:

Held, that the misconduct of the master so improperly removing goods tainted the whole salvage service of his ship, and deprived his crew as well as himself of all participation in the salvage award.

BELL, Acting C. J., after reviewing the whole of the voluminous evidence in this case, said:—The Scindia was a ship sound in hull, having all her standing-rigging, except that of her mainmast, well under the command of her helm when steered, but deserted by her crew, and found in the open sea in quiet weather within view of an anchorage. She was taken possession of by the present claimants as salvors, her ports and scuttles closed, her sails set, her anchors bent on to cable, and she was navigated safe to the anchorage without misadventure or risk of any kind, except the possible, but, in the state of the weather, the improbable one, of a gale of wind from the south-east. For these services the salvors have claimed a half of the value of the Scindia, her cargo and freight; which for ship and cargo has been ascertained to be 7000*l.* and 21,281*l.* respectively. With regard to the freight the salvors state its amount to be 3000*l.*; but of this there is no evidence. The salvors were willing, however, to take it to be 2000*l.*, and the owner of the Scindia assented to this. The aggregate value of the ship, cargo and freight then is to be taken as 30,281*l.*; and the half of that sum, or 15,140*l.* 10*s.*, is what the salvors ask for their services, having, previously to proceeding, demanded a sum of 20,000*l.*, and insisted upon security to that amount being found before they would consent to liberate the Scindia, which, it is worth observing, after having some slight repairs done to her, having discharged the damaged part of her cargo, and had the remainder re-stowed, proceeded on her voyage to England, where, by this time, she may have safely arrived. I should observe here, that among the affidavits for the salvors I found some to the effect that the valuations put upon the Scindia and her cargo under the authority of the court were much too low; but no application was made for a re-valuation, nor was any use made of these affidavits at the hearing of the case. When the case for the salvors was opened, it was urged upon the court that the rule in such cases was to award certain fixed proportions of the value, such as a moiety, a third, a fourth, or a fifth, according to the opinion entertained by the court of the extent of the services rendered and the benefits received; seldom less than a third, and generally one-half being said to be given, and great stress was laid upon the value of the salving vessels and the risk they ran, the Alicia Annie and her cargo and freight being stated to be of the value of 18,000*l.*, and the

Aminta, her cargo and freight, of the value of 26,000*l.* These values, however, were mere statements, no evidence of either value having been produced. It was admitted for the salvors that they had not run any risk for their ships or their lives from bad weather, and that they had not exhibited any great degree of skill, none having been required; but it was urged that they had bestowed great labour in getting the Scindia under sail, bending on the anchors, and preparing for mooring. I am not, however, able to find that any such great amount of labour was either necessary or bestowed. With respect to the Scindia herself, it was urged that she was in imminent danger from her proximity to the coast, and the chance of south-east or landward gale arising. No doubt she did run that risk, and if she had been allowed to remain exposed to it long enough without any one coming to her rescue, she would in all moral probability have been driven on shore and have perished; but the barometer all along showed that she was in no very immediate danger of such a catastrophe. I was surprised when security was asked for so large a sum as 20,000*l.*, and equally so to see that they prayed for a half of the value of the property saved, and to hear it insisted on from the bar that the course still observed was to give a definite proportion, which was seldom less than a third, because I had thought that the old practice of the Admiralty Courts in awarding definite proportions had been exploded, and that more rational and just views now prevailed in this matter. It is no doubt true that formerly such amounts of salvage were given as must have made it questionable with those interested whether it would not have been as well in some of the cases that the vessel had been allowed to perish. It is hardly too much to say that salvage at that time did almost as much damage as wrecking; it mattered little to those interested whether their loss arose from the act of the sea or from the act of man. But with the progress which has been made in other things towards a more sound way of thinking, the Courts of Admiralty have, in estimating salvage compensation, adopted the rule of taking a general view of the nature of the services rendered, the danger incurred, the duration of the services, who and what the salvors are, and the situation and condition of the vessel saved. Now, in this case I am of opinion that the services rendered, though necessary to the preservation of the Scindia, exceeded but little those of ordinary navigation; that they were given without any danger whatever incurred by those who rendered them; that the duration of the services exceeded one day only by three hours; that the salvors were merely merchant vessels prosecuting an ordinary trading voyage not requiring any great expedition or exacting from the masters of the vessels any great urgency, such as has been the case where passenger and mail steamers have been the salvors; and that the situation of the Scindia, the vessel saved, though undoubtedly one of some degree of risk, was not one of immediate peril requiring immediate relief. Such being my opinion of the services rendered and received, I find that no fixed portion of the value saved is now awarded: that the value saved is merely one element in the consideration of the salvage that ought to be given, private right and justice having weight given to them, as well as to public policy, in the encouragement of services for the rescuing of life and property, and I find that, in administering the law according to this principle, sums have been given without reference to what might be their proportion to the value of the property saved, but which, if calculated with such reference, vary from one-eightieth upwards. I find this from the perusal of a great variety of cases

THE ALICIA ANNIE AND THE AMINTA v. THE SCINDIA.

beyond those cited from the bar, and more modern in date. The one to which I have referred, in which one-eightieth was given, was that of the Rajasthan, 1 Swa. 171, where the value saved was 40,000*l.*, and the salvage awarded was 500*l.* I have, however, selected three of the many cases as fittest for my consideration in fixing what, in my opinion, the amount of salvage ought in this case to be, as one exhibits the highest and another the lowest amount of salvage that has been given in late times. The first of them is the case of the Windsor Castle, to be found in 2 Irish Rep. for 1843, where the judge, Dr. Stock, whose judgment, which I read rather as an interesting study than a dry legal report, awarded 5000*l.* out of 20,000*l.*, or a sum equal to one-fourth. In that case the vessel saved was in imminent risk of perishing entirely upon a rock-bound lee coast, on which a heavy surf was breaking, while current and wind were drifting her right upon it, and the operations of the salvors were so great and so momentarily attended with peril, as to exceed the belief of nautical persons, though incontestably proved to have actually occurred, and lasted over several days, during which the salvors endured excess of fatigue, and the extremity of danger, and under all the circumstances the rescuing of the ship might be called a recovery from absolute total loss. But for this salvage the vessel must irretrievably have perished, and her salvors with her. The second case is that of the Ella Constance, 33 L. J. 4, 189. There the vessel succoured was a steam passenger ship, which had consumed all its fuel, it two masts, and every available piece of wood; while in this state, and lying still upon the waters, she was come up to by a mail steamer, which towed her into Malta, a harbour it reached in eleven hours. In that case the value saved was 16,000*l.*, and the sum awarded was 400*l.*, a fortieth of the value saved, although it was urged, with contradiction no doubt, that the vessel saved was utterly helpless, as she could not have sailed under canvas. The third case is the one most analogous to the present. It is that of the Earl of Eglinton, 1 Swa. 7. This vessel was driven on shore in Simon's Bay, and struck heavily on the beach. In that position, if the weather had become boisterous, the vessel would have been in very great danger—the suggestion that was made in the present case; but she was got off by the exertions of the salvors, which were rendered without any risk of their property or their lives, as in the present case. The value of the property saved in this instance was 85,000*l.*, and the salvage awarded was 2000*l.*, or one forty-third of the value saved. No doubt, in this last case, the services were rendered by naval officers, to whom less is generally awarded than to civilians; but, on the other hand, the services rendered were much greater than in the present instance, and by a much larger number of persons. After a careful review of all the circumstances which I have remarked as necessary to be taken into consideration in cases of this nature, and particularly of the nature of the services rendered by the salvors, I am of opinion that the tender by the resp. in this case of 2000*l.* was sufficient, and ought to have been accepted. By the agreement of the two captains of the salving vessels, this sum would have to be divided equally between them. The court can have no difficulty in awarding to the ship Aminda one-half of the sum tendered, but the case is different with regard to the Alicia Annie. After all the vessels arrived in Algoa Bay a variety of articles, which are specified in a list, were handed over by Kirby, the master of the Alicia Annie, to the collector of customs, as having been taken out of the Scindia. To the affidavit of the collector stating this fact there was appended a memorandum by Orpen, the officer who made out the list, to the effect that he had reported to Kirby a report that he had been pillaging the Scindia, when he admitted that he had some things taken out of that vessel after he had first denied that he had any, and that the officer had thereupon ordered him forthwith to return them to the Scindia. This memorandum was not authenticated by the oath of Orpen, but Kirby, feeling the prejudice which it would operate against him, made affidavits, not denying that he had taken the things out of the Scindia, but alleging that he had returned them voluntarily. Whichever of these stories may be the true one matters little, because either of them, and both together, establish the fact that Kirby had taken articles out of the Scindia without any explanation why he did so, except such as of itself is sufficient to inculcate him, namely, that he did it "while as yet it was doubtful whether the derelict could be brought into port." Moreover, Kirby delivered the articles in question as being all the articles he had taken out of the Scindia; whereas, after the case had been heard, an affidavit was produced in this court, which was sworn in Liverpool by Fraser, the officer who took the Alicia Annie home for Kirby, swearing that before he, Fraser, sailed from Algoa Bay a boat left the Alicia Annie, with a message that the articles sent in it were all that Capt. Kirby had which belonged to the Scindia; but that at sea he found a variety of articles having upon them the name of the ship Scindia, which were specified in the affidavits. In the affidavits used at the hearing there were two in which it was sworn that from the Aminta boats had been seen going to and from the Alicia Annie and the Scindia, before the Aminta came up to them; and Calvin swore that while he was already in charge of the Scindia, an order came from Kirby to him to deliver to a barque which had also come up, rope and ship's provisions from the stores of the Scindia. The matter then stands thus with Kirby: he takes a great variety of articles from the derelict, and either voluntarily or compulsorily delivers over part of them as if they were the whole, and detains fully as many, if not more. In taking these articles from the Scindia, Kirby cannot pretend to have acted the part of a salvor; it was that of a wrecker; and yet the abstraction of these articles was the first service he rendered to the derelict. What I have before stated from the evidence shows that Kirby was never in a condition to render efficient salvage service to the derelict. In truth it may be said that, so far as the Alicia Annie was concerned, the Scindia would not have been assisted at all, but would have been allowed to fill gradually and founder. It was the accident of the Aminta coming up that rendered the salvage service successful. The state of the crew of the Alicia Annie would not admit of her taking charge of the derelict, and the services which she did render admitting of the character of salvage were almost merely nominal. This of itself would suggest an objection to a claim for salvage on behalf of the Alicia Annie, but for the incautious agreement made with the Aminta, whereby the Alicia Annie was to receive half the salvage, without any stipulation as to the amount of service to be rendered, so that the services rendered by the Aminta, which were efficient, might be argued perhaps to be imputable to the Alicia Annie. It would seem to me to be doubtful whether any salvage could be claimed on behalf of the Alicia Annie, even if the conduct of her master had been different from what it was. But the conduct of Kirby in extracting articles from the Scindia deprives him, in my opinion, of the character of a salvor, and disentitles him to any reward for services, even if they had been much greater than they were. I cannot separate the case of the crew of the Alicia Annie from that of the master, because what was done by him was patent and open to every one, yet it was neither hinted at nor disclosed by any one of the crew. As to the owners of the Alicia Annie, perhaps in a matter of this nature they ought not to be made responsible for the conduct of their agent, which the master of the ship certainly is; but on the other hand neither the ship Aminta nor the ship Alicia Annie were the salvors. It was not through exposure of either of these ships that the salvage was effected; it was due to the exertions of the crew of the Aminta, and the property of the Alicia Annie not having been exposed to risk, the compensation of her owners could be but trifling. Only 1000*l.* of the 2000*l.* could on the whole be awarded to the Alicia Annie. If that had been honestly earned—and but for the conduct of Kirby I must have assumed that, under the agreement, it had been honestly earned, though the services were in truth rendered by the crew of the Aminta—I should have awarded 500*l.* to the crew, 300*l.* to the master, and 200*l.* to the owners. I am disposed therefore to award 200*l.* to the owners. It has not escaped me to doubt how far 2000*l.* having been tendered and brought into court by the resps., it is competent for the court to disallow any part of that sum; but on giving the matter my best consideration, and advertng to the peculiar nature of the jurisdiction which Courts of Admiralty exercise in questions of this nature, I have come to the conclusion that the court has such power. The court does not sit merely to adjudicate the rights of the individual litigants before it; it sits to administer justice at the same time and protect the public policy of the State, which is, on the one hand, that persons should be encouraged to adventure their lives and property for the succour of the lives and property of others imperilled on the high seas; and on the other, that persons under colour or pretence of succouring others should not be permitted to plunder them. It would be pessimi exempli, in my opinion, if the master of the Alicia Annie, after plundering the derelict, should be allowed to profit from salvage services rendered, not by him but by others, through the accident, in the first place, of those others having made an incautious agreement with him, and in the second place, of the resps. having, through a desire to avoid litigation, tendered and brought into court a specific sum. I apprehend it would have been competent to the court, notwithstanding such tender, to have disallowed any salvage compensation whatever. If so, it must equally have the power to reduce it, especially if to omit doing so would so far defeat the policy which it is the duty of the court to protect. It is competent to the court to defeat an agreement between a master or owner and an apprentice, whereby the former is declared entitled to take whatever may become due as salvage to the apprentice, and by express statute any such agreement with a seaman is declared to be wholly void. It is, moreover, competent for the court to award a higher sum than a salvor may have accepted under an erroneous idea of the value of his services, even although the salvor may have given a receipt in full, with perfect knowledge and comprehension of all the circumstances; and even to award a higher sum than that claimed by the suit, directing a fresh suit with that object to be instituted for the surplus. Such extraordinary powers, not competent to other courts, can but spring from the force that is given to the policy of encouraging salvage services in the interest generally of all those who have to pay, though the immediate effect of the exercise of the jurisdiction in the individual instance may be to entail heavier payment. It is for the benefit of the general trade of the country that salvage services should be liberally paid, and that no one should be allowed to come between the payment and those by whom the services were rendered; and the court exercises a power to protect this by setting aside what in other courts would interfere with their jurisdiction. By parity of reasoning, the court must have the power to protect the trade of the country from being plundered, by withholding from a pretended salvor compensation never earned, although the same may have been tendered by the party supposed to have been succoured, but who has in fact been plundered. Under all circumstances, the Court would pronounce that the tender of 2000*l.* must be held to be sufficient; out of which the Aminta would be paid the amount awarded to her, the remainder being retained in court subject to any final decision as to the claim of the owner of the Alicia Annie (as apart from the master and crew of that vessel, who would have nothing), and any final order as to costs.

NORTHERN CIRCUIT, LIVERPOOL.

March 30 and 31, 1865.

(Before SHEE J. and a Special Jury.)

THE CASE OF THE GREAT EASTERN STEAMSHIP AND ITS SETTLEMENT.

STYRING v. BARBER AND OTHERS.

Edward James, Q. C. and R. G. Williams for the plt.Brett, Q. C., Mellish, Q. C. and Quain for the defts.

This was an action against three of the directors, Mr. Barber, Mr. Brassey and Mr. Gooch, of the Great Ship Company, charging them as directors of that company, with wrongfully and collusively, and with intent to defraud the shareholders of the ship, and procure it to be sold to a certain joint-stock company, of which they were shareholders and directors, at a price much less than the real value, instigating and procuring the mortgagees to take possession of and sell the ship, and charging that the ship was so sold accordingly, whereby the plt., who was a shareholder, was deprived of the ship, and his shares were rendered useless; and charging further, that the defts., by making false declarations in their reports, induced the plt. to lend money and to continue to hold shares. The plt.'s case, according to his counsel's statement, was as follows: that he, the plt., being a share and debenture holder in the Great Ship Company, came forward to complain of the defts., that by their conduct and impropriety in the management of the company he had lost the whole of the money invested in it. That the company was established in 1858, at a capital which was gradually increased until it reached the enormous sum of 530,000*l.*; that it was now wound-up, and 15*l.* was all that had come into the hands of the official liquidator, and that the whole of this enormous capital had been dissipated upon the ship; that the ship had been built by Mr. Brunel for long voyages, and that she had been employed on short ones, in which none of the points of advantage which she possessed could be brought into use, while, on the other hand, she was incumbered for such trade by her size and capacity, and could not compete with the largely subsidised lines already in force; that under such a disadvantage was she with reference to those shorter voyages, that in the course of nine of them (extending over some three years) the expenditure amounted to upwards of 278,000*l.*, while the receipts reached something like 118,000*l.* only; representing a receipt of some 13,000*l.* per voyage against 31,800*l.* expenditure; that this being the financial position of the company brought about by the mismanagement of the debts. (the directors) they nevertheless had made representations of a favourable kind, inducing the advance of more capital by the shareholders; that such representations were false, and whether the directors made them knowing them to be false, or having the opportunity of finding out whether they were true or not, made little difference, if they induced others by them to alter their position unfavourably; that in Oct. 1863 the affairs of the company became so disastrous that the shareholders were summoned, and against the wishes of the directors a committee was appointed to report upon the position of the company; that shortly after the report of the committee was presented, and it recommended that three new directors should be at once chosen, but as the time for the retirement of these officers had not properly arrived, the old directors, the debts., though continuing in their office, were to be directed to follow in all respects the course pointed out by the new officers; that at a previous meeting of the shareholders the chairman Mr. Barber had declared that the directors had no plan or policy to propose, and that unless 30,000*l.* could be immediately raised the ship must be sold in fourteen days. The report of the committee set forth the purpose for which the ship was built, and the disasters and position of the company; but it differed from the directors in the hopeless view they appeared to take of the actual condition of things and the necessity for a sale, the report stating that "it was assumed that the price likely to be realised might perhaps pay off the mortgages and debts." The report presented the following statement:

STYRING v. BARBER AND OTHERS.

1. That the ship was designed to carry so large a quantity of freight and so large a number of passengers, with coal sufficient to complete the longest voyage without stopping, as to compete successfully with any known means of conveyance.

2. That the ship was not designed for a short voyage to run against heavily subsidised lines, with one-horse steam-power to 3½ tons of carrying power, while she had but one-horse steam-power to eight tons of carrying power. The result of such competition has been, as every one ought to have foreseen it would be, a loss in three years and a half of 161,869*l.*

3. That the ship was designed to run between distant ports, where the charge for passengers is the highest, and freight dearer in proportion than the passenger rate, the charge to Calcutta by the Peninsula and Oriental Company being 36*l.* per ton; but she has been placed on the cheapest route both for passengers and freight, and where the competition by ships whose size is suited to the duration of the voyage is daily instead of fortnightly.

4. That not one of the qualities specially provided for in the construction of this ship has had in such voyages any chance of being properly exhibited, while she has, from her extra size, incurred on short voyages greater proportionate delays, risks and expenses. Successes might as well be expected from employing an Irish steamer between Hungerford and London-bridge, as from this ship running between England and America.

5. That it was now proposed to place her on an Indian or Australian voyage, whichever, after the most careful consideration, may be considered the best for the interests of the company.

6. That the results of the American voyages are known, and now, after nearly ruining the reputation of the ship, and after such mismanagement and loss, the whole of which will have to be borne by the shareholders, several of the mortgagees are trying to force on the sale of the ship with the intention, it is believed, of being themselves among the principal buyers.

7. That the directors have never yet managed the ship successfully for the shareholders. They have never shown confidence in her. If they became parties to the proposed purchase it must be with the expectation of doing better with her on their own account, and the inference will be irresistible that they have not done their duty to you; for, whether the cost of the ship be 400,000*l.* or she be bought at a nominal price, to work her with the recent annual loss will be equally ruinous. The directors and bondholders now urging on the sale of the ship cannot be buyers honestly at any price.

These latter passages in the report, the counsel for the plt. contended were prophetic; for on the day when the meeting of shareholders was to be held to discuss the report, and an hour earlier in the day, the directors being themselves bondholders, and some of the other bondholders, held a meeting together, and on the motion of Mr. Gooch and Mr. Barber determined to sell the ship. In Jan. 1864 the ship was put up to auction at an upset price of 130,000*l.* and not sold, and on the 9th Feb. the prospectus of a new company, namely, "The Great Eastern Steamship Company (Limited)" appeared, which was formed for the purpose of buying the ship. The bondholders of the old company formed a large proportion of the shareholders of the new, and the old directors (the debts.) were the directors also of the new, and, indeed, the whole executive in each, of solicitors, brokers, &c., was the same. A second auction was held, and the new company bought the ship for the price of 25,000*l.* (having refused to rest for a month), when a Mr. Hawes offered 12,000*l.* and upset the bid of another gentleman who would, as the plt. alleged, have given more. This had reference to the bid of a gentleman which the auctioneer was instructed to decline on the ground of the bidder's inability to make a deposit at the time, and which was the subject of an action in the summer assizes at Liverpool. Having thus got possession of the ship, the new company at once let it to the Atlantic Telegraph Company for the sum of 50,000*l.* which was not a bad stroke of business in the interests of the new management.

Such was in substance the case for the plt., which was supported by the evidence of Mr. Hawes and Mr. Richardson, in addition to various reports and statements put in, to show what steps were taken at the different meetings of the shareholders to stem the disastrous current of affairs. It did not appear, however, that the shareholders, as a body, had ever been opposed to the course adopted by the directors, or desired to substitute the long voyages mentioned in the report for the shorter ones to America; and with reference to the meeting of the bondholders at which it was decided to sell the vessel, it appeared that at the time it was held the debts. had ceased to be the directors of the old company, and the new one did not yet exist, while Mr. Brassey was not shown to have had anything to do with that meeting whatever. This being so, the debts.' counsel submitted that there was no case to go to the jury on the counts for false representation, mismanagement, and so forth; but his Lordship held that, inasmuch as there were demurrers to determine the legal validity of these counts, the question of fact on them should be determined by the jury. With reference to the first count, charging an improper combination with the bondholders to realise their security and sell, it was submitted that this was a count that must be proved strictly, the proper remedy after an order to wind-up the company being, not at the suit of a shareholder, but at that of the official liquidator, and probably in Chancery rather than at law; and as the count charged that, at the time of the sale, the debts. were directors of both companies, whereas the proof showed them to be directors of neither, it must be withdrawn from the jury. The court having adopted this view, it was agreed, after a consultation among counsel on both sides, to allow the plt. to withdraw a juror, the Attorney-General for the County Palatine stating that, with regard to an expression he had made use of as to "gigantic imposition," it was used in reference to the ship herself (for such he had always deemed her), and not to the company; and that upon the whole of the directors' reports being read, rather than isolated passages, the plt. must admit that there could be no charge of misleading representation, or, generally, ground of imputation.

Brett, Q. C. said that the debts. consented to the course of a juror being withdrawn upon the withdrawal of all imputations; and

His LORDSHIP said, he thought it was a very proper and very handsome way of settling the matter.

ADM.] BELFAST HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS v. LAWTHER AND MARINE INVESTMENT SOCIETY. [ADM.]

COURT OF CHANCERY, IRELAND.

DUBLIN, Monday, June 5, 1865.

THE BELFAST HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS v. LAWTHER AND THE MARINE INVESTMENT SOCIETY.

THE EDWARD CARDWELL.

Freight and mortgage—Mortgagee's lien on freight of landed goods.

Where the owner of a ship lands goods on a wharf in his own name, the lien which he has on the goods until the freight is paid is outside any statutory endowment; the lien given to the ship by the statute on such goods merely applying where the owner of the goods takes them himself out of the ship and lands them on the wharf in his own name, and this because the lien for freight would be gone when the owner of the goods landed them if the statute did not make provision to preserve it:

Semble, where the owner and mortgagor of a ship lands goods on a wharf, retaining his lien on them for freight, whether such lien would pass to the mortgagee, even admitting the mortgagee had been entitled to the accruing freight on the goods before they left the ship and were landed.

Brewster, Q. C., Chatterton, Q. C. and Andreics were counsel for the petitioners.

Murdonough, Q. C., Jellett, Q. C. and Porter for the Belfast Marine Investment Society.

The Solicitor-General, Harrison, Q. C. and Falkiner for Mr. Lawther.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (of Ireland).—In this case a charter-party was entered into between Mr. Lemon and Co. of Belfast and Mr. Mitchell of Miramichi, for the employment of the ship Edward Cardwell, of which the deft. Lawther was agent. As such agent he (Lawther) advanced 2000*l.* on the freight of two-thirds of the cargo; and on the other third, paid 300*l.* on account of the ship, and gave Messrs. Lemon an acceptance for 1000*l.* on getting authority from them to sell their part of the cargo on their account, and to deduct from the proceeds the amount of freight payable by them. After Lawther had so advanced 2300*l.*, the Marine Investment Company became mortgagees of the vessel for 6500*l.* All Lawther's advances were made and the securities given to him before the intervention in Belfast of the Marine Investment Company; but shortly after that a person of the name of Tribe, who said he was authorised by the Marine Investment Company to intervene in the matter, came to Belfast, and then a controversy arose between him and Lawther as to the ship's register, which Lawther, as representing Mr. Mitchell, had got from the captain, on the arrival of the ship. The parties went to the police office, under the powers of the Act of Parliament, and Mr. Lawther rather complicated the transaction by a step which might be within his authority, but which was not very well-advised, namely, by appointing himself master of the ship, a position for which he was wholly unfit. However, the transactions as to the register were entirely beside the question to be disposed of in the present case, which had reference—not to the register of the ship—not to the ship itself—but to the lien, if lien there were, on the cargo for the freight. The way the matter then stood was, that on Oct. 15th the Marine Investment Company intervened after all the transactions he had alluded to had taken place between Mr. Lemon and the other parties. Lawther had been and was then the agent of Mr. Mitchell, and Mr. Mitchell was still the owner, subject to the claim of the Marine Investment Company. Mitchell was the owner of a part of the cargo, and Lawther was his agent; Lemon was the owner of another portion of the cargo, and Lawther was also his agent; and Lawther had a claim on his own account for the sum of 3000*l.* The Marine Investment Company claimed the ship as absolute owners, and made their title as such. Under these circumstances, when the harbour commissioners received the notice from the Marine Investment Company, they were placed undoubtedly in a position of considerable difficulty. They knew nothing whatever about the dealings between Lawther and the other parties, and still less did they know anything about the Marine Investment Company, who did not interfere for two months after the ship arrived, and a week at all events after the cargo had been discharged. Under these circumstances the harbour commissioners refused to give up the property to Lawther after the notice they had received from Mr. Tribe, and Lawther brought an action against them for the value of the cargo. The harbour commissioners, being embarrassed by these claims of lien, applied to the Court of C. P. under the Interpleader Act to stop the action, and to compel the Marine Investment Company to give up their claim, or become defts. in the suit. The Court of C. P. unfortunately differed in judgment. The Marine Investment Company contended that, having given notice to the commissioners on the 16th Oct. under the statute, the commissioners were bound to obey the Act of Parliament, and to require the goods holder to lodge the amount claimed by them, and then go through the ceremonies which were prescribed by the subsequent sections of the Act. That was a very convenient arrangement where it could apply, but there could be no doubt that it applied only to cases of a very simple character which could be easily disposed of. It related only to the case where the owner of the goods took them out of the ship and landed them on the wharf. There the lien for freight would be gone if the Act did not make some such provision for preserving it; but this did not apply at all when the shipowner himself landed the goods in his own name. He, in that case, retained his lien until the freight was paid. The Act contemplated disputes only between the freight owner and the goods owner, but that was not the case here. This was a case between two conflicting claimants of lien, and the persons claiming the lien were the mortgagor and mortgagee of ship, and not the shipowner and goods owner at all. The case was therefore entirely outside the Merchant Shipping Act in every respect; and the Marine Investment Company was entirely wrong in contending that the harbour commissioners were to follow it literally. The point upon which the Court of C. P. differed was as to whether the Act applying was a preliminary question, and therefore there could not be an interpleader. It appeared to him that this preliminary question was as much within the authority of the court as any other. It was argued that, because the Court of C. P. had refused to interfere that, therefore, the authority of Chancery was excluded; but that would be a very great denial of justice. If one court refused a prohibition, there was nothing to prevent the suitor going to another court; though, if the one court went into the merits and decided upon them, then there would be no opportunity of going to another court. He believed that he had full power to entertain the case, and to dispose of it on the hearing, if the questions were ripe for hearing; which, in his mind, they appeared to be. He would, therefore, discuss the real merits of the case as between the parties, having endeavoured to clear away the cloud which the contentions of the parties had raised around it. First, with regard to Lawther's title; he represented in himself Mr. Lemon and Mr. Mitchell. He was the actual assignee at all events for 1000*l.* of the freight long before the mortgage to the Marine Investment Company, and certainly long before such mortgage was registered. He had also a charge on the freight for the amount of 300*l.* which he had spent upon the ship. In addition to that, when he landed the goods on the wharf he was the representative of Mr. Mitchell, the mortgagor of the ship, and in that character he had ample power to deal with it as he liked as long as nobody interfered. If he had been paid the freight by Lemon, the mortgagee never could have touched it. The mortgagee had a right to the accruing freight of the ship; he had a right to the freight which had been earned by the vessel during the voyage; but no case had decided that, if the goods were taken out of the ship by the mortgagor and lodged on the wharf, though the mortgagor had a lien upon them for freight, that that lien passed over to the mortgagee. He was not going to decide whether it did or not, because the question did not arise in this case. It was plain that Lawther and Lemon could deal with the cargo and freight as they pleased until the intervention of the mortgagee, and they arranged to take, instead of the lien on the goods which might or might not exist, a very definite mode of payment. Instead of the terms agreed upon by the charter-party, it was arranged that other terms of payment of the freight by Lemon should be substituted; that Lawther should sell the goods as agent of Lemon, and should return out of the proceeds of the sale a sum equal to the freight. It appeared to the court that when that arrangement had been made binding by those who had the power to make it, the mortgagee could not afterwards step in to disturb it. Before the mortgagee took possession of the vessel he left the freight in the hands of the mortgagor, to be dealt with as he pleased, and if he parted with it for valuable consideration there was an end of the claim. Mr. Mitchell's portion of the cargo was freight free, and therefore the Marine Investment Company had no claim upon it. He would therefore give the commissioners an injunction against actions by either of the other parties, and direct their costs to be paid by the Marine Investment Company.

THE SUPERB v. THE FLORENCE BRAGINTON.(a)

Collision—Rules of the road.

Where two sailing vessels are crossing so as to involve risk of collision, and they have the wind on different sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close-hauled and the other ship free; in which case the latter shall keep out of the way: but if they have the wind on the same side, or if one of them has the wind aft, the ship which is to windward shall keep out of the way of the ship which is to leeward.

Deane, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the Superb.

Brett, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Florence Braginton.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which came on by an action brought by the barque Superb, 321 tons, from Shields to Alexandria, laden with coal, against the barque Florence Braginton, 367 tons, from Sunderland to Hong Kong (also coal-laden), to recover for a total loss, arising from a collision which took place between two and three o'clock in the morning of the 27th Dec. last, in the Wold off the coast of Norfolk. According to the statement of the Superb the wind was about N.W.; according to the Florence Braginton, it was W.N.W., the weather being represented as dark and cloudy; and the tide at about low water. The case for the Superb was: that she was taking her fairway course through Hasborough Gat, steering S.E. by S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S. under topgallantsails, topsails, foresails and jibs, with topsail stowed and yards about square, making from five to six knots, carrying her red and green lights, when the Florence Braginton was seen a little abaft her port quarter, distant only about three-ships' lengths, overhauling and rapidly approaching her; that the helm of the Superb was thereupon immediately put hard aport, and the Florence Braginton was hailed loudly to starboard her helm and keep off, notwithstanding which she almost immediately ran stem on into the port mainrigging of the Superb, driving her deck beams right out on the opposite side, and doing her great damage. The Florence Braginton, on whose part a cross-action has been brought, pleaded that she was proceeding under topgallantsails, topsails, jib and spanker, and with the clews of the courses about half up, close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading S.W., making two and a half to three knots, exhibiting her proper lights, when the port light of the Superb was descried at a short distance from and on her starboard bow; that she (the Florence Braginton) was kept on her course, but that the Superb, which had the wind free, instead of keeping out of her way, as she ought to have done, ran against her and struck her about midship on her stem and cutwater, and that the two vessels remained for some time in contact, during which considerable damage ensued. The first question to be determined was, whether the case could be discussed without reference to any of the articles established by statute. It was truly stated that the case must fall within the 12th or 17th articles, and there could be no difficulty in ascertaining what is the true construction of these articles when the facts are thus determined on as applicable to this particular case. It appeared from the evidence, or at least it was alleged, that at the time of collision the Florence Braginton was under a starboard helm, and that the direction she was sailing in was about S.W., the wind, as represented by her, being W.N.W.; and with regard to the Superb, she was sailing S.E. by S. $\frac{1}{2}$ S., which appears to be the ordinary course from the neighbourhood of the Wold for vessels bound south. It seemed a little startling to find a vessel so proceeding close-hauled on the starboard tack, with the wind at S.W., looking at the facts of the case, and where she was and what the ordinary course was; but still there may be very good reasons in navigation which may induce persons so circumstanced to pursue such a course. Looking at the evidence of the pilot of the Florence Braginton, was it consistent with probability, and therefore could credit be given to the statement he made when he said: "We weighed anchor and proceeded under all sail, except that the clews of the courses were not let down. We were close-hauled on the starboard tack heading S.W. I wanted to get her into a fairway, so as to be in a better sailing position for getting her before the wind." Was such a course consistent with the ordinary course which seamen would pursue or consistent with probability? If the case came within the 17th article, and if, in point of fact, this vessel, the Florence Braginton, was following the other vessel and overhauled her, and came up to her, and ran into her, then it would be perfectly clear that she would fall within the limits of the 17th article, viz., that "every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of her;" and under those circumstances the Florence Braginton would be—supposing that she was following the other vessel, and had overtaken her, and was going at a faster rate, or from any other circumstance was overtaking her—to blame for not having kept out of the way. If she was to blame, then the other vessel was to blame also, for she ported her helm, whereas she was bound by the 18th article to keep her course unless there was some reason, which does not appear to exist on the present occasion, why she should alter her course. If the case does not fall within the 17th article, it must fall within the 12th, which states that when two sailing vessels are crossing,—and if the two vessels were not following each other, or meeting, they must have been crossing,—so as to involve risk of collision, then, if they have the wind on different sides, the ship with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the way of the ship with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the ship with the wind on the port side is close-hauled and the other ship free, in which case the latter shall keep out of the way; but if they have the wind on the same side, or if one of them has the wind aft, the ship which is to windward shall keep out of the way of the ship which is to leeward." The first question to determine then was, which vessel was to windward, and it appeared to the court, from the facts, that it was not the Florence Braginton that was to windward, but the Superb. It was the duty then of the Superb to keep out of the way. Why did she not do so, and what satisfactory reason has she assigned for not doing so? If she saw the Florence Braginton too late, and might have seen her at an earlier period, and could, by porting or starboarding, have got out of the way, she must be to blame; and, upon all the facts elicited, the Court and the Elder Brethren have arrived at the unanimous conclusion that the Superb was solely to blame for the collision. There must be a decree to that effect in both actions.

The Masters of the Trinity House assisting the court were Captain Drew and Captain Lambert.

THE ELIZABETH v. THE LOTUS. (a) Collision.

Where one ship is run down by another, through no default, previously to the collision, on the part of the ship run down, the fact of the latter ship not having taken all proper measures and the most prudent means to mitigate the consequences of the collision, subsequently to its occurrence, does not necessarily disentitle her to indemnity against the ship running her down.

Milward, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the Elizabeth.

Dean, Q. C., Brett, Q. C., and Vernon Lushington, for the Lotus.

Dr. LUSHINGTON, gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the owners and master of the late barque Elizabeth, 311 tons, from Demerara, with timber, and calling at Queenstown, for Greenock, against the steamer Lotus, 459 tons, from Liverpool with a general cargo for Bordeaux to recover for the total loss of the barque arising from a collision which took place about 7 p.m. on the 21st of last Dec. off the Bishop's Light, in the St. George's Channel. It was agreed on both sides that the wind was E. by N. The barque stated the weather as clear and starlight with a moderate breeze, and a head sea; the tide being flood and running north from three to four knots. The steamer represented the night as dark and cloudy, with a slight haze on the horizon and the tide as ebb. The case for the Elizabeth is that, while under two courses, two topsails short reefed, maintop-gallant sail, mizen-topsail, mizen-topmast staysail, mizen-trysail, upper and lower mizen-topmast staysails, main and outer jibs, making four knots, closehauled on the starboard tack, heading N. $\frac{1}{2}$ E., and carrying the proper lights, the steamer was seen two to three miles off, between four and five, on her starboard bow, with all her lights visible; that the Elizabeth was kept on her course closehauled to the wind, on the starboard tack, in the expectation that the Lotus, which was under both steam and sail, would keep clear of her, but that although the bell of the Elizabeth was rung, and those on board her shouted to the Lotus, the Lotus came on at great speed, shutting in her green light, and with her port bow struck the Elizabeth a violent blow on her starboard bow, did her a great deal of damage and caused her afterwards to founder; and thereby the Elizabeth, her cargo, and the private effects of her master and crew, were totally lost. The master and crew of the Elizabeth were taken on board the Lotus. The answer on the part of the Lotus pleaded that she was steering S.W. $\frac{1}{2}$ W. making under steam and canvas nine knots, carrying the regulation lights, when the barque's green light was descried about a quarter of a mile distant, bearing about three points on her port bow; and nearly at the same time a red light from another vessel was sighted on the starboard bow; that thereupon her helm was put hard a-port and her engines stopped and reversed; that she cleared the vessel which she had sighted on her starboard bow, which passed ahead of her, but that the Elizabeth with her starboard bow struck her (the Lotus) on her port bow. There are two questions which arise here. The first is as to the original collision. There cannot be a shadow of doubt in the world that it was the duty of the Elizabeth, which was closehauled on the starboard tack according to the regulations, to have kept her course. That she did, and therefore there is no imputation upon her, unless indeed the court were to adopt the argument of Dr. Deane, that by possibility she might have taken a measure contrary to law which might have obviated the consequences—a proposition that cannot be entertained. What is the excuse on the part of the steamer? It is not attempted to be proved that it was a very dark night, the allegation simply states it was a cloudy night and a little hazy. According to the evidence of the Lotus, taking it verbatim to be true, this nondescript of a vessel is descried at the distance of half-a-mile according to one witness, and 200 hundred yards according to another. If she was seen at the distance of half-a-mile there was ample time to have taken proper measures to have avoided the collision; but if the statement be correct that she was seen at 200 yards, what becomes of the look-out on board the Lotus? There is not a shadow of doubt that this collision is to be attributed to the fault of the Lotus. Then comes the other question—one which has come before the court in many instances previously. It is said, though you may be to blame as the wrong-doer for the original collision, yet you are not liable, under certain circumstances, for all the consequences of that collision—a proposition nobody would contest. But it is said here that there was a want of ordinary skill and diligence, which caused the destruction of the vessel, which otherwise might have been saved. The court always looks at all the circumstances of a collision of this kind, which creates terror, fear and panic amongst the crew, and deprives those who have the command of the vessel of that entire command of the understanding to adopt the most proper means, and the wisest and best measures to prevent damage. It is not necessary, in order to entitle the Elizabeth to recover, that she should show, that, subsequently to the collision, she took all the proper measures and all the wisest measures to be adopted; neither is blame to be attached to the Elizabeth because her crew were seized with panic, and did not perform their duty as they ought to have done. The question is, whether there was not a cause which occasioned and will account for that very panic itself; and when the occasion of the collision is considered, and that the occurrence took place at night, there appears no dereliction of duty here which can prevent the claim of the owner of the Elizabeth to indemnification. The court therefore pronounces against the Lotus.

THE BOANERGES AND THE ANGLO-INDIAN.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Farren, and Capt. Were.

THE BOANERGES AND THE ANGLO-INDIAN. (a)

Collision—Rule of the road.

Where two ships are crossing each other, the one sailing free and the other closehauled, it is the duty of the ship sailing free to give way on one side or other to the ship that is closehauled; and where the one ship is to keep out of the way, the other is to keep her course; subject to any special circumstances in each particular case which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

Brett, Q.C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the Boanerges.

Deane, Q.C., and Potter for the Anglo-Indian.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the ship Boanerges, 1237 tons, from Victoria and Hong Kong, with a general cargo and passengers, for San Francisco, California, against the barque Anglo-Indian, of 1200 tons, from Foochow, with a cargo of tea, for Sydney, to obtain compensation for damage sustained by a collision between the two ships, about 8 a.m. on the 3rd April 1863, in the China Sea, abreast of the Pratas Shoal. The Boanerges stated the wind as N.E. half N., and the weather as hazy; the Anglo-Indian represented the former as N.N.E., and the latter as thick and hazy about the horizon, but clear above, and with moderate breeze. The case for the Boanerges set forth that, while under all plain sail (royal excepted), proceeding closehauled on the port tack, heading E. by S. half S., making seven knots, the Anglo-Indian was seen bearing about four points on the port bow, at the distance of about one mile and a half, coming with the wind free, and having studding sails set on her port side, and thereupon the Boanerges was kept on her then course, closehauled to the wind, on the port tack, in the expectation that the Anglo-Indian would keep out of the way of the Boanerges, as she was bound to do. The Anglo-Indian, however, instead of so doing, approached the Boanerges, and ran into, and with her starboard main rigging or backstay carried away the jibboom of the Boanerges, after which the Anglo-Indian struck with her starboard side the Boanerges on her starboard bow, and the two vessels remained together for some time. When they were got clear of each other, it was found that considerable damage had been done to the Boanerges in the said collision, and she being unable to prosecute her voyage in her then condition, proceeded back to the port of Victoria, Hong Kong, where she arrived on the 4th April, and three of the crew of the Anglo-Indian, who had boarded the Boanerges during the said collision, were landed from her. The defence on the part of the Anglo-Indian, for whom a cross-action was brought, was, that she was steering S. by W., under all plain sail, with port studding-sails set, making from seven to eight knots, when the Boanerges was seen and reported at the distance of from three to four miles off, broad on the starboard bow of the Anglo-Indian, steering about E., closehauled on the port tack, with her masts nearly in one, and heading to go astern of the Anglo-Indian; that the Anglo-Indian kept her course; that the Boanerges, as she approached, kept edging off the wind under a port helm, and being a much more powerful ship, and a faster sailer than the Anglo-Indian, overhauled her, and approached her on her lee quarter; that the master of the Anglo-Indian, who came on deck when the Boanerges was first reported, seeing her so manœuvring, believed she wished to speak his vessel, and kept his course; that as the Boanerges came near the Anglo-Indian, some one on board the Boanerges called out, "What is your Greenwich time?" in reply to which the master of the Anglo-Indian, perceiving the Boanerges coming still closer, ordered the helm of the Anglo-Indian to be put hard down, and called out to the Boanerges, "Mind your helm;" that thereupon the helm of the Boanerges was hove hard a-starboard, and she instantly shot up with her stern and port bow right into the lee main rigging of the Anglo-Indian, going in from aft forward, and stripping the main rigging clean off, and doing an immense amount of damage to her and her cargo; that the vessels remained in contact about an hour, when they got clear, and the Boanerges sailed away without rendering any assistance to her, but, on the contrary, taking away three of the crew of the Anglo-Indian who were then on board her. It is not to be wondered at that there should be a certain degree of doubt attending the facts of such a case, when it is considered how long ago it is since the collision took place, and that the witnesses were not examined till after the lapse of so great an interval of time. Still, perhaps the safest course would be to take the facts as admitted on both sides in the first instance as a guide, and then afterwards to proceed to those facts which are in a state of dispute. It was agreed on all hands that the Boanerges was closehauled on the port tack, heading E. by S. half S.; and it was agreed also that the Anglo-Indian was on a course S. by W., and that the wind was N.N.E. It was clear that the two vessels were crossing each other, and that it was the duty of the vessel sailing free to have avoided; that is, to have given way, on one side or the other, to the vessel which was close hauled, and that is a position which does not appear to have been controverted by the learned counsel who argued on behalf of the Anglo-Indian. That puts the case in very nearly the same position as it would be if the regulations applied; because, if so, it would fall within the 12th article, which would direct that the Anglo-Indian would be bound to have avoided the other ship; and it would also fall within another article, the 18th, which states: "Where by the above rules, one of two ships is to keep out of the way, the other shall keep her course, subject to the qualifications contained in the following article." As far as the court will perceive, the Anglo-Indian was clearly to blame, unless it could be shown that the Boanerges was guilty of some dereliction of her duty which absolutely brought about the collision, and that the Anglo-Indian did all that was right on her part, and that the whole fault lay on the Boanerges; otherwise it was quite clear that the Anglo-Indian was to blame, because she had the wind perfectly fair, and she descried the Boanerges at a great distance, and at so great a distance that she might have done one thing or the other with perfect safety if she had thought fit so to do, but she seems not to have thought it necessary to adopt earlier measures. You may depart, and must depart, from a rule if you see with perfect clearness, amounting almost to positive certainty, that adhering to the rule will bring about a collision, and violating a rule will avoid it; and indeed that is provided for by the 19th article. The next question was, what was the conduct of the Boanerges? Can it by possibility be said, even if the Boanerges was to blame, that that would excuse the other vessel? But that could not be so; because, according to her own statement, she did nothing at all until the end of the whole matter, and then she starboards. That, as the Anglo-Indian has pleaded, the Boanerges ought to have kept her course, is true enough; but that she was bound to have gone astern of her, as in the answer it is stated she could and ought to have done, is very doubtful. As to the Boanerges starboarding her helm in the last instance, the whole of the evidence went to show that it did not affect the collision. The judgment must be in favour of the Boanerges, and the Anglo-Indian be held to be solely to blame for the collision.

(a) See the Shipping and Mercantile Gazette of May 13th.

THE ELEANOR v. THE ALMA.

[ADM.]

THE ELEANOR v. THE ALMA. (a)

Collision—Defective look-out.

A ship going with the wind free, and not keeping such a look-out at night as to enable her to see the lights of another ship lying to or driving, so as to ease until close upon her, held liable for the whole consequences of the subsequent collision that took place.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the brig Eleanor, 206 tons, from Folkstone, in ballast for Seaham, against the brig Alma, 248 tons, from Shields, coal-laden for Southampton, to recover for the consequences of a collision between eleven p.m. and a quarter past twelve a.m., on the 20th May 1864, about four miles from the Kentish Knock light-vessel. The Eleanor stated the wind as N.N.W. and the weather as squally, with thunder; the Alma represented the former as about N. and the latter as stormy, accompanied with thunder and lightning. The case for the Eleanor was, that she had her proper lamps burning, and that the night was dark, and so clear that the lights of vessels could be distinctly seen a mile off; that just before the collision her foretopsail sheet broke, whereupon the watch below were called and came on deck, and two of the crew were then sent aloft to secure the broken foretopsail sheets, the Eleanor being hove to, with her foreyard aback and her head W. by S. on the starboard tack; that the ebb-tide was running at about three knots, and the Eleanor was hove to, and was driving to leeward in a S.S.E. direction of from two to three knots an hour, when the two coloured lights of the Alma were seen bearing E.N.E., distant about one mile; that the Alma came on in a direction for the Eleanor's stern, and, as a collision was becoming imminent, the hands from aloft were called down, and they watched the Alma, which kept her course towards the Eleanor until she was about a quarter of a mile distant, when the Alma starboarded her helm and shut out her red light; that the Alma continued to approach the Eleanor under a starboard helm, and just before coming up with that vessel those on board the Alma ported, whereby her course was again altered, so that she almost immediately afterwards, and within about ten minutes from being first seen, came violently into collision with the Eleanor, the starboard bow of the Alma striking the wood-ends on the port side of the Eleanor's stern and port-quarter, occasioning her considerable damage, and causing her to fall heavily alongside the Alma, damaging some of the planks in the Eleanor's port bow, and occasioning further damage to her hull, sails, and gear; that the vessels cleared immediately, and on so doing those on board the Alma were loudly and repeatedly hailed to heave to, to which an answer was made, but could not be made out by those on board the Eleanor, and as the Alma was not hove to, the Eleanor as soon as possible stood after her, and at daylight spoke her and ascertained her name and port; that afterwards the Eleanor was steered for Dover Roads, and having been taken in tow by a steam-tug, was taken into Dover harbour, and there moored at about three p.m. of the 21st of the same month for the purpose of undergoing the necessary repairs. The defence of the Alma set forth that the tide was about one hour ebb, and of the force of about one knot; that she was proceeding under all plain sail, excepting her top-gallant sails and flying jib, heading W.S.W., making six to seven knots, and carrying the Admiralty regulation lights, when the Eleanor was made out about one point on the port bow, at the distance of about half-a-mile, with no light visible on board her, and the Eleanor was watched to ascertain the direction in which she was proceeding, and directly afterwards the green light of the Eleanor became visible, and it was thereupon concluded that she was on the starboard tack proceeding about W.N.W., and the helm of the Alma was put hard a-starboard to pass under the stern of the Eleanor, and whilst the Alma was so passing the Eleanor, the Eleanor ran astern, and with her port quarter struck the Alma on her starboard quarter and carried away two of her main chain-bolts, and the Eleanor, after so doing, fell alongside the Alma, and the two vessels almost immediately cleared. The plts. therefore, in effect, allege that at the time of collision they were lying to. If they were lying to in the ordinary sense of the term they would be making little way, or be almost stationary, and if that was the state of the case, then the result in law would clearly be this, that other vessels sailing free, as the Alma was at the time, ought to get out of the way. With regard to the burden of proof, it having been proved by the Eleanor that she was lying to in the ordinary sense of the term, the burden of proof would be upon the Alma to show how she came into contact with her. But attention must be called to the facts which have been proved beyond doubt. From these it appears that the Alma was a vessel coming from the N., and that the Eleanor was going to the N., and that the collision occurred in the immediate neighbourhood of the Kentish Knock light-vessel. The wind was, according to the plt., N.N.W., and, according to the deft., about N. And here it is important to consider what was

Brett, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington appeared for the Princessan Lovisa.

Deane, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson for the Artemas.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Shuttleworth and Capt. Lambert.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was a claim raised by the Swedish barque Princessan Lovisa 300 tons, from Shields for Alexandria, against the brigantine Artemas, 162 tons, from London for Hartlepool, for the loss arising from a collision between them, about 1 a.m. on the 11th July 1864, in the North Sea. The barque stated the wind as E.
by N. and the weather as thick and hazy; the brigantine represented the former as N.E. by E. to N.E., and the latter as foggy at intervals. The case for the Princessan Lovisa was, that she was steering in charge of a licensed coasting pilot, to the Downs, S. half E., the tide being ebb and running about one knot, that she was making five or five and a half knots an hour, carrying her Admiralty regulation lights and occasionally sounding her foghorn, when a dim light of a vessel, the colour of which light was not distinguishable, was observed about a quarter of a mile distant, and about one point on her port bow; that her helm was put hard aport, but that the other vessel, the Artemas, came on, and, with her green light visible, ran with her starboard bow upon the stem and port bow of the Princessan Lovisa, carrying away the barque's bowsprit and jibboom, and doing other great damage forward; that the two vessels remained some time in collision before they cleared one another, and the Princessan Lovisa was obliged to put into the Humber. The answer filed for the Artemas, on whose part a cross-action was brought, alleged that she was proceeding close-hauled on the starboard tack, heading N. half W., the tide being about half ebb, making at the rate of two and a half knots an hour, and she was going three and a half knots, exhibiting her proper lights, when the green light of the barque was seen, distant a quarter of a mile, and bearing about two points on the starboard bow; that the Artemas was kept on her course, closchauced to the wind on the starboard tack, in the expectation that the Prin-cessan Lovisa, which was on the opposite, the port, tack, would keep out of her way; that the Princessan Lovisa, instead, however, of keeping out of the way of the Artemas, as she ought to have done, ran into her and struck her on the starboard bow, near the cathead, and did the damage of which she now complained. It was then pleaded that the Princes-san Lovisa drove the head of the Artemas round to the S.W., and the two vessels then fell alongside each other, and remained in contact for about an hour, when they were got clear; after which the Artemas proceeded to Grimsby, where she arrived at about 7 p.m. of said day. It was a matter of great importance to bear in mind the rules and regulations which were now laid down for the government of vessels at sea, and which, though sometimes appearing to bear hardly in particular cases, the court was bound to see carried into effect as far as possible. With respect to those rules and regulations, the court was of opinion, as to all vessels that are at sea, sailing at sea, that those rules and regulations are intended—three of them—to comprehend vessels going which way they will. For instance, the 11th article is as to sailing vessels meeting end on, and the 12th as to two sailing ships which are crossing;

ADM.]

THE LLOYDS AND THE AMANDA v. THE HORTENSE.

and in the opinion of the court all vessels not meeting end on are vessels crossing, with the exception of those mentioned in the 17th article as overtaking any other vessel. It certainly was the intention of those who framed these regulations to provide for every possible case that could occur with respect to vessels meeting or coming across each other on the sea. The 11th article states that "if two sailing ships are meeting end on or nearly end on, so as to involve risk of collision, the helms of both shall be put to port, so that each may pass on the port side of the other." That was a positive rule, without making any exception whatsoever with regard to a starboard tack vessel; and those who framed these rules must have had before their eyes the case of starboard tack vessels. It was clearly the duty of one of the vessels in this case, being on the starboard tack, to port, unless she came within the 19th of these rules, which provided that "In obeying and construing these rules due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation, and due regard must also be had to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger." This 19th article was one of great importance, and it was necessary strictly to understand what it meant. Of course it was but wise and fit that regard should be had to all dangers of navigation. The words of the 19th article were, "that due regard is to be had to any special circumstance which may exist in any particular case, rendering a departure from the rules necessary in order to avoid" not danger, but "immediate danger," and the object in so framing the 19th rule, was to render as far as possible compulsory the observance of the rules. Of course it would be madness to say, where there was danger immediately impending of any kind, that vessels should observe any set rules whatever. Now, were these two vessels meeting end on, or were they not? If they were meeting end on, according to the statement of the Artemas, she did not do as she was bound to have done, because she did not alter her course at all, unless there were particular circumstances rendering a departure from the rule necessary for the sake of avoiding immediate danger. The Princessan Lovisa, according to her own preliminary statement, was steering S. half E., and was making about five or five and a half knots." The preliminary act of the Artemas states as follows: "The course of the Artemas was N. half W., and she was making about three and a half knots an hour." Were not these two directly opposite courses? It could not be permitted to either of the vessels to negative what they have stated in their preliminary acts. One preliminary act, may contradict the other, but must not contradict itself. The result is, that these two vessels, according to their statement, were both meeting straight forward, because the question put in the preliminary acts was, "What was the course and speed of the vessel when the other was first seen?" The pleading on behalf of the Princessan Lovisa set forth, that the "dim light of a vessel, the colour of which light was not distinguishable, was observed about a quarter of a mile distant, and, about one point on the port bow of the Princessan Lovisa." The statement on behalf of the Artemas in her pleading was, that "the green light of a vessel which afterwards proved to be that of the barque Princessan Lovisa, was seen at the distance of about a quarter of a mile, and bearing about two points on the starboard bow. The Artemas was kept on her course." According to the evidence, each vessel saw the other either one point or two-points on such and such particular bows; and on this evidence was it not clear that these vessels were meeting each other? If these vessels were meeting within the 11th article, then the question as to the Princessan Lovisa would be, whether she ported in time and sufficiently. But the other vessel must be to blame, inasmuch as, according to her own statement, she did nothing at all. If these vessels were crossing each other within the 12th rule, then it would appear clear according to the evidence, that the duty of porting in time belonged to the vessel going south. Whether she did so in time, and the collision was brought about by the starboarding of the vessel going north, was another and different question. Upon careful consideration of the evidence on both sides the court was of opinion that both vessels were to blame for the collision; that the case came within the 11th article, and that the Artemas was to blame for not having ported her helm. The court was also of opinion that the Princessan Lovisa vessel was to blame, it being her duty to have got out of the way, and that she did not adopt in time the proper measures to effect it.

THE LLOYDS AND THE AMANDA v. THE HORTENSE.(a)

Salvage—Multiplicity of suits—Costs.

Where two sets of salvors proceed by separate suits against the ship salvaged, and their respective claims might have been more conveniently prosecuted under one suit, the Court marks its disapproval of the two suits having been instituted by only giving the claimant under the second suit half costs.

The Queen's Advocate and Dr. Swabey appeared for the Lloyds.

O'Malley, Q. C. and Dr. Wambey for the Amanda and Deane, Q. C. and Potter for the owners of the Hortense.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case which came before the court on two separate suits, the one by the Norwegian brigantine Lloyds, and the other by the fishing-vessel Amanda, against the French vessel Hortense for a reward for salvage services rendered to the Hortense in Portland Road from the 24th to the 30th of last October. It appeared from the proceedings that the Hortense, ninety tons, while on a voyage with a cargo of wine from Bordeaux for Brussels, encountered very severe weather, and having been thereby rendered unseaworthy, was abandoned by the master and crew. The Lloyds, on her way from Looe for Porsgrund, in the last, when about thirty miles S. E. of Portland, the wind being west and moderate, fell in with the Hortense, which was then a wreck and bottom upward, her masts, sails and rigging being attached, the masts being broken off, but attached to her by the rigging. The Lloyds took the wreck in tow for Portland, and, after towing it for some hours, engaged the fishing-cutter Amanda to assist, whereupon an agreement was entered into to the following effect, between the captain of the Lloyds and the captain of the Amanda, viz., that the Amanda was to tow the wreck to Portland or at other harbour that might be thought fit; and the Amanda was to have one-third and the Lloyds two-thirds of the salvage. It was then represented that the vessels took the wreck in tow; but the Lloyds having had several of her ropes and hawsers broken in towing, it was deemed advisable that a steam-tug should be procured, which, being obtained in Por-proceeded to the wreck, took it in tow, with it in Weymouth Harbour on the he value of the property salvaged was 1275*l*. For the owners of the wreck it led that separate actions should not ought, as the interests of the salvors al, and that unnecessary expense had 1 occasioned, for which the parties hould be made responsible; that the which the salvors had entered their 000*l*., was far beyond what they might pect to recover; that they should have a smaller amount; and that a moderate d be sufficient for the assistance the received, the principal service having ed by the steam-tug, for which that en compensated. There was no doubt e Hortense was derelict, bottom up- state of imminent danger, and in such that it was hardly possible the cargo saved. The Norwegian vessel got f her, and had towed her for twelve the Amanda came up, and the agree- had been mentioned was entered into. regretted that an affidavit had been master of the Amanda to the effect that share equally, whereas the agreement he Amanda was to have one-third and o-thirds, and such agreement would been forgotten by the master of the s to the amount of the action, it was of so much importance in the present others, as it did not put the parties to pense; but where bail was required it of great consequence. It was stated da's petition that those on board her cing on her way for Portland Roads) turning the Hortense round, she being wreck and lying like a log in the water, ed her some distance, when, in conse- e wind having increased to a gale and y sea, and from the heavy sea on, was in considerable danger, which ason the Lloyds gave it up, and slipped from the Hortense. But r impossible the Amanda could have s so stated. The steam-tug was the vor, and it was impossible that the he Amanda could have performed the ssary to place the Hortense in safety, en for the steam-tug, and there was how that she was in safety when the rived. That, however, did not deprive of remuneration for contributing to f the property. The agreement must stablished, and the court would confirm l., according to it; to be allotted, 25*l*. the Amanda for fetching the tug; the g the amount of her loss, 25*l*. With e costs, the Lloyds is entitled to her's; e Amanda, looking how her case has ted, and how unnecessary the institu- econd suit was, and how much more tice of the case would have been admi- out one suit had been brought, the only be allowed half her costs.

THE RENOWN v. THE RATTLER. (a)

Collision—Ships' lights.

Where a steamer proceeding at a rapid rate comes into collision with a sailing ship, which collision might have been avoided had the steamer kept a good look-out, the fact of the sailing ship not having carried her light in the exact position directed by the regulation will not relieve the steamer from the liabilities of the collision.

Deane, Q. C. and E. C. Clarkson appeared for the Renown.

Brett, Q. C. and Vernon Lushington for the Rattler.

Dr. LUSHINGTON gave judgment in this case, which was an action brought by the barque Renown, 324 tons, from Trinidad, with a cargo of sugar and molasses, for Greenock, against the steam-tug Rattler, from Liverpool for Queenstown, to recover the loss resulting from a collision between them in the vicinity of the South Hack, in St. George's Channel, about two a.m. on the 14th May 1864. The barque stated the wind as S.W., and the weather as quite clear; the steam-tug represented the former as S.S.W., and the latter as dark and cloudy. The case for the Renown set forth that she was steaming N.N.E., the tide being about half-flood, running about two knots, exhibiting the Admiralty regulation lights, properly screened, and brightly burning, and she was making three and a half knots, when the white masthead light of the tug was observed by those on board the barque at the distance of at least five miles, and bearing about four points on her starboard bow; that the barque kept her course as required by law, and the steam-tug continued her course with all her lights then in view until she came within hail of the barque, whereupon those on board the barque, seeing her approaching very near hailed loudly to attract the attention of those on board the steam-tug; that immediately upon their so hailing, the helm of the tug was put hard a-port, and she ran right athwart hawse of the barque with her port side, knocking away the barque's cutwater, and carrying away her jibboom and all her head gear, and doing considerable damage. The Rattler, on whose part a cross-action was brought, pleaded that she was steering S. W. by W., making nine miles per hour, the tide being flood, and carrying her regulation lights, when the green light of a vessel was seen on her starboard bow, distant about a mile, which passed the Rattler to starboard, and shortly afterwards a vessel under sail, with no lights visible (which subsequently proved to be the Renown), was observed, distant apparently about 100 yards, nearly ahead, a little on the Rattler's port bow, that the helm of the Rattler was immediately put hard a-port, but a collision nevertheless ensued, the jibboom and cutwater of the Renown striking the port quarter of the Rattler; that the Rattler afterwards offered assistance, but it was not required, and the Renown proceeded on her course and the Rattler put back to Liverpool. It was further pleaded that before and at the time of the collision the Renown was not carrying her regulation side lights as required, so fixed as to throw the lights from right ahead to two points abaft the beam on the starboard and port sides respectively, and that the collision was thereby occasioned. The first point to dispose of was, were the lights of the Renown placed according to the directions contained in the regulations prescribed by statute? Supposing the lights were not fixed in the manner prescribed, the next question was, whether their having been differently fixed brought about and was contributory to the collision? It is clear that there were lights on board the Renown; that they were burning; and that, though there may have been a defect in the way in which they were placed, yet there they were. The third point is as to the conduct of the Rattler, who was going at the rate of 10½ knots an hour. Going at this rate, if a good look-out had been kept, she must have discovered the Renown sooner than she did, even if the Renown had had no lights at all. According to the evidence of the gentleman who comes from the Board of Trade, and who, we presume, acts in pursuance of directions he receives therefrom, we think that the lights of the Renown were not so placed as would be approved of by the Board of Trade; but we are also of opinion that the so placing of the lights did not contribute to this collision, but that, if there had been a good look-out on board the Rattler, the vessels were proceeding on such different courses that the Renown must and ought to have been seen in time to have been avoided by the Rattler. As to whether, without regard particularly to the lights, the Rattler was not to blame for the rate at which she was sailing, and for not keeping a good look-out, and whether, if she had kept a good look-out, she might not have seen the Renown, we are all of opinion that the Rattler was solely to blame, and therefore our finding must be against her.

THE PENINSULAR, &C. STEAM COMPANY v. SHAND.

The Court was assisted by Capt. Redman and Capt. Weller.

JUDICIAL COMMITTEE OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL.

Reported by JAMES PATERSON, Esq., of the Middle Temple, Barrister-at-Law.

Thursday, July 20, 1865.

THE PENINSULAR, &C. STEAM COMPANY v. SHAND.

Bailment—Carrier—Restrictions on liability—Liability for loss of passenger's luggage—Lex loci contractus.

S. paid one entire sum for his passage from England to the Mauritius by the ship of the P. Company, and signed a ticket purporting that he accepted the conditions printed thereon, one of which was, that the company would not be responsible for loss of the luggage of passengers. Some luggage was last seen at Suez, in the company's possession, but was not afterwards to be found. In an action by S. for the value of the lost luggage:

Held (reversing the judgment of the court of Mauritius), that the liability of the company was to be determined by the lex loci contractus, or English law, and not by the French law, and inasmuch as by English law a common carrier could restrict his liability by express contract, and it was so restricted, the company were not liable.

This was an appeal from a judgment of the Supreme Court of Mauritius, in an action by the resp. against the apps.

The plaint issued by the resp. set forth that the apps., being common carriers of goods for hire from Southampton to the Mauritius, the resp. and his family became first-class passengers from Southampton to Mauritius, together with their luggage, and that the resp. delivered to the apps., who received the same from the resp., a certain bale or package, consisting of articles belonging to the resp., viz., great coats, plaids, cloaks, shawls, and similar articles, well and firmly put up and bound together in one package, and legibly and properly addressed with the name of the resp. as passenger to Mauritius aforesaid, and to be safely conveyed by the apps. from Southampton to Mauritius, and to be delivered there to the resp. Yet the apps., not regarding their duty as common carriers, did not safely carry the said package from Southampton to Mauritius, nor deliver the same to the resp.; but, on the contrary, so negligently and carelessly conducted themselves, that by their negligence, carelessness, and default, the said package or bale and its contents were wholly lost to the resp., who thereby sustained damages to the amount of ninety pounds sterling.

The apps. appeared to the said action and disputed their liability to the said claim.

The apps. were an incorporated public company for the carriage of passengers and their baggage, and also merchandise and effects by sea, between Southampton and India, China, Australia, the island of Mauritius, and other parts beyond the seas, and have their head office or place of business in Leadenhall-street, London, and other offices and places of business at Bombay, Calcutta, the Mauritius, and other places abroad, and are common carriers of passengers and their luggage, and of goods and merchandise between the before-mentioned places and other places beyond the seas. The island of Mauritius is one of the termini of the apps.' lines of communication, their vessels bound there not going beyond that place. They carry Her Majesty's mails there, and have accredited agents there, Messrs Ireland, Fraser, and Co., by name.

The resp. having been appointed chief judge of the island of Mauritius, and being about to proceed there with his family in the month of July 1864, engaged with the apps., as such common carriers, to convey him, his wife, two children under ten years of age, and his European female servant, Elizabeth White, with their respective personal baggage and effects, from Southampton to the Mauritius, by the apps.' ordinary line of communication between those places, and paid the apps. at their head office in London the sum of 315*l.*, in exchange for which he received a printed ticket which he signed, and which contained the words, "I hereby accept this ticket subject to the conditions and regulations indorsed hereon."

Among the conditions indorsed on the ticket were the following:

Baggage.—The attention of passengers by the overland route to and from India, China, &c., is respectfully requested to the undernoted regulations in reference to baggage; much trouble and loss is occasionally caused by their neglect; and the Egyptian transit administration will not accept any responsibility unless they are strictly complied with:

All baggage should be addressed in paint, in full, and in addition passengers will be supplied on board the steamers with printed "destination labels," which should be affixed to all packages, however trifling, before arrival at Alexandria or Suez.

First-class passengers are allowed 336*lbs.* of personal baggage, free of freight, and children (over three and under ten years) and servants 168*lbs.* each.

The insurance of baggage can be effected on very moderate terms.

Passengers requiring information respecting their baggage during the voyage can obtain it by application to the officer in charge.

Passengers who may miss any package of baggage on arrival at their destination are recommended to apply, without delay, to the company's agent, giving full particulars in writing, when application will at once be made to the nearest baggage depôts at Bombay or Southampton.

Notice.—All parties are requested to take notice that the company do not hold themselves liable for detention or delay of passengers arising from accident or from extraordinary or unavoidable circumstances, or from circumstances arising out of, or connected with, the employment of the company's vessels in Her Majesty's mail service, and that the company do not hold themselves liable for damage to, or loss or detention of, passengers' baggage, or for any consequences arising from the restrictions of quarantine, wheresoever imposed.

Amongst the resp.'s baggage was a package con-

plaids, coats, cloaks, and shawls for the use of the resp. and his family, which being required for use on the voyage from Southampton to Alexandria, were suffered by the apprs. to remain in the custody of the resp.

The resp. and his family proceeded in the Ceylon to Alexandria. On reaching the bay of Alexandria, an officer in charge of baggage on board the ship took possession of all such of the baggage of the passengers on board as had been suffered to remain in possession during the voyage, and amongst the things of the resp.'s package of plaids, shawls, and cloaks, and took the same under their care and left nothing in the hands of the resp., other passengers, but a small bag sufficient to contain such articles as were absolutely necessary for a night or two at Cairo. At the time the resp. took possession of the resp.'s package of it was properly and sufficiently secured and had with two very full addresses upon it for the resp. The resp. was told by the company's (the officers on board the Ceylon when they took of the said package, that it should meet him on the other side," meaning at Suez, on the way. On the resp.'s arriving at Suez he and his family were put on board another of the apprs.' vessels, the Norna, which was to carry them to Mauritius (and which was lying at some distance from the shore), by means of a small vessel belonging to the apprs. employed for the purpose. The resp.'s servant Elizabeth White carried the bundle of coats, cloaks, &c., on board the steamer, and was about to take it on board when, when one of the stewards of that vessel refused not to do so, and that he would take charge of the package. The package was never seen by her or by the resp. or any of his family afterwards; Elizabeth White missed it the same evening, when on board the steamer, and on making inquiries was told she got it in the morning. On that morning the steward said that he had taken it on board the Norna.

Various excuses for the absence of the package were made by the officers and stewards of that vessel, by whom the resp. was told that it had got to the bottom of the ship's hold and was all safe, and that the resp. would get it on arriving at the Mauritius. On the arrival of the ship there, however, it was not to be found. Upon his arrival there informed the apprs. in the Mauritius, Messrs. Ireland, Fraser, &c., of his loss, and also wrote to the purser of the ship, and subsequently demanded compensation for his loss, but the resp. could obtain no satisfaction from them, or from the apprs., beyond an acknowledgement that the package in question must have been lost, and a statement that the apprs. were not in case of the loss of passengers' baggage insured.

There was no controversy at the trial of the action as to the facts above stated. The defendants called no witnesses, and suggested no want of contributory negligence on the part of the resp. or his family, or servant.

The Court of Mauritius gave judgment for the resp., whereupon the present appeal was brought to Her Majesty in Council.

Wright, Q. C. and W. Williams (with them Bovill, Q. C.), for the apprs., contended that the contract was construed according to the law of the place where it was made, which was England:

Wright v. Carter, 5 Cl. & F. 1;

Wright v. Carter, 33 L. J. 241, Q. B.;

Hinton v. Bland, 2 Barr. 1127;

At v. Pilkington, 2 B. & S. 11.

The law of England the carrier could, at common law, strict his liability by express contract:

Wright v. Pickford, 8 M. & W. 443;

Hinton v. Bland, 2 Q. B. 646;

Shaw v. York and North Midland Railway Company, 13 Q. B. 347;

Austin v. Manchester, &c. Railway Company, 16 Q. B. 600;

Carr v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway Company, 7 Ex. 704;

Wise v. Great Western Railway Company, 1 H. & N. 63;

Peck v. North Staffordshire Railway Company, 1 E. D. & E. 937; 1 L. T. Rep. N. S. 407; 8 L. T. Rep. N. S. 768.

The apprs., having restricted their liability by means of the printed conditions, were not liable.

The Lord Advocate and Cates (with them Anderson, Q. C. and Coleridge, Q. C.), for the resp., contended that the law of the place of performance, and not of the place of the making of the contract, must govern the question of liability:

Sory Conf. 270;

Barge Com. 765;

Cruik v. Long, 16 C. D. N. S. 73; 9 L. T. Rep. N. S. 721. Even by the law of England the apprs. were liable, for common carriers could not, by indorsing printed conditions on the ticket, exempt themselves from the liability inseparable from their contract:

Phillips v. Clark, 26 L. J. 168, C. P.;

Lloyd v. General Iron Company, 35 L. J. 203, Ex.; 10 L. T. Rep. N. S. 266;

Riley v. Horns, 5 Bing. 223.

The presumption arising from the loss of goods last seen in the possession of the company is, that the negligence of the company was the cause of the loss:

Rees v. Palmer, 5 C. D. N. S. 84.

Cur. adv. ult.

LORD JUSTICE TURNER.—This is an appeal against a judgment of the Supreme Court of Mauritius in favour of the resp. who sued the apprs. for damages occasioned by their non-delivery at Mauritius of certain articles of baggage. The facts of the case appear to be that the resp., the Chief Justice of the court below, intending to proceed to the Mauritius with his family, took and paid for a ticket for the passage from Southampton to Alexandria, and from Suez to Mauritius, for which he paid one entire sum of $151; in the body of the ticket the engagement of the apprs. was stated to be subject to the conditions and regulations indorsed, and on its face, at the foot of it, the resp. signed his acceptance in the following form—"I hereby accept this ticket, subject to the conditions and regulations indorsed thereon." Numerous regulations both as to the passengers and as to their baggage were indorsed, and at the close of all was a notice commencing thus, "All parties are requested to take notice," and containing among other things the following clause, "that the company do not hold themselves liable for damage to or loss or detention of passengers' baggage." By the ticket it appeared that the voyage from Southampton to Alexandria was to be on board the Ceylon, and from Suez to Mauritius on board the Norna; nothing, however, turns on this nor on the land carriage between Alexandria and Suez, although in the argument for the resp. some reliance was placed on the fact that the apprs. during this last transit took exclusive possession and charge of the passengers' baggage, with some trifling exceptions of articles required for immediate personal use. At Suez the Norna was lying a little distance out at sea, in consequence of the shallowness of the water, the passengers were conveyed to her in a small steamboat, the Bay, &c. in another vessel. It was on board this small steamer that, according to the evidence, the parcel in question was last seen. It consisted of cloaks, an overcoat and plaids—articles which probably had been retained for personal use. When last seen,

[Priv. Co.]

THE PENINSULAR, & C. STEAM COMPANY v. SHAND.

[Priv. Co.]

however, it was in the possession and custody of one of the servants of the apps. The resp.'s female servant would have herself taken it on board the Norna, but the servant of the apps. told her not to do so, for that he would take charge of it. Whether it reached the Norna is uncertain. It was missed by the resp. when on board that vessel, and on the arrival at Mauritius it was not forthcoming. Upon these facts the court below held that the law by which the case was to be tried was the French law, which prevails generally at Mauritius, and that by that law the apps. were liable. In the argument before their Lordships the latter proposition was not seriously disputed, but it was contended that the court below should have tried the case by the rules of English law, and that according to those rules the apps. were protected under the circumstances of the case by the terms of their contract with the resp. On his part, however, it was argued that even if the court below were wrong as to the rule it had governed itself by, yet the judgment was right even upon the principles of English law. The case was ably and learnedly argued, and a very large number of authorities were cited for the resp.; the conclusion, however, at which their Lordships have arrived is, that the apps. are right in both of their propositions, and consequently that the judgment below cannot be supported. In stating the grounds upon which their Lordships have arrived at this conclusion, it will not be necessary to review or distinguish between all the authorities cited in the argument; every one who is but moderately familiar with the text-books and decisions must know how easy it is to produce authorities on either side, when the question is by what law to interpret a contract in one country, and to be performed, wholly or partly, in another; but if these be carefully examined, it will be found, after all, that the same general principles have, for the most part, prevailed throughout, and that, where the conclusions vary, they do so from distinctions more or less minute in the facts. The general rule is, that the law of the country where a contract is made governs as to the nature, the obligation and interpretation of it. The parties to a contract are either the subjects of the power there ruling, or as temporary residents owe it a temporary allegiance: in either case equally they must be understood to submit to the law there prevailing, and to agree to its action upon their contract. It is, of course, immaterial that such agreement is not expressed in terms; it is equally an agreement in fact, presumed de jure, and a foreign court interpreting or enforcing it on any contrary rule defeats the intention of the parties, as well as neglects to observe the recognised comity of nations. Their Lordships are speaking of the general rule; there are, no doubt, exceptions and limitations on its applicability, but the present case is not affected by these, and seems perfectly clear as to the actual intention of the contracting parties. This is a contract made between British subjects in England, substantially for safe carriage from Southampton to Mauritius. The performance is to commence in an English vessel, in an English port; to be continued in vessels which for this purpose carry their country with them; to be fully completed in Mauritius; but liable to breach, partial or entire, in several other countries in which the vessels might be in the course of the voyage. Into this contract, which the apps. frame and issue, they have introduced for their own protection a stipulation, professing in its terms to limit the liability which, according to the English law, the contract would otherwise have cast upon them. When they tendered this contract to the resp., and required his signature to it, what must it be presumed that he understood to be their intention as to this stipulation? What would any reasonable man have understood that they intended? Was it to secure to themselves some real protection against responsibility for accidental losses of luggage and for damage to it; or to stipulate for something to which, however clearly expressed, the law would allow no validity? This question leaves untouched, it will be observed, the extent of the contemplated protection; it asks, in effect, Was it intended that the stipulation in case of an alleged breach of contract should be construed by the rules of the English law, which would give some effect to it? or by those of the French or any other law, according to which it would have none, but be treated as a merely fruitless attempt to evade a responsibility, inseparably fixed upon the apps. as carriers? The question appears to their Lordships to admit of one answer only; but if they take the resp. so to have understood the intention of the apps., they must take him to have adopted the same intention: it would be to impute want of good faith on his part to suppose that with that knowledge he yet intended to enter into a contract wholly different in so important an article; he could not have done this if the intention had been expressed, and there is no difference as to effect between that which is expressed in terms and that which is implied and clearly understood. The actual intention of the parties therefore must be taken clearly to have been to treat this as an English contract, to be interpreted according to the rules of English law; and as there is no rule of general law or policy setting up a contrary presumption, their Lordships will hold that the court below was wrong in not governing itself according to those rules. It is a satisfaction to their Lordships to find that in the year 1864 the Cour de Cassation in France pronounced a judgment to the same effect in a case under precisely the same circumstances, which arose between the apps. and a French officer who was returning with his baggage from Hong Kong in one of their ships, the Alma, and who lost his baggage in the wreck of that vessel in the Red Sea. The same question arose as here on the effect to be given to the stipulation in the ticket; two inferior courts, those of Marseilles and Aix, decided it in favour of the plt. on the provisions of the French law; the Supreme Court reversed these decisions, and held that the contract having been made at Hong Kong, an English possession, and with an English company, was to receive its interpretation and effect according to English law. Still, as has been already intimated, there remains the question what, according to English law, is the extent of the limitation imposed by the stipulation in the ticket on the responsibility of the apps. This is next to be considered. The case depends on the common law; it is not within either the Carriers Act of 11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 68, or the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 17 & 18 Viet. c. 31. It seems now incontestible that at common law it is open to carriers to limit their common-law liability by special agreement with the consignors of goods; and this, according to some decisions, even to the extent of relieving themselves from the consequences of their own negligence. The contract here is that the apps. shall not be responsible "for damage to, or loss or detention of passengers' luggage," and the question is, what is the meaning to be given to the word "loss?" Nothing can be more general than the words used by the parties. They do not enter into any distinctions as to how the damage, loss, or detention may have been occasioned, whether by pure accident, or through the negligence, or even misconduct, of the apps. But the facts of this case make it unnecessary to consider whether, reasonably understood, they express an intention to protect the apps. against answering for gross negligence or misconduct. Upon this their Lordships' opinion whatever. The missing baggage was in its transit from the shore at Suez to us, in which it should have been conveyed thus: it was then in the keeping of the one of their servants. Their Lordships' circumstance that this servant insisted on his keeping, and refused it to the resp.'s raises no inference against the appra. Ordinarily, it is a regulation prudent and consistent that the company's servants, and not the messengers, should have throughout the of the baggage on board. It does not say anything was done but in obedience to regulation: at all events no inference of want of honesty is raised by this circumstance. Whether this, or when or where, the baggage was lost, there is no evidence to show. It is difficult to say what loss would be protected or not, or what meaning could be reason-ably attached to the word "loss" which would exclude a non-arrival of the baggage as this contract to be construed on the general principle on which the construction of contracts is determined. It would be a strange construction, and against common sense, when the appraiser used the simple word "loss," to hold it intended to limit its meaning to such cases as those in which the carriers should be able to clear them from all blame whatever. It must be seen that this at least is not the construction which the parties have entered, yet this is the contention for the resp. Their Lordships have no doubt, on the whole, that the loss falls within the true meaning of the stipulation that the appraiser is thereby protected from liability for it. They will, therefore, recommend to Her Majesty that the judgment be reversed, with the costs in the court of this appeal.

shipping—Register tonnage—Ships requiring engine power—Allowance for engine-room—Power of Commissioners of Customs to frame new tonnage Rules ultra vires—Merchant Shipping Act 7 & 18 Vict. c. 104), ss. 23, 29.

The Merchant Shipping Act 1854 enacts that, among the register tonnages of ships requiring engine power, allowance shall be made for engine-room, and it divides such ships into two classes, assigning certain allowances for each class and lays down rules for the measurement of the engine-room. Section 29 entitles the Commissioners of Customs, by sanction of the Treasury, from time to time to and alter the "tonnage rules" prescribed by the Act.

The Commissioners of Customs did, in fact, by sanction of the Treasury, in 1860, issue new rules, which abolished the distinction between classes of vessels, and laid down new uniform rules for the measurement of the engine-room in all ships, thus abolishing the distinction between the classes of vessels, or the allowances to be made to each class, but they altered the tonnage rules respecting the mode of measuring the space actually occupied by the engine-room.

Special case stated by consent without pleadings. The plaintiffs are a company trading between England and Ireland, and are possessed of many steam-vessels of large tonnage, which are used by them in their trade of carrying passengers and goods to and from England and Ireland.

The defendant is one of the surveyors of customs at the port of Liverpool, and represents the Commissioners of Customs, with whom the present question has arisen.

The question in dispute arises upon the construction of certain provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, which regulate the mode of ascertaining the register tonnage of steamships, and as to the power of commissioners of customs to refuse the allowance of propelling power, which, as the plaintiffs insist, is provided for by the Act of Parliament as hereinafter mentioned.

By the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 104) s. 23, it is enacted as follows:

In every ship propelled by steam or other power requiring engine room, an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship ascertained as aforesaid, and the remainder shall be deemed to be the registered tonnage of such ship, and such deduction shall be estimated as follows (that is to say):

(a) As regards ships propelled by paddle-wheels, in which the tonnage of the space solely occupied by and necessary for the proper working of the boilers and machinery is above 20 per cent. and under 30 per cent. of the gross tonnage of the ship, such deduction shall be thirty-seven one-hundredths of such gross tonnage, and in ships propelled by screws, in which the tonnage of such space is above 13 per cent. and under 20 per cent. of such gross tonnage, such deduction shall be thirty-two one-hundredths of such gross tonnage.

(b) As regards all other ships, the deductions shall, if the commissioners of customs and the owner both agree thereto, be estimated in the same manner, but either they or he may, in their or his discretion, require the space to be measured and the deductions estimated accordingly, and whenever such measurement is so required, the deduction shall consist of the tonnage of the space actually occupied by, or required to be inclosed for the proper working of the boilers and machinery, with the addition in the case of ships propelled by paddle-wheels of one-half, and in the case of ships propelled by screws of three-fourths of the tonnage of such space, and the measurement and use of such space shall be governed by the following rules (that is to say):

(1) Measure the mean depth of the space from its crown to the ceiling at the timber strike, measure also three or, if necessary, more than three breadths of this space at the middle of its depth, taking one of such measurements at each end and another at the middle of the length, take the mean of such breadths, measure also the mean length of the space between the foremast and aftermost bulkheads or limits of its length, excluding such parts (if any) as are not actually occupied or required for the proper working of the machinery, multiply together these three dimensions of length, breadth, and depth, and the product will be the cubical contents of the space below the crown, then find the cubical contents of the space or spaces (if any) above the crown aforesaid, which are framed in for the machinery or for the admission of light and air, by multiplying together the length, depth, and breadth thereof, and add such contents to the cubical contents of the space below the crown, divide the sum by 100, and the result shall be deemed to be the tonnage of the said space.

(2) If in any ship in which the space aforesaid is to be measured the engines and boilers are fitted in separate compartments, the contents of each shall be measured severally in like manner according to the above rules, and the sum of their several results shall be deemed to be the tonnage of the said space.

(3) In the case of screw steamers in which the space aforesaid is to be measured, the contents of the shaft-trunk shall be added to and deemed to form part of such space and shall be ascertained by multiplying together the mean length, breadth, and depth of the trunk, and dividing the product by 100.

(4) If, in any ship in which the space aforesaid is to be measured, any alteration be made in the length or capacity of such space, or if any other alteration be made in such space, such ship shall be deemed to be a ship not registered until re-measured.

These rules were laid down by the commissioners of customs, and that they had no power to abo-

- (c) If, in any ship in which the space measured is to be measured, any goods or stores are stowed or carried in such space, the master and owners shall each be liable to a penalty not exceeding 100*l*.

By the 29th section of the same Act it is further enacted as follows:

The Commissioners of Customs may, with the sanction of the Treasury, appoint such persons to superintend the survey and admeasurement of ships as they think fit; and may, with the approval of the Board of Trade, make such regulations for that purpose as may be necessary; and also, with the like approval, make such modifications and alterations as from time to time become necessary in the tonnage rules hereby prescribed, in order to the more accurate and uniform application thereof, and the effectual carrying out of the principle of admeasurement therein adopted.

There are several other sections of the Act which have some bearing on this question, and to which it may be useful to refer, viz., sects. 20, 21, 84, 86, and 87. On the 23rd Oct. 1860 the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, issued the following rules:

In pursuance of the powers granted by the 29th section of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the Board, with the approval of the Board of Trade, direct, with a view to the more accurate and uniform application of the principle of granting a certain allowance to steamers for their propelling powers, that, in lieu of the rules set forth in sect. 23 of the Merchant Shipping Act, and in paragraphs 4, 5, 6, 13, and 20 of instructions to measuring surveyors of 1855, the following rules be adopted in future, viz.: (Rule) In every ship propelled by steam or other power requiring engine-room, an allowance of space or tonnage shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power; and the amount so allowed shall be deducted from the gross tonnage of the ship, and such deduction shall be estimated as follows:

- (1) Measure the mean length of the engine-room between the foremost and aftermost bulkheads, or limits of its length, excluding such parts, if any, as are not actually occupied by or required for the proper working of the machinery; then measure the depth of the ship at the middle point of this length from the ceiling at the timber strake to the upper deck in ships of three decks, and under and to the third deck or deck above the tonnage deck in all other ships; also the inside breadth of the ship, clear of spousing (if any) at the middle of the depth; multiply together these dimensions of length, breadth, and depth for the cubical contents; divide this product by 100, and the quotient shall be deemed to be the tonnage of the engine-room, or allowance to be deducted from the gross tonnage on account of the propelling power.
- (2) In the case of ships having more than three decks, the tonnage of the space or spaces betwixt decks (if any) above the third deck, which are framed in for the machinery, or for the admission of light and air, found by multiplying together the length, breadth, and depth thereof, and dividing the product by 100, shall be added to the tonnage of such space.
- (3) In the case of screw steamers the tonnage of the shaft-trunk shall be deemed to form part of and be added to such space, and shall be ascertained by multiplying together the length, breadth, and depth of the trunk, and dividing the product by 100.
- (4) In any ship in which the machinery may be fitted in separate compartments, the tonnage of each such compartment shall be measured severally in like manner, according to the above rules, and the sum of their results shall be deemed to be the tonnage of the said space.

Ordered, that the proper officers in London, and the collectors and comptrollers at the outports, do govern themselves accordingly in all future operations for estimating the allowance to steamers for their propelling powers; and with regard to the engine-rooms, or allowance to the steamers already measured, that they be remeasured agreeably to the above modification of the rule on the application of their owners or agents, and on delivery of the original certificate for enforcement.

At the time of the passing of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, the plts. were and still are possessed of (amongst other ships) the paddle-wheel steamer St. Columba. Her tonnage space, solely occupied by and necessary for the proper working of the boilers and machinery, was and is above 30 per cent. of her gross tonnage.

After the passing of the said Act the plts. applied, in accordance with the provisions thereof, to have the said ship measured, and the vessel was accordingly measured by the proper officer, and a deduction for the space occupied by the propelling power was allowed according to clause (b) of the 23rd section of the Act, including the addition of one-half the tonnage of the space of the propelling power. Her register tonnage for dues was then ascertained and fixed at 206 tons, and her tonnage was accordingly so entered in the registry of shipping in the port of Dublin.

In 1862 the plts. lengthened the said ship St. Columba by adding to her length forty feet, and as this increased her tonnage it became necessary, in accordance with the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, to have her remeasured, and she was accordingly remeasured by the proper officer for the purpose in the port of Liverpool, where the alterations in her were being made, and without any application being made by the plts. The tonnage space solely occupied by the propelling power was then above 30 per cent. of her tonnage, as before mentioned.

On this remeasurement the gross tonnage of the ship was increased by 122 tons. The officers who conducted the measurement measured her according to the directions contained in the new Customs rules of Oct. 23, 1860. They allowed only the exact space occupied by or required to be inclosed for the proper working of the boilers and machinery, and declined to allow the one-half the tonnage of the said space, as directed by the 23rd section of the said Act. By this mode of measurement the tonnage for dues was increased to 456 tons. The plts. objected to this mode of measuring and making the allowance for the propelling power, and required to have the allowance made according to their views of the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and insisted that the Commissioners of Customs had no power to refuse such allowance.

The question for the opinion of the court is, whether the additional allowance of one-half the tonnage of the space occupied by the propelling power ought, or not, to have been made by the officers of registry at Liverpool.

Bovill, Q.C. (Watkin Williams with him), for the plts., relied on sect. 23 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, and contended that by clause (b) of that section in the calculation of the tonnage space of the vessel, the plts. ought to have been allowed the additional deduction of one-half the tonnage of the engine and boiler space, and that the Commissioners of Customs had no power by any rules or regulations to repeal or alter the express provision in the statute for such allowance.

The Solicitor-General (Giffard, Q.C. and C. Pollock with him), for the deft. (and in reality for the Board of Trade), contended that the Commissioners of Customs, with the approval of the Board of Trade, were empowered by the Merchant Shipping Act 1854, s. 29, to alter the rule laid down in sect. 23 of that Act, and that they were justified in altering it, as it had been found to work inaccurately and unequally, and to violate the principle of allowance prescribed by that Act, viz., the space occupied by the propelling power. Their argument is sufficiently detailed in the judgment of the court.

In answer to a question of Willes, J., it was stated that the timber-strake was the space between the keelson and the side of the ship.

Curr. adv. vel.

July 10.—KEATING, J. delivered the judgment of the court (Willes, Byles, and Keating, JJ.)—In this case a steamship, belonging to the plts., called the St. Columba (paddle-wheel), at the passing of the 17 & 18 Viet. c. 104 (the Merchant Shipping Act), had been measured under the provisions of the 23rd section of that statute, and its register tonnage ascertained in the mode pointed out thereby. An increase, however, in the length of the ship in 1862, by augmenting her tonnage rendered a fresh cessary, and she was accordingly remeasured to the directions contained in the new Custom rules of 23rd Oct. 1860, framed by the Commissioners of Customs, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, the application of which to the ship increased the register tonnage at which would have resulted from a measurement under the former system. To this the defendant contended that the new rules of the Commissioners of Customs were inconsistent with the provisions of the Act of 1860, and the question for the court is, whether they are right in that contention, and whether they are. The 23rd section of the Merchant Shipping Act provides that, in every ship propelled

"an allowance shall be made for the space occupied by the propelling power, and not so allowed shall be deducted from the measurement of the ship . . . and such deduction shall be estimated as follows: as regards ships propelled by paddle-wheels in which the tonnage is occupied by and necessary for the propulsion of the boilers and machinery is above 20 per cent. and under 30 per cent. of the gross tonnage of the ship, such deduction shall be thirty-hundredths of such gross tonnage; and in ships propelled by screws in which the tonnage occupied is above 13 per cent. and under 20 per cent. of such gross tonnage, such deduction shall be thirty-two one-hundredths of such gross tonnage."

In all other ships where there is no agreement between the commissioners and the owners, the measurement shall consist of the actual space occupied by the machinery, &c., with the addition in the case of paddle-wheels of one-half, and in the case of screw ships of three-fourths of the tonnage of such machinery, as measured by the following rules; and the five rules for measuring the space occupied by the machinery, &c., are given in the 23rd section of the Act. The Commissioners, with the sanction of the Board of Trade, to make such modifications in the measurement of the tonnage as may be necessary in "order to the more uniform application thereof, and to carry out of the principles of measurement therein adopted." It was contended that the new rules referred to in the Act, and those rules in effect repeal the provisions of the 23rd section of the statute as to all distinctions between different classes and kinds of steamships referred to, as well as the different deductions appropriated to each class, and substitutes a uniform allowance for all classes of steamships, together with a new mode of ascertaining measurement such allowance. The Solicitor, for the defendant, contended that the provisions of the statute establishing the distinctions between different classes and kinds of steamships were not enactments properly so called, but were only regulations, the alteration of which by the Commissioners came within the express powers conferred upon them by sect. 29, and that, sect. 23 was subdivided into several rules, the first was itself a tonnage rule, and so within the powers of the Commissioners, and he referred to the mode in which the new rules were designated in the margin of the Act as a support of his views. On the other side it was insisted that the tonnage rules in sect. 29 of the Act were the same as such in the different sections of the statute, and which regulate the measurement and nothing more; so that the effect of any deductions from the gross tonnage was clearly an enactment than the direction of the Commissioners should be estimated according to the differences in the classes of vessels referred to in the section, whilst the mode of measuring the spaces according to such classification is expressly governed by the five rules set out at the end of the section, nor could the statements in the margin control or affect the terms of the enactment. We think this the correct view of the statute, and that it was not the intention of the Legislature to give to the commissioners the powers contended for by the defendant. Whether the new rules so framed would or would not be beneficial to the mercantile marine of the country, is a question which, although mooted at the bar, we do not inquire into. The rules themselves being, in our opinion, ultra vires, our judgment will be for the plaintiff.

TAMVACO v. SIMPSON.

Ship and shipping—Charter-party—Freight—Advances on freight—Lien—Court of competent jurisdiction—Estoppel.

A charter-party contained a clause, that freight should be paid "on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less advances in cash at current rate of exchange; one half of the freight to be advanced by freighter's acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading." The charterer gave his acceptance accordingly, and received from the purchaser of the cargo the agreed price of the cargo, less the amount of freight remaining to be paid to the captain on delivery at Alexandria, the port of discharge. Before the acceptance became due, and before the vessel arrived at Alexandria, the charterer became insolvent, and executed an insolvency deed. The captain, having heard of the insolvency, refused to give up the cargo without payment of the whole freight, which was ultimately guaranteed by persons at Alexandria, at the request of the purchaser of the cargo. The captain sued these persons in the Consular Court of Alexandria, and they, by the authority of the purchaser of the cargo, paid him the whole amount of the freight. The charterer's acceptance came to maturity after the captain had obtained the guarantee for payment of the whole freight, and was dishonoured.

Held, first, that the purchaser of the cargo was entitled to receive it, on payment of half the freight:

Held, secondly, that the proceedings in the Consular Court did not debar him from recovering in this court the amount paid to the captain in excess of what he was entitled to demand.

Special case stated by consent and by order of Willes, J.

The plaintiff is a merchant, residing at Alexandria, in Egypt; the defendant is a shipowner, residing at Sunderland, and is possessed of a vessel called the Purthian.

On the 1st Sept. 1863 Messrs. Zisania and Co., of London, as agents for the plaintiff, entered into a contract with Mr. De Mattos, also of London, for the purchase of 2000 tons of steam coal. The following is a copy of the written agreement:

Memorandum of agreement between Mr. William Nicholas De Mattos, and Messrs. Zisania and Co.

Mr. William Nicholas De Mattos agrees to supply Messrs. Zisania with 2000 tons of best Davidson's West Hartley large seam coals, screened, and with usual certificates, say 10 per cent. more or less, the bills of lading for the entire quantity to be delivered to the purchasers by the end of the present month in two or more shipments. Messrs. Zisania agree to pay on receipt of the documents (bill of lading and policy of insurance), at the rate of thirty-four shillings per ton of twenty hundredweight, deducting the balance of freight payable to the captain at Alexandria, together with a commission of 3 per cent. upon the full thirty-four shillings per ton, said balance to be paid in cash at Alexandria, at the current rate of exchange for three months' bill on London.

risk and expense, at the rate of not less than thirty tons per weather-working day, Sundays excepted. In the event of Mr. De Mattos neglecting to supply tonnage in the specified time, Messrs. Zizania are at liberty to charter ships for the coal quantity at current rates for the owner's account.—London, 1st Sept. 1864.

Witness, &c.,

(Signed)

W. N. De Mattos,
Zizania and Co.

In pursuance of the aforesaid contract, De Mattos chartered certain vessels for the conveyance of the coals, and amongst others, he entered into the following charter-party of the Parthian with the deft.

Charter-party.

London, Oct. 1, 1863.

It is this day mutually agreed between Mrs. Simpson, owner of the good ship or vessel called the Parthian, A 1, and master of the bottom of 204 tons register or thereabouts, now in Havre, or on passage thence, from Queenstown, and W. N. De Mattos, Esq., of London, merchant, that the said ship, being tight, staunch, and every way fitted for the voyage, shall, with all possible dispatch, after discharging present cargo at Havre, sail and proceed to South Sea, Sunderland, and there land in the customary manner from the factors of the said freighter a full and complete cargo of steam coals, to be loaded in regular turn, not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry over and above her tackle, apparel, provisions, and furniture, and being so loaded, shall therewith proceed to Alexandria, or so near thereto as she may safely get, and there deliver the same, on being paid freight at and after the rate of 30l. 2s. 6d. (three pounds ten shillings and sixpence) per ton of twenty-one tons four hundred weight, taken on board and delivered, in full of all port charges and pilotage, harbour dues, cargo, dower and Kamagata dues, and pier and light dues, the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other damages and accidents of the sea, rivers, and navigation, of what nature and kind soever during the said voyage, always excepted. The cargo to be delivered at a wharf, wharf, railway or other safe wharf, steamer, or floating depot, and to be discharged by the ship over the ship's side as customary, and no part of the cargo to be used during the voyage, or to be retained for ballast. Coals for the ship's use to be provided at the expense of the owners, and the quantity to be stated on bills of lading. The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of the cargo, less advances in cash at current rate of exchange, one-half of the freight to be advanced by freighters' acceptance at three months on signing bills of lading. Owner to insure the amount, and deposit with charterer the club policy, and to guarantee the same. On working day per keel and a-half, weather permitting, to be allowed the said merchant (if the ship is not sooner dispatched) for unloading the said ship at the port of discharge, Sundays and holidays excepted, and ten days on demurrage over and above the said lying days, at 5l. per day. The ship to be addressed to freighters' agents at port of discharge, paying usual commission of 2 per cent. The brokerage of 2l. per cent, upon this charter-party is due to Smith, Rendles, and Co., ship lost or not lost. The ship and her freight are bound to this venture. All claims for average to be settled in London, in conformity with the rules of Lloyd's. Penalty for nonperformance of this agreement, 100l.

For Mrs. Simpson, by authority of W. Dawson,

SMITH, RENDLES, and Co., as agents.
W. N. De Mattos.

In accordance with this charter-party Mr. De Mattos shipped on board the Parthian 420 tons 13 cwt of steam coal, being part of the 2000 tons already mentioned. The captain thereupon signed a bill of lading, of which the following is a copy:

Shipped in good order and well conditioned by W. N. De Mattos, in and upon the good ship called the Parthian, whereof I am master for this present voyage, W. Simpson, and now riding at anchor in the port of Sunderland, and bound for Alexandria, 11 cwt. of Davidson's West Hartley large steam coals, which are to be delivered in like good order and condition alongside any craft, steamer, floating depot, wharf, or pier, where the ship can be moved at the aforesaid port of Alexandria, as agent of the charterer may direct (the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the sea, rivers, and navigation of whatever nature and kind soever excepted), unto order or his assigns. The ship to be discharged at the rate of not less than 31½ tons per working day (weather permitting), and when required by the freighter's agent, such extra quantity as may be practicable; and if not discharged in the time above specified, demurrage to be paid at the rate of 5l. per day. Freight for the said goods, to be paid as per charter-party with average accustomed. In witness whereof the master or purser of the said ship hath affixed to four bills of lading, all of this tenor and date, the use of which bills being accomplished the others to stand void. Dated in Newcastle, 5th Oct. 1864. Three tons of coal for ship's use besides above. Weight unknown to W. Simpson.

The freight on the coals so shipped on board the Parthian amounted, at the rate of 30l. per keel reserved by the charter-party, to 608l. 18s., one-half of which sum was 304l. 9s. 6d.

Upon the bill of lading being so signed as aforesaid, Mr. De Mattos, the charterer, gave his acceptance at three months for 304l. 9s. 6d. in favour of the deft. pursuant to the terms of the charter-party.

The said acceptance was dated the 31st Oct. 1863, and became due the 3rd Feb. 1864. Upon its being given the deft.'s agents, Messrs. Smith, Rendles, and Co. informed a receipt on the bill of lading, of which the following is a copy:

Received, on account of the within freight, three hundred and one pounds seven shillings and sixpence, as per charter-party.—304l. 9s. 6d.

For Mrs. Mary Simpson,
SMITH, RENDLES, and Co. as agents.

Mr. De Mattos then made out and delivered to the plt.'s agent an invoice showing what was due for coals shipped by the Parthian, of which the following is a copy:

For W. N. De Mattos,
C. A. HARRIS, 31/10/64.

On the 28th Oct. 1863 Mr. De Mattos indorsed the bill of lading in blank and handed it so indorsed to Messrs. Zizania and Co., the plt.'s agents, who on the 31st Oct. paid to De Mattos the balance of 196l. 8s. 5d., appearing due on the aforesaid invoice. Messrs. Zizania and Co. afterwards forwarded the bill of lading so indorsed by De Mattos to the plt. at Alexandria. The deft. was not informed, nor had he any knowledge at any time before the commencement of this action of the said contract between the plt.'s agents and Mr. De Mattos of the 1st Sept. 1863, or of the said invoice, or of the payment of the balance appearing due thereon, or of any dealings or transactions between the plt. and his agents and Mr. De Mattos relating to the Parthian.

The said ship sailed with her said cargo from Sunderland for Alexandria on 4th Nov. 1863, and shortly after she so sailed De Mattos declared himself insolvent, and ultimately on 4th Jan. 1864 a deed of insolvency was executed by him and divers of his creditors, not including either the plt. or the deft., under the 192nd section of the B. A. 1861, but without the written assent or approval of the plt. or the deft. This deed was registered in accordance with the provisions of the said 192nd section, on the 1st Feb. 1864, and for the purpose of this case it was to be assumed that all the conditions required by that Act to make the deed as valid against all the creditors of the said charterer as if they were parties to and had executed the same, were duly performed at the time of registration. The provisions of the deed as set out in Strick v. De Mattos, 3 H. & C. 23; 10 L. J. Rep. N. 8. 590, and were to be taken as part of the case.

The Parthian sailed for Alexandria and arrived there on the 6th Jan. 1864, on which day the captain of the ship reported her arrival to the plt. and stated that he would on the following day (the 6th) be ready to discharge the cargo.

C. P.]

TAMVACO v. SIMPSON.

The plt. then, being the holder of the bill of lading as indorsee as aforesaid, took all necessary measures for receiving the cargo, and intimated to the captain that he was prepared to pay the balance of the freight remaining unpaid, after deducting the 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.* referred to in the receipt on the bill of lading. On the following day (the 6th) the captain, who by letters received by him on his arrival at Alexandria had learnt that De Mattos had suspended payment, refused to deliver the cargo to the plt. except upon the terms of being paid the full amount of the freight without any deduction, or of having a guarantee for the payment of the same.

The master of the ship thereupon claimed a lien on the cargo for the payment of the full chartered freight, and detained it in exercise of such alleged lien on board the ship until the 20th Jan., the plt. during all that time refusing to make such payment, or procure a guarantee for the payment of the full chartered freight.

Mr. De Mattos' acceptance was not due till the 3rd Feb. 1864, and therefore was not due at the time when the captain refused to deliver the coals to the plt. The acceptance was at this time in the hands of third parties, and was not paid at maturity, but was taken up by the deft. before the commencement of this action.

Upon the 20th Jan. 1864, Messrs. Barker, of Alexandria, at the request of the plt., and to procure delivery of the cargo to the plt., gave the master of the Parthian the following guarantee, the master still continuing his refusal to deliver the cargo without being paid the full amount of the freight, or having a guarantee for the payment of the same as aforesaid:

Alexandria, Jan. 20, 1864.

Captain Simpson, of the Parthian.

Sir,—In consideration of your agreeing at our request to deliver to Mr. E. Tamvaco the cargo of coals at present on board your ship, we hereby undertake and guarantee that when and so soon as you shall have delivered the said cargo unto the said Mr. E. Tamvaco, or his order, we will, on demand, pay or cause to be paid to you in cash the full amount of freight due and payable to you in respect of the said cargo, without any deduction whatsoever, except commission dues.

(Signed)

BARKER AND CO.

The master of the Parthian, after receiving the guarantee, forthwith commenced to deliver the cargo to the plt., and completed such delivery on the 13th Feb. 1864.

Upon the completion of the said delivery, the master of the Parthian (Mr. De Mattos' acceptance having been in the meantime discharged at maturity) applied to the plt. for payment of the full chartered freight, and upon plt.'s refusal to pay the same, applied to Messrs. Barker and Co. for payment of the same, in pursuance of the said guarantee. The said Messrs. Barker and Co., however, by the plt.'s instructions, and on his behalf, also refused to pay the same; whereupon the master of the said ship instituted legal proceedings against the said Messrs. Barker and Co. in Her Majesty's Consular Court for Egypt at Alexandria, which had jurisdiction in the said matter, for the recovery of the sum from the said Messrs. Barker and Co. to him under their said guarantee, and the said cause was proceeded with and duly prosecuted, and a day fixed for the trial of the same; but on the day before the last-mentioned day the said Messrs. Barker and Co., on behalf of the said plt., and by his authority, and in discharge of their liability under the said guarantee, viz., on the 7th March 1864, paid the master of the Parthian the amount agreed to be paid by them under their said guarantee, without making any deduction for the 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, the plt. at the same time protesting against such a payment being demanded or made, and a copy of such protest was served on the master of the Parthian.

Upon receiving the amount so paid by Messrs. Barker and Co. as aforesaid, the master of the Parthian gave them the following receipt:

Messrs. Barker and Co. to Capt. Simpson, of the Parthian , as per guarantee on Mr. Tamvaco's behalf.
To freight on 197.8 keels at 30 l. per keel	£596 5 0
Gratuity as per charter-party	5 5 0
	£601 10 0

[The receipt then set out this amount according to current rate of exchange in the money of the country, and was signed by the master.]

The plt. afterwards, and before the commencement of their action, repaid to Messrs. Barker the amount so paid by them to the master of the Parthian as aforesaid.

The questions for the court are: first, whether, under the circumstances before set out, the plt. was, at the time when the captain of the Parthian refused to deliver his cargo, entitled to have his cargo delivered on payment of the balance of the freight after deducting the 301*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*

Second, whether, assuming the plt. to be entitled to recover in respect of the said refusal to deliver, he is entitled to recover anything as damages, but the damages sustained by him by being deprived of the possession of the cargo from the time of the refusal to the time of the cargo being delivered to him.

If the court shall be of opinion upon both points in the affirmative, then the plt. is to be allowed to sign judgment for the sum of 311*l.* 17*s.* 6*d.*, with costs. If the court shall be of opinion upon the first point in the affirmative, and upon the second in the negative, then the plt. is to be allowed to sign judgment for 10*l.* with costs. If the court shall be of opinion upon the first point in the negative, than the deft. is to be at liberty to sign judgment as in case of nonsuit with costs.

Manisty, Q. C. (Lewes with him) for the deft.
 —The advance made by freighter's acceptance on signing bills of lading was a loan to De Mattos, not a part payment of freight, as freight is not earned till the completion of the voyage. The money paid by Barker and Co. was in consequence of a suit in a competent court, and therefore cannot be recovered back in this court.

WILLES, J.—Judgment in this case must be for the plt. for the full amount of his claim. [His Lordship stated the facts of the case.] The words "less advances" in the sentence, "The freight to be paid on unloading and right delivery of cargo less advances in cash at current rate of exchange," are parenthetical, and the words "in cash" are to be taken with the immediately following words, "at current rate of exchange." There is nothing said in the special case of any peculiar construction which the expressions have acquired among ship-owners. The charter-party contemplates advances not in cash, for the freighter's acceptance is expressly mentioned. This construction makes the whole clause sensible, and disposes of the first question; and I need give no opinion on Mr. Manisty's contention, that the advance was nothing but a loan, as to which reference may be made to Byles on Bills, p. 109, 8th edit. The second question is, whether the proceedings in the Consular Court at Alexandria bar the plt.'s right to recover in this court. I think that they do not. The payment, though

THE LAURA.

Ship—Slave trade—Circumstantial evidence—Suspicion —Cargo.

Offences against the laws for the suppression of the slave trade may, like other offences, be established by circumstantial evidence; but such evidence must amount to more than mere suspicion. It is no ground of suspicion that the vessel is laden with a cargo which may or may not be employed in the unlawful trade unless it is found in immediate proximity to the coast of Africa. All the circumstances of each case, and more especially the locality in which the vessel is found, must be taken into consideration.

Comments on the weight to be attributed in such cases to the arrangement of the hatches, and a cargo consisting partly of pine boards and fire bricks.

This was an appeal from a decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court of Antigua, which condemned the Laura and her cargo as having been at the time of seizure by H. M. S. Cadmus equipped for and engaged in the slave trade. The case was one of circumstantial evidence. The owner Dionissis appealed to Her Majesty in Council. The material facts are set forth in the judgment.

Dr. Deane, Q. C. and V. Lushington for the app.

The Queen's Advocates and Dr. Swaney for the resps.

Lord Justice TRINER.—This was an appeal by the owner of the brig Laura, and of her cargo, from a decree of the Vice-Admiralty Court at Antigua, bearing date the 7th July 1862, condemning the brig and her cargo as forfeited for breach of the laws for the suppression of the slave trade. This vessel, which was built in the Southern States of North America, was purchased by Nicholas Dionissis, the app., at Havanna, in the month of Oct. 1861. She took on board some cargo at Havanna, and sailed from that port for the island of St. Thomas on the 30th Nov. 1861. She reached St. Thomas on the 1st Jan. 1862, took on board some further cargo there, and sailed from that island for the island of St. Bartholomew on the 20th Jan. 1862. On that same 20th Jan. 1862, she was captured by Her Majesty's ship Cadmus, and carried to the island of Antigua, where she was condemned as above mentioned. We shall presently enter into the details of this case, so far as in our judgment they are material to be considered; but before doing so, it may be well to notice some points which are common to all cases of this description, and some considerations which apply only to this particular case. To be in any way concerned in the slave trade is a highly criminal offence, and the laws for the suppression of the trade are of a very penal character, affecting both the persons and the property of those who venture to embark in so nefarious a trade. The proof of the infringement of these laws must, therefore, rest upon those who allege that they have been infringed. This is the rule of law which applies universally to cases of criminal offences, and there is no exception to this rule in cases of offences against the laws for the suppression of the slave trade. Offences against these laws may no doubt be established, as offences against other laws may be established, by circumstantial evidence; but the circumstances brought forward to establish the offence must be such as do not end in suspicion merely. They must be such as to satisfy a reasonable mind that the suspicion is well founded, and that the offence has been committed. Again, it must be observed that most, if not all, of the articles of merchandise which are employed for the purposes of the slave trade are also capable of being employed for the purposes of lawful commerce; and that in these cases, therefore, it is not sufficient to consider merely what are the cargoes of the vessels accused of being implicated in the unlawful trade, but all the circumstances of each particular case, and more especially the locality in which the vessels may be found, must be taken into consideration. It is obvious that vessels laden with cargoes capable of being employed either in the unlawful trade or in lawful trade, cannot, when found at a distance from the coast of Africa, where the cargoes, if intended for the unlawful trade, would come into use, be looked upon with the same degree of suspicion as they would justly be subject to if found in immediate proximity to that coast. These are considerations which apply generally to all cases of this description. As to this particular case, in addition to the details to which we shall presently refer, it is to be observed that before this decree was pronounced the case had been investigated, both in the police-court at St. Thomas, and in the Criminal Court at Antigua, where the app. and some of the crew of the vessel were indicted for felony under the Acts on which this case proceeds, and that nothing unfavourable to the app.'s case appears to have been elicited upon the investigation in the police court, and upon the trial in the criminal court the app. and the crew were acquitted. With these preliminary remarks we proceed to consider the details of the case. It will be convenient to consider them under three heads: First, such of them as relate to what passed at Havanna; secondly, such of them as relate to what passed at St. Thomas; and thirdly, such of them as relate more particularly to the special grounds on which the resps.' case is rested, so far as we think it necessary to enter into those grounds. First, then, as to the details of what passed at Havanna. The case, as we collect it from the evidence, stands thus: the app., who is an Ionian by birth, and has been a sailor from a very early period of his life, had for about eighteen years before the year 1841 sailed and traded between North America and the islands in the West Indies and the coast of Mexico, the Caribbean Sea and Central America, as far as Rio Janeiro, and in the course of these years he had made frequent voyages between New Orleans and Cuba, his family for the few last of those years residing at New Orleans. In the latter end of August or beginning of Sept. 1861 he came from Mexico to Havanna, and on his arrival at Havanna found several vessels lying there unemployed and for sale, in consequence, as it would appear, of the war then raging between the Northern and Southern States of North America. He was desirous of purchasing one of these vessels, and after examining several of them, determined to purchase the vessel which is the subject of this appeal, and is now called the Laura, but was then called the Ida Raynes. He negotiated for this purchase with a person named Pertusio, who was the agent for the sale of the vessels, and is alleged on the part of the resps. to have been extensively engaged in the slave trade; ultimately he agreed with Pertusio to purchase the vessel for 5500 dollars. On the 17th Oct. 1861 he paid to Pertusio 4500 dollars on account of the purchase-money, and he afterwards paid the balance of the purchase-money. On the 24th Oct. 1861 the vessel was assigned to him by a bill of sale of that date. Pending the negotiation for this purchase, he was desirous of obtaining for the vessel a British certificate of registry, for the purpose, as it would seem, of securing to himself the benefit of a neutral flag, and he accordingly applied to Mr. Crawford, the British consul in Cuba, for this certificate. Mr. Crawford after some demur, on the 25th Oct. 1861, granted him a provisional certificate for the vessel to continue in force until the 25th April 1862, or until the arrival of the vessel at some port where there was a British registrar, whichever should first happen; and in the declaration of ownership appended to this certificate, the app. declared that he was a British subject born at Cerigo, and that he had never taken the oath of allegiance to any foreign State. Having completed the purchase of the vessel he proceeded to obtain a crew for her, and the crew were engaged through the shipping master of the port, according to the custom of the place. On the 18th Nov. 1861 the ship's articles were signed by him and by the crew before the British vice-consul, by whom the articles seem to have been prepared. He also, after he had purchased the vessel, had her thoroughly cleared out, and purchased some cargo for her, consisting of a very large quantity of rum, which he bought of Pertusio, and of some cigars, sugars, and sweets. He sailed from Havanna on the 30th Nov. 1861, as we have already stated. Before this time, however, Mr. Crawford, the British consul in Cuba, had become suspicious that the vessel was about to be employed in the slave trade, and he accordingly required security from the app. against the vessel being so employed. The security was in consequence given by the app. and Don Pedro Garvalena, who joined in a bond to the Crown, whereby they became bound in the sum of 25,000 dollars, with a condition for making void the bond if the vessel should not be employed in the illegal traffic of negroes at the coast of Africa, or in the slave trade. Don Pedro Garvalena, it appears, joined as security in this bond at the instance of Pertusio. [The Court, after commenting on Mr. Crawford's suspicion, which arose from the unusual cargo and the antecedents of the master, thus concluded:]

THE LAURA.

We proceed, then, to consider the special grounds on which the resps.' case is rested, so far as we deem it necessary to enter into them. The resps., first, rely upon the construction and fittings of the vessel. The principal points on which they rest their case in this respect are, that in this vessel there are three hatches: the fore hatch, the main hatch, and a third hatch aft the main hatch, which in these proceedings and in the course of the argument before us has been called the booby hatch; being, as we understand, a hatch or opening in the deck having a cover over it. That, besides these hatches, this vessel has two scuttles, and that there are stringers or beams running fore and aft along the whole length of the sides of the vessel, at the distance of about six feet below the vessel's deck. They say that in ordinary merchant vessels there are not more than two hatches, the fore hatch and the main hatch, and that there are no stringers; that the booby hatch and at least, of the scuttles were not in the vessel when she was built, but have been cut out of the deck since the vessel was built, and since she was purchased by the app., and that the booby hatch is not constructed as ordinary hatches are, and was not made and is not adapted for cargo purposes; and amongst other circumstances tending to cast a suspicion on this booby hatch they point to its cover having been made capable of being opened or shut by means of slides. They insist that the booby hatch and its cover, and the scuttles, have been put into the vessel for the purpose of affording better ventilation for slaves to be lodged in her hull; and that the stringers have been introduced for the purpose of supporting a slave deck intended to be laid on scantlings placed across the vessel, and resting on these stringers. The app., on the other hand, insists that the three hatches, the scuttles, and the stringers, are commonly to be found in merchant vessels built in America, and that the booby hatch was in the vessel when he purchased it, and was made and adapted for cargo purposes. There is a vast mass of evidence bearing more or less directly upon all these points, but without entering into the details of this evidence, it will be sufficient for us to state what, in our opinion, is the result of it. We are of opinion that the evidence establishes, beyond all doubt, that the three hatches and the scuttles are commonly to be found in American-built merchant vessels, and that the booby hatch was capable of being used for cargo purposes. It appears, indeed, that it has, in fact, been so used by the crew of the Cudmus in loading or unloading the vessel at Antigua; but we think that the evidence does not satisfactorily prove that this booby hatch was made before the app. purchased the vessel, or that it is constructed as hatches are usually constructed. The balance of the evidence on these points seems to us to be in favour of the resps.; but assuming it to be so, and even assuming further that this hatch was constructed as it is for the purpose of better ventilation, we do not think that these circumstances materially affect the question we have here to decide, for we think that the evidence clearly proves that in merchant vessels employed in the ordinary course of trade, and more particularly in such vessels when employed in conveying sugar, which would certainly not be an unusual cargo for vessels trading in the West Indies, it is of great importance that the holds of the vessels containing the cargo should be effectually ventilated, and we do not think that the adoption of a mode of ventilation different from that which is ordinarily used would justify the presumption that the purpose of the ventilation was different from its ordinary purpose. The other points as to the construction and fittings of the vessel, on which the resps. relied, are of so trifling a nature that we do not think it necessary to observe upon them. Another point on which the resps. rested their case was the character of the cargo of this vessel. The articles of the cargo mainly relied upon on the part of the resps., as affording evidence that this vessel was intended to be employed in the slave trade, were the scantling and the white pine boards, the fire-bricks, and the iron. The scantling and the white pine boards must, it was said, have been intended for laying a slave-deck, suspended on the stringers, at the distance of six feet below the vessel's deck, and the fire-bricks and iron for constructing an additional stove to cook for the slaves. These suggestions appear to us to savour much more of ingenious conjecture than of just inference. They are, we think, displaced by the evidence in the cause. As to the scantlings and white pine boards, the evidence satisfies us that the scantlings were not ordered to measurement, and were not measured. They were shipped as they had been cut from
